One antidote to the cost spiral: puny raises and fatter deductibles. "Most companies realize they couldn't hire anybody if they didn't offer medical benefits," says Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health. "But they also expect employees to share more of the burden." Workers can't help feeling it. According to Department of Labor statistics, salaries rose 3% from June 2005 to June 2006, but inflation rose 4.7% and health care 8%.

Those numbers won't change much in 2007. Someone making $40,000 a year can anticipate a 4% pay increase next year. (Don't spend it all in one place.) With health-care costs expected to rise about 7%, that means at least 16% of that raise would go to higher premiums or new out-of-pocket expenses. Stated another way, your 4% raise is actually closer to 3%. Of course, employers tend to look at it differently. "It's a phenomenon we call the hidden paycheck because companies have essentially been substituting health-benefit dollars for salary and merit increases," says Ron Fontanetta of the benefits-consulting firm Towers Perrin.

Companies are also saving money by cracking down on eligibility and raising costs for extended family coverage. Many have begun to impose a monthly surcharge of $50 to $200 to cover spouses and partners who could otherwise get coverage from their employer. Employees are now often paying more to cover their dependents themselves. Following the automobile industry's lead, many firms--about half of all businesses--are conducting audits, requiring marriage licenses or birth certificates to verify coverage for some spouses and dependents. Ford has cut more than 50,000 people from its rolls and Chrysler 26,000. That's a drop in the bucket when you expect to spend $2.3 billion on health care, Chrysler spokesman David Elshoff says, "but at that amount, you're looking at every option to bring costs down."

In addition to being less generous, businesses are being less paternal too, forcing workers to be more accountable for spending, a practice called consumer-driven health care. One immediate change has been a move away from fixed co-payments for such medical expenses as doctor visits and prescription drugs. That's being supplanted by coinsurance, under which the covered person pays a percentage of the expense. Nearly half of companies will have made the switch by next year. "The idea is to get employees to think before heading to the doctor for a cold," says Columbia University professor of health management Sherry Glied, "to shop around a little for the best price."

Another option growing in popularity: high-deductible health plans coupled with a reimbursement mechanism, most often a health-savings account. Younger and healthier workers increasingly select such coverage, which combines a deductible of at least $1,000 with a tax-deferred savings account to which employers sometimes contribute. Chicago-based accounting firm Blackman Kallick offered its more than 200 employees the plan this year. "About 10% chose it," says human-resources manager Suzanne Palombi, "many more than we anticipated." For Blackman, that equates to a 33% drop in premium costs for those workers.

Such savings from high-deductible plans, however, are most likely short lived. A study by benefits-consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide found no correlation between high-deductible plans and companies with the lowest health-care costs. And a Rand Corp. report last week showed that people with such coverage more often forgo necessary care--which generally leads to greater expense later.

Indeed, most corporations are focused on giving employees incentives to stay healthy. Some 60% promote preventive care through wellness programs, including smoking cessation and health-club discounts. "More than ever before, companies are seeing the link between good health and productivity," says Beth Bierbower, vice president of product innovation for insurance provider Humana. "So they're engaging employees more on what their personal needs are."

Humana offers customers several wellness components in their plans. One includes a point system, designed by British firm Virgin, in which a pedometer records an employee's movements. Each step, with extra credit for exercise activities, is converted into points that can buy music, sports equipment and even airline tickets. At Illinois-based International Truck and Engine Co., a similar program has its workforce racing CEO Daniel Ustian to better health. A quarter of its 17,000 employees put in 27 miles a week.

It's not the walkers who are the problem, though. Since 10% of employees account for 70% of costs, identifying and caring for those at the highest risk for illness is a priority. Employees at South Carolina's private utility SCANA who fill out annual health assessments get a special break: their premiums don't rise. Of the company's 15,000 workers, 94% took advantage of that offer this year. The data SCANA and other companies collect can then go toward disease management for such illnesses as diabetes and high blood pressure. At International Truck and Engine, where costs have remained flat the past two years, health professionals call chronically ill employees regularly (unless they opt out) to offer advice on care and medication. SCANA provides drugs through an in-house pharmacy. "We then can buy drugs at a wholesale price," says Joe Bouknight, SCANA's human-resources director. "In 2007 that will represent a nice discount for us and our employees." If only that were true for the rest of us.

America's Best Health Plans (USNEWS)

By Michelle Andrews

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

When Betty Noel was diagnosed with endometrial cancer last year, her husband, Larry, figured most of the costs would be paid by healthcare coverage from his job managing the garden shop at a Kmart in Lynchburg, Va. But when he got a $13,270 bill for the first month of Betty's radiation therapy, he found out differently. K Care Value Plan, his health insurer, informed him that the maximum coverage for outpatient services was $1,200 a year. Larry and Betty would be responsible for coming up with the rest. "We were shocked," says Larry, 59, who was paying about $300 a month for coverage. "I pay more than that just in premiums every year."

The Noels' experience is hardly unique. As healthcare costs have continued to climb-premiums rose 7.7 percent this year-employers have been shifting more of them onto workers' shoulders. The $5 copay has gone the way of the nickel candy bar. These days you can expect to shell out $20 or more every time you visit the doctor and pony up 20 to 30 percent coinsurance for some drugs and services. Annual deductibles of $1,000 or more are becoming more common.

At the same time, benefits are shrinking. "Definitely, we are seeing a trend toward lower benefits across the board," says Beth Darnley, chief program officer for the Patient Advocate Foundation, a nonprofit based in Newport News, Va., that helps people resolve health coverage problems. In the Noels' case, the foundation contacted Kmart. Within a few months the company revised its insurance to cover up to $500,000 annually for inpatient and outpatient care combined. (Kmart declined to comment.)

Out of pocket. That was good news, but it didn't solve all of the Noels'problems. Larry still had to withdraw $5,000 from his 401(k) retirement plan and take $4,000 out of their savings to cover the 20 percent coinsurance they owed for Betty's cancer care. He says, "Sometimes I wonder-what if I get to the point where I can't afford this anymore?"

It's a question many people are asking themselves. Healthcare ranked as the No. 1 concern, outpolling war and terrorism, among those responding to the annual health confidence survey released last week by the Employee Benefit Research Institute. Six in 10 respondents rated the American health system "fair" or "poor," and more than half said they are not satisfied with the cost of healthcare. In studies, people consistently give the healthcare system high marks for quality, and the rankings assembled here and on the Web by U.S.News in partnership with the National Committee for Quality Assurance, managed care's primary accrediting body, showcase the top performers in this important area. But people are worried about expenses, and as healthcare costs continue to shift to individuals, anxiety and dissatisfaction mount.

The buzzword for this cost-shifting is "consumerism." The latest hot concept to capture the imagination of health plans, employers, politicians, and policy wonks, consumerism hands the healthcare reins to individuals, giving them more responsibility for making decisions about their medical care-and a bigger financial stake in paying for it. The most high-profile way that consumerism has entered the mainstream is through health savings accounts (HSAs)-tax-advantaged financial accounts, attached to high-deductible health plans, that people can use to cover their medical bills and save for future medical costs. In addition, health plans are offering members a growing array of "consumer driven" tools that aim to help those in any kind of health plan evaluate healthcare prices, pick doctors and hospitals that are both cost effective and high in quality, get appropriate screenings and tests, and otherwise manage their health. Employers, meanwhile, are steering workers toward cheaper drugs, medical services, and providers by offering lower copayments and other incentives for certain choices.

It's 'Seller Beware' In Housing (USNEWS)

By Alex Markels

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

Roger Maehler has good reason to feel smug about the panoramic mountain views from his new backyard.

"I think I got a good deal," the Scottsdale, Ariz., resident says of the acre-plus adobe ranchette he snagged last week for $655,000-a 23 percent discount from the original $850,000 asking price.

Complete with swimming pool, spa, and a big-screen TV in the great room, the sprawling five-bedroom property was high on his list when he began shopping for a new home in May. But like many buyers these days, Maehler decided to hold off and see how the weakening market shook out over the summer. "I guess it was worth the wait," he says.

Since prices topped out in July, the housing downturn now underway in many parts of the country has already lopped $10,000, or 4.3 percent, off the median price of an existing home, the largest dollar decline the National Association of Realtors has ever recorded. Prices of newly built homes have slumped even more, sinking by 15.5 percent since their April peak, according to the Commerce Department.

Contrarians. While some areas like Houston and Seattle have bucked the trend, prices in once hot markets like Boston are now down by more than 10 percent from their high point. The same goes for parts of the Phoenix area, where the number of homes on the market has more than doubled to 45,000 since last October.

"I literally could have spent eight hours a day, five days a week looking at houses," says Maehler, who toured more than 30 properties before making a bid.

Indeed, the national inventory of 4.3 million unsold homes now stands at about a seven-month supply, a glut some economists say will persist until sellers make meaningful cuts in their asking prices. "Buyers want more than the traditional 2 to 5 percent price reduction before they sign on the dotted line," says Gregory Miller, chief economist for SunTrust Bank, who doesn't expect a significant reduction in inventory until early next year.

That assumes, of course, that sellers like Zaher El-Assi are willing to play along. Even after more than a year with his condo on the market, the Boston resident has steadfastly refused his real-estate agent's pleas to lower the $799,000 price. "I just want to see if I can get the right price," he says of the two offers he has turned down already.

People like El-Assi are "the seller's equivalent of the Looky Lou," says Jason Weissman, his frustrated broker, who estimates that as many as a third of sellers in the Boston area aren't serious about pricing their homes to sell.

Such inflexibility worries economists like Mark Zandi, who says it could take a "Roto-Rooter" to finally flush stubborn sellers-and their market-clogging inventory-from real-estate listings.

In the short run, he expects the market could stabilize somewhat as new construction slows and dejected sellers temporarily pull their homes off during the slow winter season. "But it could very well be a dead-cat bounce," the Moody's Economy.com chief economist says of the chance that a strong economy and persistent inflation will push up mortgage interest rates-just as sellers move to relist their houses in the spring. If that happens, "it'll come right out of housing prices again."

Bush Ventures Into 'killing Fields' In First Mid-term Foray (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Sellersburg, Indiana

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

President George W. Bush finally gave a new meaning to the word bully in his bully pulpit at the weekend.

With just 11 days before the end of his last political campaign, Mr Bush on Saturday starred in his first public rally of the mid-term elections. He rolled up his blue shirtsleeves to lambast Democrats as the party that would raise taxes and negotiate with terrorists.

Selling his party's message in Indiana, the president resembled an old-fashioned revivalist. His evocation of Democratic sins spurred the crowd at the Silver Creek High School, Sellersburg, into an ecstatic chorus of "Amen", "That's right", and one man spontaneously interjecting "You're the man, George".

The official White House transcript showed that the speech was punctuated by 98 bursts of applause and 12 "boos" at the spectre of activist judges, House Democrat leader Nancy Pelosi and gay marriage. The crowd of 4,000 – die-hard Republicans, the merely curious and an Abraham Lincoln impersonator – stamped their feet with unabashed approval and waggled pom-poms.

In a moment more pantomime than politics, Mr Bush encouraged the audience to shout "Just Say No" as he asked: "When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer? When it comes to trying terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer?"

For a beaming Mr Bush it was a welcome return to a vernacular he has long been at ease with. Four years ago he held more than 30 public rallies in the congressional campaign.

In a sign of how his popularity has ebbed, Laura Bush, the First Lady who is more popular than her husband, appeared at two rallies on Saturday. Senator John McCain, the aspiring presidential candidate for 2008, has already held eight rallies this season – he did two on Saturday in Connecticut.

The fact that Mr Bush was in the ninth district of Indiana, a traditionally conservative region in a state that has only voted for the Democratic presidential candidate four times since 1896, underlines the challenge facing the party. It was the first visit by a sitting president since Lyndon Johnson opened a post office in 1964.

Sellersburg is located in the southern tip of the state, next to Kentucky. It is in the heart of the Ohio River valley, an area White House strategists concede is a significant problem.

"A Republican consultant referred to Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania as the killing fields of the Republicans this year," says Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report. "There are no three worse states in the union for Republican House candidates."

Polls show three Indiana seats are at risk. Jeff Hostettler has already been written off as one of the three most vulnerable Republican incumbents, with Chris Chocola nearly as shaky. Mike Sodrel, whose district includes Sellersburg, stood hip to hip with Mr Bush. He has the best hope of retaining his seat, trailing by 2 percentage points in polls.

The White House is paying attention. Last week Mrs Bush made the second of two visits, posing with pumpkins. Barbara Bush, the president's mother, has been through and on Monday Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, will visit Jeffersonville, eight miles away.

Saturday's rally was pure White House stagecraft. The lone black person in the room, and a Hispanic couple, were positioned directly behind Mr Bush. Dozens of ostensibly handcrafted signs – including "Moms for Mike" – were handed out by campaign aides.

Although strategists have dismissed the power of "values voters" in this election, arguing they have been trumped by Iraq and the economy, many of the crowd stressed the primacy of social issues. "Sodrel is against abortion and is pro-gun. My husband is a gun nut. Family values are the top issue for me. The other side are trying to kill babies and take away our guns," said Candace Crone, who described herself as "someone who loves my country".

Penne Keith, whose husband painted an American flag on his front lawn after the terror attacks in 2001, said she admired Mr Bush as "very moral, a Christian believer . . . My husband called in sick today to attend the rally, the first day he has missed this whole year."

The question is whether those at the rally show the same loyalty on November 7. In a nod that his own legacy is at stake, Mr Bush urged them to vote. "Your vote will have an impact not only on your lives here, but an impact that will help determine the course of this nation."

Bush Shows Potency In Rallying The Faithful (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 29 — For all the talk about the political baggage that President Bush carries this year, his stop in Indiana on Saturday showed that he could still turn on — and, White House strategists say, turn out — the most faithful party voters.

Women screamed his name, men chanted "U.S.A.," and no one doubted that the 4,000 people packed into a high school gymnasium for a rally in Sellersburg were primed to urge friends and neighbors to vote on Nov. 7 for Representative Mike Sodrel, who won his seat by just 1,300 votes two years ago.

The scene will repeat itself over and over before Nov. 7, as President Bush plunges into a blitz of rallies for embattled candidates. As the White House moves into its end game for this campaign, a crucial element is the use of the president to rally core voters in certain districts — and either to stop a Democratic takeover of the House and possibly the Senate in the last two years of Mr. Bush's presidency, or, at least, to keep the opposition's gains to a minimum.

The appearances buck the conventional wisdom that Mr. Bush is such a pariah to Republicans that he cannot be of much use on the campaign trail. White House strategists say they have carefully selected several make-or-break races in which the president's presence can still make a difference.

Over the next few days, Mr. Bush, whom members of both parties count as a thoroughbred campaigner, will go to Georgia (twice), Montana, Nevada and Texas.

"In a lot of these places a presidential appearance is going to make a difference in that district," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said in an interview on Sunday. Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush would use the appearances to press a new message that the Democrats have not united on a plan for Iraq.

The strategy is not without its risks. It keeps Mr. Bush front and center when even strategists close to the White House have wondered in private conversations whether it would be better for him to focus on being presidential — perhaps concentrating on foreign policy — when Democrats are working hard to make the elections a national referendum on his policies.

"Anytime Bush is out, he's still on the news at night nationally and in newspapers in all of these competitive districts," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Wherever he goes, he's still hurting Republican incumbents."

The parade of Republican officeholders publicly distancing themselves from Mr. Bush has not let up. And that is seriously limiting the places where he can be of help. Last week, Representative John Hostettler, Republican of Indiana, told The

Evansville Courier and Press that he had declined White House offers of help: "We just decided, just said, 'Just stay in Washington,' " the paper quoted Mr. Hostettler as saying.

But battles like Mr. Sodrel's, against Baron Hill, a former Democratic congressman, will be decided by which side can turn out its core voters. And that is something White House planners say Mr. Bush is still able to do. Yes, only 38 percent of respondents to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll said they approved of the job the president was doing. But that is still something for the White House to work with.

Many of the president's most loyal followers live in places like Sellersburg, where Mr. Bush beat John Kerry by nearly 20 percentage points in 2004, and where his message of low taxes and national defense can still pack a wallop.

Mr. Sodrel's campaign manager, Cam Savage, was only too happy to point out that the 4,000 tickets for the event sold out in just a couple of hours. In the 2000 census, Sellersburg had just over 6,000 residents.

The president's announced stops this week are in other fairly small towns that voted for him by wide margins: Billings, Mont.; Elko, Nev.; Perry, Ga.; Statesboro, Ga.; and Sugar Land, Tex. The combined population of those five places is just over 200,000.

In essence, these are slivers of the country where Mr. Bush's appearances will make a big splash in local papers and on local radio, where he is relatively popular, and where the election will hinge on base voters rather than, say, swing voters who may find him polarizing.

The president's two stops in Georgia on Monday and Tuesday are for two Republicans, Max Burns and Mac Collins, who are making headway in challenges against two Democratic incumbents, Representatives John Barrow and Jim Marshall, respectively. Mr. Bush is popular enough in those areas that the Democratic incumbents have tried to align themselves with him.

"We've gotten rid of 6,500 tickets for the rally already. We'd take him anytime," Tim Baker, Mr. Burns's campaign manager, said. "Bush will help our voters understand the stakes and get them to polls."

And then there are stops like the one on Monday in Sugar Land, for the seat that had belonged to Representative Tom DeLay, whose sudden resignation this year put a usually safe Republican seat in jeopardy.

Mr. Bush won the district over Mr. Kerry in 2004 by nearly 30 percentage points, but the Democrat, Nick Lampson, is favored to win. His main Republican opponent will need all the help she can get from Mr. Bush. She is a write-in candidate with a name that may not be easy to remember: Shelley Sekula-Gibbs.

A Tangle Of A Race To Fill DeLay's Old Seat (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

HOUSTON, Oct. 29 — Hoping against the odds to keep a prize Republican Congressional seat from falling to the Democrats next week, President Bush travels to his home state on Monday for a rally in the district long led by his Texas ally Tom DeLay.

But in a topsy-turvy race with more than its share of bizarre twists, the rally in Sugar Land is not for Mr. DeLay, the former House majority leader. Mr. DeLay, who is facing legal and ethical questions, capped a primary victory in March with the announcement that he was abandoning his run for a 12th term, resigning from Congress and moving to Virginia.

Instead, Mr. Bush is the headliner for a Houston councilwoman, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, who emerged only in August as the Republican choice for the 22nd Congressional District and who is running in two elections: the general election on Nov. 7 and a special election the same day to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term. Her main opponent to fill the House seat for the next two years is Nick Lampson, a Democrat and former congressman who has been campaigning for more than a year and is favored to win.

"The president is coming to rally the troops, and I am so thrilled," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist serving her third two-year term on the Houston City Council, said Friday by phone from the campaign trail. Asked if Mr. Bush's negative approval ratings could hurt her, she was indignant. "Only a Democrat would say that," she said. "He's tremendous. I'm thrilled he's coming."

As for Mr. Lampson, she said, "He's toast."

Mr. Lampson, 61, who lost his House seat in a neighboring district after the 2003 redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay, has shored up his moderate credentials with endorsements from the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the National Rifle Association and has been beaming victory grins at campaign stops.

"This has been, believe it or not, a fun race," he told National Public Radio last week. "I thought it was going to be difficult and very ugly. It has not turned out that way."

But discord broke out Friday after Ms. Sekula-Gibbs showed up inside a Sugar Land polling place where voters were casting early ballots, setting off charges by Texas Democrats and the Lampson camp that she had willfully broken the law by campaigning inside a polling place. Ms. Sekula-Gibbs said she had been campaigning outside and briefly went in to use the restroom and inquire about voter turnout.

In one of the many oddities of the race, Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, 53, is running twice, as her campaign jingle, "Vote Twice for Shelley," to the tune of "Roll Out the Barrel," reminds voters. She is on the ballot with three other Republicans and a Libertarian in the special election that Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, waited until the last minute to call to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term until January. And she is a write-in candidate against Mr. Lampson as well as a Libertarian and two other write-ins in the general election to the 2007-8 Congress.

Only the Libertarian candidate, Bob Smither, 62, an engineer, appears on the ballot in both elections.

Mr. Lampson, perhaps reluctant to risk a loss for little gain, chose not to run in the special election. If Ms. Sekula-Gibbs takes the interim House seat but loses the general election, she would still be compelled to give up her Council position, a base for future campaigns, which has prompted speculation that she may turn down the interim seat. She declined to say.

"I'm running for both seats; I'm winning both seats," she said several times.

Her exclusion from the ballot in the general election goes back to the April decision by Mr. DeLay to give up his re-election race. He is under indictment in Austin in a felony campaign finance case and is facing an ethics investigation into his relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in Washington.

The Texas Republican Party sought to designate a replacement candidate, but the Democrats, eager to keep the focus on Mr. DeLay and his problems, sued to keep him on the ballot. They argued that the voters had chosen Mr. DeLay as the Republican candidate and that replacing him on his assertion that he would not be a Texas resident on Election Day, as required under the Constitution, amounted to illegal manipulation of the voting list.

A federal judge agreed, preventing the Republicans from listing anyone but Mr. DeLay.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, in turn, has been trying to educate voters in how to use the new computerized voting machines to spell out her name.

Midterm Vote May Define Rove's Legacy (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

By many calculations, Democrats are ready to make big gains in the midterm elections, enough to take over the House and possibly the Senate. But White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten says there is one reason he is feeling upbeat amid so much Republican gloom.

"I believe Karl Rove," Bolten said in an interview in his West Wing office Friday. "Karl Rove, somewhere inside that massive brain of his, has figured out the political landscape more clearly than the entire collection of conventional-wisdom pundits and pollsters in the entire city of Washington."

That was true for two elections in a row, in 2002 and 2004, and President Bush's senior adviser has insisted to West Wing colleagues and party faithful alike that it will be again. But Rove is just eight days from having his genius designation revoked -- or upgraded to platinum status.

Even within Rove's own party, expectations are widespread that the Nov. 7 elections will mark a repudiation for the base-rallying, contrast-drawing brand of politics with which he and Bush have been so closely aligned. But it is a mark of the particular place Rove holds in the Washington psyche that even the most exuberant Democrats are wondering why he seems so confident.

There are two questions. Is Rove just acting cocky as a way of lifting GOP morale, or does he really believe it? And, if the latter, is he deluding himself, or does he once again know something that Democrats do not?

The answers have implications well beyond Rove's reputation. Midterm congressional losses for the GOP, some analysts and Republican veterans believe, could effectively end the Bush presidency two years ahead of schedule.

If the Republicans were to lose control of at least one chamber, those in the party who have long seen Rove's approach as polarizing would feel emboldened. At the same time, a new panel co-chaired by the man who exemplifies the GOP establishment, former secretary of state James A. Baker III, is preparing to chart a new course on the Iraq war -- which polls suggest is the single largest reason for the Republicans' current travails.

"The architect may find his engineering plans were faulty," said one former senior official of past GOP administrations, who has watched the current one with increasing dismay. "Turning out the base this year may not be a winning or a governing strategy. America seems to be looking forward to making things work together, rather than dividing people across the board."

Rove is dismissive of the idea that the Republicans will lose the 15 House seats or six Senate seats required to cede control to the Democrats. On Tuesday, when the White House hosted radio talk show hosts from around the country, Rove did at least 13 interviews. He was on the phone with Washington association executives with what one called "happy talk" about voter-turnout metrics, polling data and campaign funding.

"I look at the individual races as clear-eyed as I can every single day, knowing what we are doing and knowing that we have the capacity to move the resources in if we need to do more," Rove said in a brief telephone interview from the road last week. "Incumbents are hard to defeat. Our candidates by and large have significantly more resources than they have. And we have succeeded in making these races choices between two local candidates."

An object of fascination on both the left and right, Rove at age 55 counts as one of the most celebrated and notorious figures in modern presidential history. Inside the White House, he is a revered figure, known as something of a jokester who will show up at senior staff meetings bearing snacks and promising a coup if Bolten is absent. Ed Rogers, a prominent GOP lobbyist, calls him "the glue" that holds the White House together.

Rove has also acquired something close to cult status among movement conservatives: After the president, Laura Bush and Vice President Cheney, Rove is the most powerful draw on the GOP fundraising circuit. He has headlined more than 100 fundraisers this campaign cycle, raising close to $13 million for Republican candidates and causes.

And when he does show up to speak, as at the annual dinner of the Erie County Republican Party earlier this month in Buffalo, Rove is greeted like a visitor from Hollywood. Rove worked the room, posing for pictures, signing programs and making small talk with hundreds of GOP faithful, none of whom seemed disappointed that a deputy White House chief of staff was a last-minute substitute for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

The trip was arranged at the behest of embattled Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. Before the speech, Reynolds said, he made sure Rove inspected the damage from an unexpected snowstorm and received a briefing from Federal Emergency Management Agency officials. A few days later, Bush declared a federal emergency, making the city eligible for up to $200 million in disaster aid.

The White House says Rove had nothing to do with the designation, but Reynolds was clearly happy with the visit. "He has recognized that all politics is local," Reynolds said. Referring to Rove's overnight visit in the middle of a busy campaign season, he said, "The guy did a real favor for me."

The flip side of adulation is paranoia. Many Democrats are convinced Rove has some trick up his sleeve -- Osama bin Laden in the freezer, perhaps, ready for release just before Election Day -- that will save the Republicans from electoral disaster this fall.

"Karl is an absolute figure of fascination," said Walter Isaacson, president of the Aspen Institute, which hosted Rove at its annual "Ideas Festival" this summer. "What stuns people who don't know him is how personally charming he is, especially people who consider him the devil or a strange genius."

Isaacson said Rove not only answered questions for close to 90 minutes before a packed auditorium but also bantered for hours afterward with the high-powered attendees from the worlds of policy, politics and big business. For 40 minutes, he said, Rove engaged in the fine points of stem cell research with Silicon Valley venture capitalist John Doerr. "It always astonishes me that he knows more details about policy than anyone else -- that's the source of his strength," said Isaacson, who has also dealt with Rove extensively on issues of Louisiana reconstruction.

Rove was formally in charge of White House policy until this past spring, when he gave up the portfolio as part of a reshuffling of responsibilities engineered by Bolten. The shake-up was widely seen in Washington as a rebuke to Rove, though Bolten said he wanted to free up his friend for the big strategic thinking and politics he believes he does best.

Rove reads and makes comments on virtually everything the president is slated to say, plays a pivotal role in shaping the overall White House message and still plays an influential role on policy, according to Bolten. His decades-old relationship with the president appears strong and deep, as the two confer every day, sometimes multiple times, on political developments and other issues. He works closely with Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman to coordinate strategy, resource decisions and get-out-the vote efforts.

Bolten, who says he holds only Bush in higher regard than Rove, said he felt that when he took over this spring, Rove's portfolio, "even with his extraordinary abilities, would be unmanageable, especially going into a campaign season." Being in charge of the policy process, he said, requires a more neutral hand.

Rove "has very strongly held views," Bolten said. "He's best when he's liberated to assert his views and explain why."

Soon after the shake-up, Rove was relieved of what was probably an even bigger distraction -- the long-running investigation by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald into his role in the outing of the name of a CIA agent. Though Fitzgerald cleared Rove, many conservatives believe the investigation played a role in the drift of the second Bush term.

"Rove has been much weaker in the last year and a half, in large measure because of Fitzgerald, and Bush has not been as politically successful," said William Kristol, the editor of the Weekly Standard. Kristol voiced worry that moderates will try to "scapegoat" Rove after the election.

Associates say Rove is privately frustrated that individual candidates have not been more aggressive in drawing contrasts with Democrats on national security. In Buffalo, Rove dished out red meat with relish, pausing in the middle of an attack on Democrats for their votes against Bush's anti-terrorism policies to needle Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid for a recent controversy in Nevada. "You may have read about his land swaps," Rove noted dryly.

Rove sarcastically questioned Rep. John P. Murtha's plan for pulling troops out of Iraq and creating a rapid-response force to deal with contingencies in the Middle East, possibly at the American base in Okinawa. "I am from Texas -- I am a simple boy," Rove joked, before noting that Okinawa is close to 5,000 miles from Baghdad.

"It is foolishness to suggest that this is a real plan for America," Rove said. "The real plan is this: Fight, beat 'em, win."

But there is little evidence that White House political efforts on Iraq have worked as Rove had hoped. Rove this summer signaled his desire that the war could be neutralized or even turned into an asset for Republican candidates who cast Democrats as defeatist. Instead, many candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush on the war. And while Bush in 2004 showed he could lose independent voters and still win the election, this year's polls show swing voters even more powerfully against the GOP.

"It has been clear for a long time that the independents are consolidating a view that is very anti-the-Bush-administration, very anti-the-Iraq-war," said Ruy Teixeira, a joint fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress and the Century Foundation. "Maybe they were believing their press clippings that all they need is their base."

Rove voices impatience with the notion that his own reputation is on the ballot. "I understand some will see the election as a judgment on me," he said. "But the fact of the matter is that, look what has been set in motion -- a broader, deeper, strengthened Republican Party, and with an emphasis on grass-roots neighbor-to-neighbor politics, is going to continue."

While Rove's confidence in the midterms does not waver, he said the conservative changes that Bush has promoted do not hinge on just one election: "1938 was a huge wipeout for the Democrats -- do you think that was the end of the New Deal?"

Evangelical-GOP Alliance Weakens (AP-Y)

By Rachel Zoll

AP, October 30, 2006

Of the many disturbing trends for Republicans this campaign season, one of the most troubling is the drop in support among white evangelicals.

The number of conservative Christians with a favorable view of the party has plummeted from 74 percent to 54 percent between 2004 and this year, according to the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press. Evangelicals comprise more than one-third of GOP voters.

But analysts say it's far too soon to write off the powerful Republican-evangelical alliance that helped the party dominate in the 2004 election.

Conservative Christians have been here before — disappointed that Republicans they helped elect failed to enact the evangelical agenda — yet they have consistently returned to the GOP. Even as they question the current Republican leadership, evangelicals are far more supportive than other Americans of President Bush and the party, the Pew Center found.

"There's a lot of discontentment," said Marvin Olasky, editor of the Christian newsweekly World and a framer of the "compassionate conservative" language used by Bush. "But unfortunately for most conservative evangelicals, there's no alternative."

That doesn't mean the GOP can rest easy. Damage over the past two years could cost Republicans on Nov. 7 if disenchanted evangelical voters stay home. And tensions with a core constituency would muddy the run-up to the 2008 presidential race.

Evangelical frustration is apparent in their qualified endorsements of GOP candidates.

James Dobson of Focus on the Family said at a September "Stand for the Family" rally in the battleground state of Pennsylvania that Republicans have made no progress on issues important to Christians who helped put the GOP in control.

Still, he told attendees to vote.

"Whether Republicans deserve the power they were given," Dobson said, "the alternatives are downright frightening."

The complaints are familiar. Through every Republican victory since the Moral Majority was formed in 1979, abortion remained legal, gay couples won greater acceptance and prayer was still barred from public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0087625

In 1999, Cal Thomas and Ed Dobson, both veterans of the Moral Majority, examined these failures in their book "Blinded by Might," and concluded that politics was too corrupt to be used to spread Christian morality in America. A few other evangelicals suggested conservative Christians withdraw from politics and focus instead on faith.

The retreat never happened. Between 1999 and 2004, the share of white evangelicals identifying themselves as Republican grew from 39 percent to 49 percent, the Pew Center found.

It's unclear whether this campaign season will be different.

Like many other Americans, evangelicals are upset by U.S. strategy in Iraq, corruption in the Republican-led Congress, and the case of former GOP Rep. Mark Foley, who sent sexually explicit e-mails to pages.

But conservative Christian grievances go further.

Dobson and other evangelicals have accused Congress of ignoring their policy agenda on marriage and abortion. The Bush administration did give evangelicals what they wanted most — conservative U.S. Supreme Court justices — by appointing John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

Yet, even that victory was sullied.

Many evangelicals complained that Bush's pitch to Christians on behalf of his first choice for the seat now held by Alito, Harriet Miers, was based on her conservative Christian faith. Those who considered her unqualified for the post found the approach patronizing.

Disillusionment has led to a backlash. Some evangelicals are once again warning that lawmakers are using Christians for their votes and politics is corrupting the church.

In the book "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," author David Kuo, a former aide in the White House faith-based office, wrote that Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Kuo, a born-again Christian, said Republicans have failed to fulfill campaign promises to evangelicals, yet have kept Christians on their side by portraying Bush as "pastor-in-chief."

"So much of the support for his presidency comes purely on the basis of his Christian faith," Kuo said in a phone interview. "The biblical notion is to defer to your pastor. Christian political leaders have taken advantage of that — portraying themselves as spiritual leaders — but they're not. They're political leaders."

William Martin, author of "With God on Our Side, The Rise of the Religious Right in America," said Kuo's book may have an impact because it touches on the long-standing evangelical sensitivity to being marginalized by broader society.

But Martin said only a small minority of evangelicals believe they should abandon politics — leaving the Republican grip on the movement intact for now.

"The great advantage that conservatives have had within the evangelical community is that a consistent, coherent message has been repeated over and over and over to people who meet together one, two, three times a week," Martin said. "Liberals really have nothing comparable to that."

As Election Closes In, E-mail A Rapid-fire Political Weapon (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Every weekday at 8 a.m., right after President Bush meets with senior staff, his communications team huddles in a second floor West Wing office to plan new moves in the information war.

Rob Saliterman, the White House director of rapid response, fires salvos throughout the day.

His weapons: e-mails.

The White House digital war room blasts thousands of electronic messages each day, aimed at more than 2,000 targets. They include journalists, Republican staffers in government, radio talk show hosts, television bookers, Internet bloggers and what White House communications director Kevin Sullivan described as other “interested parties.”

Whether trumpeting a presidential speech or seeking to shoot down an unflattering news story, the Bush administration's “rapid response unit” is a place where politics grapples with the 24/7 news cycle — especially in an election year.

“We call it rapid response, but we look at it as being on offense,” Sullivan said. “We want to respond to things that are misleading before they become part of conventional wisdom.”

In recent months, many missives reflect what President Bush and GOP candidates discuss on the campaign trail: the record-breaking stock market, immigration and legislation authorizing a fence along the U.S.-Mexican border, and developments in Iraq.

“ 'Tis the season,” Sullivan said. “There have been more stories to respond to as we have gotten closer” to Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0087626

Democrats also take part. For every e-mail in which the Bush administration touts progress, the staff of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sends a response. A recent example criticized a speech on Iraq by Vice President Cheney with this headline: "Cheney stays the course. Alone."

"We don't want anything to slip by," said Rebecca Kirszner, communications director for the Senate Democratic Communications Center, which Reid created to counter the White House. Her group also keeps well-tended lists of e-mail targets.

Bush's digital warriors send several e-mails on a busy day. On Sept. 6, the day Bush proposed his plan for military trials of terrorism suspects, the White House sent at least seven missives. They included two "fact sheets" explaining the program, a list detailing myths and facts about the CIA's interrogations of these suspects, and another titled "Setting the Record Straight" addressed to critics of the plan.

A month later, the White House's rapid response team cranked out four e-mails covering the national intelligence estimate on Iraq, job creation, budget deficits, and Democrats and taxes.

War rooms in politics are nothing new. The term harks back to Bill Clinton's presidential campaign of 1992, when his advisers developed an aggressive strategy to fight attacks. Douglas Sosnik, a former Clinton political director, said e-mails weren't the tool of choice back then because "it was not nearly as ubiquitous in peoples' lives then as it is now."

The Bush White House began expanding its e-mail strategy in March 2004, according to Sullivan, in response to criticism of its terrorism policies by former National Security Council staff member Richard Clarke. Traffic ticked up in mid-November 2005, as Bush prepared a series of speeches on the Iraq war.

Robert Schmuhl, a professor of American studies at the University of Notre Dame, said the e-mail barrage reflects the fact that much of government has turned into a permanent political campaign. He called the result "spincraft, as opposed to stagecraft."

Sometimes the White House's message can get lost, however. "An e-mail avalanche leads to numbness," said Lanny Davis, an attorney who handled rapid response for the Clinton administration. "The effect of it is minimal."

Too Little, Too Late? (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

As the race for Congress enters the homestretch, the Republicans find themselves limping to the finish line, according to the new NEWSWEEK Poll. President Bush's approval rating continues a slow but steady climb—from an all-time NEWSWEEK-poll low of 33 percent three weeks ago to 37 percent today. But it may be too little, too late: if the midterm elections were held today, 53 percent of those likely to go to the polls would vote for the Democratic candidate in their Congressional district versus just 39 percent who would vote for the Republican.

But the poll is not all bad news for the GOP. President Bush declared this week that the administration was putting the Baghdad government on notice that it had to make progress in stemming sectarian violence and rebuilding the country. Otherwise, Washington would consider changes to its Iraq policy. And it worked—at the margins. Almost half of all Americans still believe taking military action in Iraq was a mistake, but the gap between those who say it was and those who say it was the right decision has narrowed: from 54 to 39 last week to 49 to 43 this week—from a 15-point margin to just six points.

Faith that the United States is making progress in Iraq is up slightly, too: from 25 percent of Americans last week to 29 percent this week. A solid majority still believes the United States is losing ground, but their ranks have decreased from 65 percent to 60 percent. The biggest change is among Republicans. Last week, 50 percent of Republicans said America was making progress in Iraq (35 percent said we were losing ground). This week 65 percent of Republicans say we're making progress and only 22 percent say we're losing ground.

That's good news for the GOP, relatively speaking. But relative is about the only kind of good news the Republicans get these days. (Sixty-one percent of Americans still say Washington should set a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. forces, including 39 percent of Republicans.)

When all Americans were asked which they would rather see happen: the GOP retain control of Congress or the Democrats win enough seats to take over one or both houses, 50 percent of adults said they want a Democratic takeover while 35 percent said they wanted the Republicans to hold tight the reigns of power; in last week's poll, 55 percent wanted the Democrats to take over and 32 wanted the Republicans to retain power.

And while 61 percent of Americans are still dissatisfied with the direction of the country, that compares to 67 percent who were dissatisfied in two NEWSWEEK polls earlier this month. The ranks of the satisfied have grown, if not swelled, from 25 percent to 31 percent.

On the issues, Republicans have staunched their own political bloodletting, pulling even with Democrats on signature GOP issues: for instance, 40 percent of Americans trust Republicans more on handling terrorism; 39 percent trust Democrats more—a statistical tie. And when it comes to which party voters trust more on moral values, Americans are evenly split at 38 percent. The GOP has slightly narrowed the trust gap on other issues, but the Democrats still lead—on Iraq (45 to 33); the economy (47 to 34); health care (53 to 26); immigration (40 to 32); federal spending and the deficit (47 to 31); and stem-cell research (48 to 26). They even tie, statistically, on what used to be bedrock Republican issues: 39 to 37, in favor of the Democrats, on guns; and 38 to 36 in favor of the Democrats on crime. On abortion, Democrats win 42 to 33 and on same-sex marriage, 41 to 33.

Most worrisome for the GOP? As a wave of negative political ads from both parties takes to the airwaves in the final days before the election, voters so far judge the Republican ads more harshly. Overall, about two-thirds of registered voters say neither parties' ads have made much difference in how they're going to vote. Just 9 percent of registered voters who have seen Republican advertisements say the spots make them more likely to vote for Republican candidates; 24 percent say the ads make them less likely. The Democrats seem to turn off fewer voters with their commercials and win more over, but it's still a wash. Fourteen percent of registered voters say they're more likely to vote for a Democrat because of the ads they've seen; 16 percent say they're less likely.

And the GOP seems to be risking a backlash with some of its most risqué advertisements. The most widely viewed of the commercials in the NEWSWEEK poll—the Michael J. Fox ad in support of stem-cell research, which aired in Missouri and Maryland (and is the only ad in the poll seen by a majority of Americans)—was considered acceptable by 62 percent of registered voters who saw it. But of the 24 percent of registered voters who said they'd seen the ad "critical of a Tennessee Senate candidate that shows a young woman who says she met him at a party," only 20 percent found it acceptable; an overwhelming 77 percent of those who had seen it said the ad was "too extreme."

Which begs a question: Just how scary will things get between now and Nov. 7?

The NEWSWEEK poll, conducted Oct. 26-27, has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. In conducting the poll, Princeton Survey Research Associates International interviewed 1,002 adults aged 18 and older.

In Key House Races, Democrats Run To The Right (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan And Anne E. Kornblut

ASHEVILLE, N.C., Oct. 28 — In their push to win back control of the House, Democrats have turned to conservative and moderate candidates who fit the profiles of their districts more closely than the profile of the national party.

One such candidate, Heath Shuler, was courted by Republicans to run for office in 2001. Mr. Shuler, 34, is a retired National Football League quarterback who is running in the 11th Congressional District in North Carolina. He is an evangelical Christian and holds fast to many conservative social views, like opposition to abortion rights.

"My guess is that if Democrats are in the majority, it's going to be because of these New Democrat, Blue Dog candidates out there winning in these competitive swing districts," Representative Ron Kind of Wisconsin, co-chairman of a caucus of centrist House Democrats, said in an interview.

But if candidates like Mr. Shuler do help the Democrats gain majority control of Congress, it could come at a political price, which may include tensions in the party between its new centrists and its more liberal political base.

While Democratic leaders have gone to great lengths to promote the views of these candidates, some, like Mr. Shuler, have views on issues like gun control and abortion that are far out of step with the prevailing views of the Democrats who control the party. On some issues, they may even be expected to side with Republicans and the Bush White House.

Democratic officials said they did not set out with the intention of finding moderates to run. Instead, as they searched for candidates with the greatest possibility of winning against Republicans, they said, they wound up with a number who reflected more moderate views.

That was especially true in suburban areas and some rural districts, said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "As a group, they are moderate in temperament and reformers in spirit," Mr. Emanuel said.

In Indiana, for example, Brad Ellsworth, a Democrat running to unseat Representative John Hostettler, brags about the "A" rating he has received from the National Rifle Association. In Kentucky, Mike Weaver, a Democrat who opposes abortion rights, is running against Representative Ron Lewis, a Republican. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat running for an open House seat in Arizona, is presenting herself as a fiscal conservative, saying she would oppose Congressional pay increases until the federal budget is balanced.

If this crop of moderate and conservative Democrats arrived on Capitol Hill as members of a Democratic majority, they would not have much power individually to change the face of Congress — an argument that has been used against Mr. Shuler by the incumbent, Representative Charles H. Taylor, who is chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on the Interior.

Instead, party veterans would remain in chairmanships and House leadership posts; several officials said they did not expect a moderate revolution to erupt or to threaten the position of Representative Nancy Pelosi of California as the Democratic leader in the House.

"But will they have an impact? Absolutely," Mr. Emanuel said. "They're going to have an impact on the Congress and the caucus." A prime example is Mr. Shuler, who addresses environmental conservation from the viewpoint of an avid hunter and speaks of health care for the poor as a moral responsibility.

Collectively, the group could tilt the balance of power within the party, which has been struggling to define itself in recent elections. The candidates cover the spectrum on political issues; some are fiscally conservative and moderate or liberal on social issues, some are the reverse. They could influence negotiations with Republicans on a variety of issues, including Social Security and stem cell research.

There are two main groups of moderate Democrats in the House: the Blue Dog Coalition, a caucus of socially conservative and moderate members formed in 1994; and the New Democrat Coalition, a caucus of centrists formed in 1997. While there are differences between the two — the Blue Dogs tend to be more rural and Southern, with occasional alliances with Republicans, while the New Democrats are more suburban and wealthy and place a premium on party loyalty — there are members who belong to both. Both, of course, have a stake in helping the centrist candidates succeed.

Representative Ellen O. Tauscher of California, a co-chairwoman of the 47-member New Democrat Coalition, said that 27 of the top 40 contested House seats were being pursued by Democrats who have pledged to become members of the group, which says its chief issues are national security and fiscal responsibility.

"I think there's tremendous agreement and awareness that getting the majority and running over the left cliff is what our Republican opponents would dearly love," Ms. Tauscher said, adding that this was something "we've got to fight."

The centrist movement was embodied by former President Bill Clinton, who rose to prominence through the Democratic Leadership Council, which embraced a so-called third way of politics and eschewed what it saw as outdated liberalism.

Yet since Mr. Clinton left office, Democrats have seemed to drift back in the direction of their liberal identity, nominating two presidential contenders who were seen as less committed to the moderate cause.

"The Democrats as a whole have begun to understand and recognize, as I did, that we have the extreme left and the extreme right, and 80 percent of America is in the middle," Mr. Shuler said on a campaign stop last week at the Asheville-Buncombe Technical Community College. "People need to start working together."

Mr. Shuler grew up in a Democratic family, the son of a mailman in Bryson City, N.C. He has set out to bring Democrats who have voted Republican, like Brenda Davis, back into the fold.

From behind the counter at the Spud & Deb's hunting and pet supply store in Enka, N.C., Ms. Davis, 41, said she voted Republican in the last election because of her religious beliefs, but this time is supporting Mr. Shuler.

"Considering my son is a marine and he's done two tours in Iraq," Ms. Davis said, "I'm with the Democrats."

In 2001, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to persuade Mr. Shuler, who was then living in Knoxville, Tenn., to run for Congress even though he had rarely shown interest enough in politics to vote.

But Democrats found Mr. Shuler an equally appealing candidate, for some of the same reasons. After intense recruiting, he agreed to run this year as a Democrat in the Blue Ridge Mountains of western North Carolina, where he was a high school football star. Despite his lack of political experience, polls indicate that he has pushed the Republican incumbent, Mr. Taylor, into a dead heat.

In this corner of the state, where the rivers churn with whitewater and the mountainsides brighten into rusty glory each autumn, second homes for the wealthy have driven up the cost of living even as manufacturing jobs have become scarce, and the social spending cuts that people associated with the Republican Party are no more palatable than the social liberalism of the Democrats.

Mr. Taylor, a wealthy tree farmer and banker, took office in 1991 and has held it since, and he has talked up his ability to bring federal money to the district.

Asked if he could envision a Democratic Party with, say, an anti-abortion platform, Mr. Shuler did not hesitate. "I'm pro-life and I'm part of the Democratic Party, so I hope it's part of the platform," he said. "Someone needs to lead."

In this election cycle, the Democrats' desire for a victory in Congress has overridden concerns that candidates like Mr. Shuler are too far right for the party base. But there are questions about what will happen down the line.

"I don't think people like Shuler will be the core of the Democratic Party," said Mark Bloom, a writer who is a volunteer for MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, at its storefront office in downtown Asheville. "If people like Shuler turn out to not be progressive enough for my tastes, I'll work to replace him."

In the view of Don Yelton, a Jupiter, N.C., resident, a decisive nationwide realignment is playing out in conservative districts like this one. Although the majority of registered voters are Democrats, President Bush won here by a comfortable margin.

Mr. Yelton, 59 and a lifelong Democrat, said he recently changed parties, in part because he believed that the Democrats had suppressed anti-abortion viewpoints. He is running as a Republican for clerk of court in Buncombe County.

"There's going to be a moderate party for Joe Blow, and whether that party is the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, that's the battle we're seeing," Mr. Yelton said. "I expect to see Hillary Clinton quoting Scripture before it's over with."

It's Lonely At The Top (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Mike Allen

Time, October 30, 2006

"Stay the course" is a time-honored rallying cry in politics. But it has always been more a slogan than a strategy, meant to show the steadfastness of the person who shouts it rather than what he actually intends to do. More telling is when staying the course turns into "constantly changing tactics to meet the situation on the ground." That is how President Bush is now describing the battle plan in Iraq. It also pretty neatly sums up what his presidency has come to as he reaches the eve of a midterm congressional election that has turned into a referendum on Bush himself--and on a policy in Iraq that has left him more isolated than at any other point in his presidency.

The last time control of Congress was up for grabs in a midterm election, it seemed Republican candidates across the country couldn't see enough of--or be seen enough with--George W. Bush. In the closing five days of 2002, Bush swooped through 17 cities, playing to tens of thousands of voters who packed tarmacs and arenas from Aberdeen, S.D., to Blountville, Tenn. This midterm election is also turning out to be all about Bush, but it's a much lonelier experience for him. He still fills smaller rooms, especially the kind where people are willing to write five-figure checks for the privilege of lunch with a Republican President. And he's welcomed warmly in places where having local reporters point out Bush's difficulties provides a diversion from the candidate's own. But when Air Force One touches down in tightly contested congressional districts these days, it often turns out that the G.O.P. candidate there has discovered a previous commitment elsewhere, the political equivalent of suddenly needing to have your tires rotated. Yes, it's true that Florida Congressman Clay Shaw has been running radio ads to boast of his record working closely with a President, but the one he's talking about is Bill Clinton.

THE IRAQ VERDICT

THE CAMPAIGN TRAIL IS NOT THE ONLY place where Bush is watching his friends scatter. Only 38% percent of Americans say they still believe his invasion of Iraq was a good idea, and 61% percent say they don't think he has a clear plan for handling the war. But Bush has lived by the political philosophy that when the crowd is against you, you just strut more boldly across the stage. That's why he held a news conference a few days ago to hug his war policy even tighter. It is there that he argued that staying the course means "constantly changing tactics" and that benchmarks (good) aren't the same as timetables (bad). But it was as if no one was listening. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki declared that he wouldn't abide by either one if it was imposed by Washington, and that morning's headlines had Bush's top general in Iraq, George W. Casey, breaking ranks to suggest he was thinking about asking for more troops. That was just about the last thing any Republican wanted to hear with less than two weeks to go before an election. Within 24 hours, therefore, Casey was back on message with a statement in which his office said he had given the "wrong impression." Al-Maliki and Bush took a few more days to get back in synch, by issuing a declaration that they had agreed to speed up training for Iraqi security forces.

Meanwhile, even as Bush was praising Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as "a smart, tough, capable administrator," endangered Republicans like Kentucky Representative Anne Northup and Ohio Senator Mike DeWine have been joining the increasingly loud chorus of calls for the Secretary's ouster. And pressure for change is not coming only from the desperate and the wobbly. Texas Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison--a Bush loyalist well ahead in her bid for re-election--is expressing regret for her vote to authorize the invasion and is advocating partitioning Iraq along ethnic lines. "We have to step back and stop trying to put our American ideas onto this problem," she told the Houston Chronicle.

Iraq is what has put the President on the eve of a possible rebuke by voters. And if Bush were a different kind of politician--if he loved political jawboning like Lyndon Johnson or could show political elasticity like Bill Clinton--this moment might be less significant. But Bush has perfected the art of governing from inside his razor-thin majority, and is proud above all of his ideological toughness. That's why the midterms could do more than change the balance of power in Washington, if current polls are right and one or both houses shift to Democratic hands. The election might also produce a different kind of presidential style. Bush has sounded wistful lately about his more bipartisan days as a Texas Governor. "As you know, in Austin I was able to work with Democrats and Republicans to get a lot done," he said in an interview last week with Texas-based Belo Broadcasting. That's a new tone for a leader whose confidence and convictions have given his party its backbone for the past six years.

IT'S THE PRESIDENT, STUPID

FOR THE MOMENT, HOWEVER, SILVER linings in the President's predicament are so scant around the White House that when a conservative commentator recently asked Bush to give him some good news, Bush replied, "You're talking to Noah about the flood." Even the President knows this election has become a national referendum on him and his performance. In the latest Washington Post--ABC News poll, 31% of those surveyed said they will use their congressional votes to register their opposition to Bush, which was almost double the percentage who said they felt that way before the last midterm. By comparison, only 17% said they plan to use their vote to show support for Bush. And Democrats are stoking that sentiment in ads like the one the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is running on television in Connecticut's Second District, in which an announcer intones: "Rob Simmons said he'd represent us, but George Bush always comes first." In fact, you are far more likely to see Bush in a Democratic ad this year than a Republican one. The President is now being featured in 89 separate TV commercials for Democratic House candidates nationwide. Says DCCC spokesman Bill Burton: "No other issue is that dominant."

Of course, the President and his party still have some built-in advantages. The gerrymandering of the past decade has turned the vast majority of congressional districts into fortresses for incumbents, to the point where the number of House seats in serious contention is only about three dozen, compared with roughly 100 in the 1994 landslide that brought the G.O.P. to power with a 54-seat pickup. And the Republicans retain their advantage in money and, most operatives on both sides agree, the pinpoint sophistication of their turnout operation among a conservative base in which Bush still has nearly 90% approval in most polls. But even Republicans fret their loyalists have been discouraged by the Mark Foley scandal, and can't match the Democrats in passion. That fervor is being fueled by the bare-knuckled veterans who are heading up their House and Senate campaigns--New York Senator Charles Schumer and Chicago Congressman Rahm Emanuel--who have been urging their candidates to punch back at Bush directly on national security. And they have. In Rhode Island, Democratic Senate nominee Sheldon Whitehouse has been running an ad in which he says, "We need to send a clear signal that, folks, we are really getting out" of Iraq. So upended is the political calculus that it is now Republicans like Senate majority leader Bill Frist who are urging their candidates to steer clear of the war in favor of pocketbook issues.

CAPITAL CONFLICT

SO WHAT DOES IT MEAN IF WASHINGTON does become a stage of sectarian conflict after Nov. 7? For one thing, most of Bush's legislative agenda could be bound for gridlock. White House officials still talk hopefully of expanding Bush's No Child Left Behind education legislation. Other issues for which they argue they could get some kind of bipartisan traction include moving toward energy independence, lowering health-care costs and measures to fight terrorism. Bush's advisers even talk of enlisting Democrats for some grand push for entitlement reform, although anything like Bush's disastrous effort to add private accounts to Social Security would seem out of the question, given his inability to get anywhere even with a Republican Congress.

One area in which the President and a Democratic Congress might be able to make common cause is the immigration bill that has been one of his signature issues. The Senate has gone along with Bush's comprehensive approach, which includes both tougher enforcement of the border and expanded legalization for immigrants who are already in this country. But the closest thing to an immigration policy to come out of House Republicans was a 700-mile "virtual fence" along the border--a politically expedient idea that, enacted on its own, leaves Bush with less to horse-trade in his efforts to get what he really wants, which is serious reform. With that in mind, White House officials resisted holding a signing ceremony on the fence bill. But House Republican leaders were so insistent that the White House finally agreed to a low-key event in the Roosevelt Room with just six minutes of presidential remarks.

As for what direction the Democrats are likely to take, much would depend on whether would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi decides the next two years are about revenge, or about governing--and whether she can keep her troops in line. "They listen to no one," she told TIME earlier this year. "They don't even listen to each other." Pelosi's initial goals, which she says she wants to accomplish in the Democrats' first 100 legislative hours in power, are modest and relatively uncontroversial. She would have the House pass bills aimed at raising the minimum wage, cutting student-loan interest rates, allowing the Federal Government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients, and reforming lobbying practices.

Pelosi needs 15 seats to become the next Speaker, but if her majority is only a vote or two, she's not likely to get much further than her 100-hour plan. More conservative Democrats, many of them newly elected from Republican-leaning districts, would hold the balance of power. If the Democrats have a more comfortable majority, however, the party's edgier, angrier side could emerge, especially on the question of whether or how quickly to withdraw from Iraq. One of the early tests of which direction Pelosi would take could be an expected fight for majority leader between the current whip Steny Hoyer and Pennsylvania's John Murtha, who has become a hero to the antiwar left.

If lame-duck Presidents are to achieve anything, they often have to look for ways to go around Congress, especially when it is in the hands of the other party. Clinton used Executive Orders and his bully pulpit to encourage school uniforms, impose ergonomic rules on employers and prevent mining, logging and development on 60 million acres of public land. White House press secretary Tony Snow says Bush may take the same bypass around Capitol Hill. "He told all of us, 'Put on your track shoes. We're going to run to the finish,'" Snow said. "He's going to be aggressive on a lot of fronts. He's been calling all his Cabinet secretaries and telling them, 'You tell me administratively everything you can do between now and the end of the presidency. I want to see your to-do list and how you expect to do it.' We're going to try to be as ambitious and bold as we can possibly be."

In fact, when it comes to deploying its Executive power, which is dear to Bush's understanding of the presidency, the President's team has been planning for what one strategist describes as "a cataclysmic fight to the death" over the balance between Congress and the White House if confronted with congressional subpoenas it deems inappropriate. The strategist says the Bush team is "going to assert that power, and they're going to fight it all the way to the Supreme Court on every issue, every time, no compromise, no discussion, no negotiation."

MR. OPTIMISM

AS FOR THE BIGGEST CHALLENGE OF ALL to Bush's presidency, some clarity on Iraq may come after the elections, when Bush receives a much anticipated report from the Iraq Study Group, the commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker (Jimmy, as the President calls the longtime family consigliere) and Lee Hamilton, vice chairman of the 9/11 commission. Administration officials say they expect the report no sooner than December, and they hope it includes recommendations they can embrace rather than a menu of options that would put the ball back in their court.

Baker has said he wants the panel of Republicans and Democrats to come to a consensus--which has some Administration officials skeptical about how much clarity will emerge. "I welcome all these efforts," Bush said at his news conference. "My Administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory." That gives Bush a lot of leeway for a real course correction without saying--perhaps even knowing--what is to come from the Baker-Hamilton group. A senior Administration official says, "The only things we've ruled out are getting out immediately, phased withdrawal without any reference to events on the ground and partitioning the country into three parts. Those are all nonstarters." That's a very narrow range of exceptions; even the Democrats, by and large, aren't advocating those approaches.

However bleak the President's situation may look to outsiders, aides say he appears to be reveling in campaigning, and was joking about Detroit Tigers pitcher Kenny Rogers' doing better in the World Series than he did when he played for Bush's Texas Rangers in the 1990s. "Sometimes he'll premise a point he makes by saying 'Call me Mr. Happy, but I think ...' or 'I know I'm Mr. Optimism, but ...,'" says an aide. A presidential adviser who has recently talked to Bush says he believes the President will finish stronger than most people think, largely because of the determination that critics call stubbornness. "This guy, at 11:59 and 58 seconds on the 20th of January 2009, in the moment before his successor is inaugurated, is still going to be trying to make it work in Iraq," the adviser says. "He really believes it can work, and he believes that his will can be part of a formula to make it work in Iraq, and that's a course for us to defeat radical Islamic terrorism."

Friends describe a President who knows he's the same person today that he was at his Gallup-poll peak of 90% approval after 9/11 and that he was in the depths of 31% last spring. In Journeys with George, her documentary about Bush's first campaign, former NBC producer Alexandra Pelosi--who, as it happens, is the daughter of the woman who has the most to gain in these elections--tells of being invited to Bush's private compartment on his campaign plane when she was having a low moment. "They can say what they want about me," she remembered him saying, "but at least I know who I am, and I know who my friends are." As Bush girds for tectonic change, that certitude will be tested as never before.

Fatter 401(k)'s Might Not Be Enough To Save The GOP (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

How will investors affect the midterm congressional elections November 7?

Political pundits want to know-and for good reason. Slightly more than half of all U.S. households own stock, either directly or through retirement accounts like 401(k)'s and IRAs, according to the Investment Company Institute. In the early 1990s, only about a third did.

During the 2004 presidential election, about 46 percent of voters, according to polling by Zogby International, identified themselves as members of the "investor class." And this group voted for President Bush in a landslide over Sen. John Kerry, 61 percent to 39 percent.

Of course, the term investor class may just mean middle-to-upper-income white men, a group that typically votes GOP. But investors are now far more diverse than that. Some 91 million Americans owned mutual funds in 2005. In about a quarter of fund-owning households, women make the investment decisions.

"The investor class has been the great hope of Republicans," says Charles Gabriel, political analyst at the Washington research arm of Prudential Securities. "The theory was that if you turned voters into stakeholders, they would pay closer attention ... to legislation that would hurt companies." Yet Gabriel wonders how energetic investors will be, since the Dow Jones industrial average has only recently returned to levels last seen in 2000.

Surprise! A Zogby poll taken in mid-June, as the market rally was beginning, showed Bush with a 41 percent approval rating among investors. That's not so hot, but it was better than his 36 percent approval rating overall. Investors checking their financial statements this month will find a nice "October surprise." The S&P 500 gained 5 percent in the third quarter and is up about 13 percent since early June. "The economy is in very good shape right now," says David Gitlitz, chief economist at TrendMacrolytics. "Investors have every reason to be happy with what is going on."

All this seemed to be helping Bush and the congressional GOP-ratings for both were rising-until the Mark Foley page scandal broke.

Democrats will correctly point out that stocks have historically done better when their party has controlled the White House than when the GOP has. So why do investors keep favoring Republicans? A recent study offers this possible explanation: While past Democratic presidents may have pursued market-friendly policies, investors stubbornly expect future ones not to. One reason may be that the GOP tends to aggressively support more favorable treatment of capital gains and dividend income. Rates for both were cut in 2003.

By contrast, Kerry vice presidential candidate John Edwards, a possible 2008 White House contender, has advocated raising capital-gains rates for wealthier investors.

Turnout, Not Burnout (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

BLUE BELL, PA.-Here's Rick Santorum's plan to close his challenger's big lead in the polls and pull off a surprise win next week: a phone bank staffed with a half-dozen die-hard volunteers in this Philadelphia suburb. "The Republican Party is committed to protecting America in the war on terror and securing our borders," says Jack Posobiec, a Temple University senior, into a phone receiver on the second-to-last Tuesday before the election. "Can the party count on your vote?" Posobiec takes down the "Yes" response on a sheet of paper that will be scanned into the GOP's vast national voter database, then dials the next number on his list. It's the kind of person-to-person transaction, repeated millions of times over, that forms the grass-roots ground game credited with delivering the Republican gains of 2002 and 2004.

This year, facing its toughest political climate in over a decade (Santorum is just one of several Republican senators in a fight for their political lives), the GOP is counting on that get-out-the-vote machine more than ever. "Turnout in an off-year election is more important than in a presidential election because voters on both sides are less motivated," says a senior Republican adviser. Turnout this year is expected to be down by more than a third from 2004, which is why more than 20 GOP phone banks and volunteer centers across Pennsylvania have already contacted more than a million voters most likely to back Santorum-who is running up to 12 points behind challenger Bob Casey Jr. "The goal is to get [Casey's lead] to single digits by Election Day," says Santorum campaign manager Vince Galko. "The grass roots will take it from there."

Dispirited. With only days to go, however, achieving that goal appears iffy, at best. The revved-up Republican base that staffed the election-eve blizzard of phone calls and door knocks in 2002 and 2004 as part of the GOP's "72-hour plan" now appears dispirited. At the Blue Bell phone bank, one volunteer called a half-dozen Republicans who'd expressed interest in joining this year's "72-hour task force" before finding a taker. The Democrats, meanwhile, say they've improved their ground game since 2004, when the Democratic National Committee's voter file-the road map for turnout efforts-was so glitch-prone that Ohio's Democratic Party couldn't access it until a week before Election Day. In dozens of close races nationwide, the ability of the GOP turnout effort to deliver again, or the Democrats' ability to best it, will determine the outcome next week-and, with it, which party controls Congress.

The Democrats, by relying on organized labor, had historically maintained an edge on turnout operations-until President Bush was elected. But the GOP, under the direction of White House political chief Karl Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, began running its turnout operation like a business, giving state parties customized volunteer recruitment and voter contact goals. In this cycle, Mehlman received weekly reports from state parties that showed how well each was managing its "metric" goals, starting a full year before Election Day.

The Year The Democrats Punched Back (TIME)

By Joe Klein

Time, October 30, 2006

First, the Republicans tried to attack Democrats on national security, their old, reliable soft-on-terrorism gambit. But that didn't work, in part because George W. Bush's own National Intelligence Council issued a report that said the Administration's policies were probably adding to the sum total of terrorists in the world. Then the Republicans tried to accuse Democrats of being soft on illegal immigrants. But that didn't work because the President himself was notoriously humane on immigration—and it was the Republican Congress that had failed to produce a tough immigration bill.

In recent weeks, the Republicans unwrapped another moldy chestnut, advertisements proclaiming that Democrats will raise taxes. But that didn't seem to be working either because voters were focused on Iraq and Mark Foley. And so last week the Republicans unleashed a series of ads painting the Democrats as sex-crazed, homosexual-loving, porn-perusing—and in the case of the novelist and Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb, porn-writing—perverts. It was vivid proof that the prospect of a hanging doesn't always concentrate the mind. Sometimes it leads to feral, piss-pants desperation.

Most of the media attention was centered on the Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate from Tennessee, Harold Ford Jr., and why not? He's young, attractive and black—and you know how dangerously sexy those people are. But there was enough other action around the country—the attack on the sex scenes in Webb's novels, sex-related claims against Democratic congressional candidates in New York and Minnesota—for the outlines of the new Republican strategy to become clear. Even President Bush leaped on a New Jersey court decision favorable to homosexual couples, calling it another case of liberal judicial activism.

Ford's crime was his attendance, along with 3,000 other people, at a Super Bowl party sponsored by Playboy magazine last year. This inspired the Republicans to run their now famous ad featuring a scantily clad white actress who claimed to have met Ford at the party and then, in the punch line, pooched her lips, winked and whispered, "Harold, call me." A second ad accused Ford of having "Hollywood values," for what it said was his support of gay marriage and the distribution of morning-after birth-control pills to teenagers.

Neither claim is true. It remains to be seen what, if any, effect these ads will have, but Ford responded immediately with a spot featuring average Tennesseans expressing their disgust with the Republicans. A woman named Maura Satchell says, "My son's life is on the line in Iraq, and they're putting out these ads just to distract us."

Rapid response to Republican attacks has been a key to Ford's unlikely strength in Tennessee. In early October, for example, the Republican candidate, Bob Corker, accused Ford of being pro-amnesty for illegal immigrants. Ford's response was immediate and lethal: an ad claiming that Corker's construction company had employed illegal aliens. In fact, a Corker work site had been raided by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. "Rapid response is a rule I set down for all our candidates this year," says Senator Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). "If you want [financial] support from us, you have to respond within 24 hours after you've been attacked."

Obviously, John Kerry's lamblike response to the attacks on his character during the 2004 presidential campaign, especially those emanating from the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, is very much on Democrats' minds in 2006. But Schumer learned the lesson in his Senate race against Alfonse D'Amato in 1998. "Fonzi attacked me for being soft on crime, and we came right back at him with a tough series of ads with the tagline 'Alfonse D'Amato: too many lies for too long.'" Schumer says that perhaps the most important ad run by a Democrat this year appeared in July in the Ohio Senate race.

The Republican, Mike DeWine, had put up a spot that called into question Democrat Sherrod Brown's record on national security, using a smudged, smoking, slightly distorted image of the World Trade Center terrorist attack. The thrust of the ad was accurate: Brown is a mortal dove who repeatedly voted against increases in the intelligence budget. And the attack had been expected. "Our candidates were really worried about how to counter the Republicans on national security," says J.B. Poersch, executive Director of the DSCC. "It's what worked against us in 2002 and 2004."

But Brown responded with a spot that began, "It's sad. Mike DeWine exploiting images of 9/11 to smear Sherrod Brown ..." and quickly pivoted to Brown's favorite issue: [DeWine] supported trade deals with China, even after thousands of lost jobs and the transfer of sensitive military technology ..." Polls show Brown well ahead now—and the ad also had a spillover effect. "Our other candidates saw Brown's success," says Poersch, "and they began to feel confident that they could survive Republican national-security attacks."

As a result, the political-advertising phenomenon of 2006: almost all of the best ads this year, in both the Senate and House races, have been Democratic counterpunches. Of course, it is easier to strike back at an exhausted opponent, and 2006 may be remembered as the year that the Reagan Revolution finally crested and began to recede.

Battling For The Show-Me Moms (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, October 30, 2006

Call them the show-me moms. They may be this political season's equivalent of the soccer moms or the NASCAR dads--a slice of the electorate that turns out to be vital to one party's triumph, or either's. This year strategists on both sides are focused on a small subset of females: white women over 55 in the South who were raised as Democrats but tend to be culturally conservative. The group eschews party loyalty in favor of candidates offering practical solutions to problems like education, security and health care and is "very critical," says a top G.O.P. strategist, in the deadlocked Senate races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. To take the Senate, Democrats probably need to win at least two of the races in those red-state redoubts.

Women in general are more independent than men, decide later how to vote and--older women especially-- are more active in midterm elections, all of which means they are central to Democratic attempts to make up for the men the party can't win in the upper South. Democrats are optimistic about swaying older women, says pollster Celinda Lake, because they "were among the most supportive in the early days of the war in Iraq and now are some of the most critical." While 54% of Southern women voted for Bush in 2004, a recent Associated Press poll found that only 32% of them approve of his handling of the war, compared with 36% of all Southerners. Republicans argue that they can hold these show-me moms by stressing the good economy and the moderate popularity of President Bush's prescription-drug program.

The fight for the matron vote can get rough. Senator Jim Talent, the Missouri incumbent who faces a hard contest against state auditor Claire McCaskill, has spent heavily on ads accusing her of failing to investigate abusive nursing homes. And last week in Virginia, Republicans spent more than $1 million on TV ads attacking challenger James Webb for, among other things, a 1979 article opposing women in combat and his novels, whose raunchy sex scenes incumbent George Allen called "demeaning to women." This close to Election Day, there are still plenty of votes to scrap for: a recent Missouri poll found 5% of men are unsure but 9% of women still in play.

Politics: The Sleepers (NSWK)

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

All politics is local, except when it isn't. Next week Americans will head to the polls with national and international issues on their minds. Chief among them: Iraq, the top issue for 29 percent of voters in the NEWSWEEK Poll (the largest percentage for any issue, followed by the economy at 21 percent). Democrats, the party preferred by 53 percent of voters to control Congress, seem poised for big gains. But a host of sleeper social issues, including abortion, same-sex marriage and stem-cell research will keep campaign 2006 interesting to the end.

ISSUES 2006

STEM CELLS

In Missouri, the Fox Effect

When Michael J. Fox picked up the phone early last Tuesday morning he was greeted by his mother, in a fury. Two days before, Fox had appeared in a television advertisement for Democratic Missouri Senate candidate Claire McCaskill. Fox, the actor stricken with Parkinson's disease, was supporting McCaskill and other Democratic candidates because of their support for research on embryonic stem cells. Now Rush Limbaugh, the conservative talk-radio host, was accusing Fox of "exaggerating the effects of the disease" in order to secure sympathy. How could Limbaugh be so cruel, Fox's mother wanted to know. Fox told her Limbaugh wasn't getting to him. "I have four kids," he later told NEWSWEEK. "I have to set an example on how you deal with bullies."

For a moment last week, Fox and Limbaugh made stem-cell research the premier topic in campaign 2006, no small feat for any issue that isn't Iraq or a sex scandal. "We wanted to make sure [stem cells] were at the forefront in the campaign," he says. "That we're talking about this 11 days before the election is just phenomenal."

But back in Missouri, Fox's candidate claimed she hadn't been following the fracas. Were stem cells one of her top five priorities? "That [is] a mean question to ask!" she replied, indicating she'd rather not say. If she sounded a bit tepid, it's because no one in Missouri seems to know quite how stem cells are going to play this year. Next week, when voters choose between McCaskill and Jim Talent, the Republican incumbent, they'll also vote on an amendment to the state's constitution guaranteeing protection for federally sanctioned stem-cell research. Critics say it creates a legal foundation for the cloning of human embryos and the destruction of innocent life. After Fox's ad hit the airwaves, opponents of the measure struck back with their own celebrity-filled ad. Most memorable: James Caviezel, the actor who played Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ," opening the ad in lilting ancient Aramaic. It was a day or so before Caviezel's words were translated as "You betray the Son of Man with a kiss." But his intended message was instantly apparent: conservative Christians, come and vote.

If they do, in large numbers, it could spell trouble for McCaskill, who has trailed Talent in recent polls. But Talent himself seems in no rush to step forward as the face of stem-cell foes, mindful that embryonic research splits conservatives—some of whom protest the use of human embryos, while others champion the prospect of cures. (Talent's campaign did not respond to requests for a comment.)

Missouri is a bellwether: a McCaskill win could push candidates in future races to champion stem cells on the stump. In the meantime Fox is doing plenty of pushing on his own. This week he'll travel to Iowa, Ohio and Virginia to stump for supporters of the research. The political arena exacerbates his Parkinson's symptoms, but Fox refuses to slow down. "I'm tired of having my hope qualified as false," he says. "We've reached a point where this can happen now if people get their votes right."

GAY MARRIAGE

A Wake-Up Call in New Jersey

The Republicans were clearly hoping for a little déjà vu. In 2004, they seized on 11 gay-marriage ballot initiatives to get fired-up conservatives to the polls. Though eight states will vote on similar measures this fall, the issue hasn't been nearly as electrifying. At least not until last week, when the New Jersey Supreme Court ordered the state legislature to grant gays the same marriage rights as straight couples. Though the court said lawmakers didn't have to call it "marriage," the semantics mattered little. "It's a gift to the White House and the Republican Party if they're smart enough to use it," says Gary Bauer, president of the conservative group American Values. President George W. Bush himself extolled the "sacred institution" of heterosexual marriage and complained about "another activist court issue."

In the past two years, says Family Research Council president Tony Perkins, conservatives have passed gay-marriage bans in 16 states (all but five states now have some kind of ban in place) and won eight court victories. "People were somewhat complacent," Perkins says, "but this clearly brings the issue of the defense of marriage back into focus."

With less than two weeks left before the polls close, social conservatives think gay marriage can make a difference again, especially in tight Senate races in Virginia and Tennessee, where marriage amendments are already on the ballot. Bauer says his group may run ads touting the New Jersey ruling in some battleground states.

Gay-rights advocates don't expect to win many—or maybe any—of the eight ballot initiatives. But, after two years of gay marriage in Massachusetts, they think voters might not be as alarmed about the idea as they were in '04. "An angry electorate is looking for real answers on the economy, the war in Iraq," says Human Rights Campaign president Joe Solmonese. "It's just not going to resonate this year." If it does, he says, gay-rights groups will press their case where they've had better luck—in court.

THE RIGHT TO DIE

Schiavo on the Hustings

The fireworks began before the candidates' debate even started. Last week Michael Schiavo took a seat only 15 feet away from Colorado Rep. Marilyn Musgrave—all the better to taunt her. She had been an outspoken advocate of what Schiavo considered government intrusion in his wife Terri's right-to-die case last year. When Musgrave's camp objected to Schiavo's presence, one of the event hosts tried, unsuccessfully, to have a cop force him to change seats. Though Musgrave wasn't asked about Terri during the debate, Schiavo had already met his goal—evoking his wife's case, and the privacy concerns it raised, for the press and the public. "What you went through is the epitome of what's wrong with the country," one man told him afterward.

The issues dominating this election season remain Iraq, terrorism and various scandals, but the Schiavo matter may prove to be a sleeper issue. It has cropped up in contests across the country—from the Florida governor's race to close congressional campaigns in Connecticut, Pennsylvania and points west. Schiavo himself has helped stoke the debate by campaigning for candidates who backed his position on Terri's case and lambasting those who opposed him. Using funds raised by TerriPAC, a political committee he founded last year, he has also given 15 candidates a total of $20,000. All of it is aimed at driving home his message: "Government should not interfere with personal matters," says Schiavo, who still seethes at the memory of Congress's and President Bush's attempts to block removal of Terri's feeding tube.

After mourning Terri's death, Schiavo had planned to move on with his life (he has a second wife and two kids). But in the course of writing a book about the case, he reviewed news footage that he'd never seen from the height of the controversy. He became incensed all over again—and decided to do something about it, teaming up with Democratic consultant Derek Newton. Schiavo's hardly an electrifying speaker, and he mangles names on the stump. But he has an ordinary-guy appeal and a wrenching tale. Formerly a Republican, he's now a Democrat, though he has supported candidates from both parties. As Election Day nears, he's trying to squeeze in one more round of campaign stops, in response to requests from candidates in Georgia, Iowa and Virginia. And after Nov. 7? "On to 2008," he says. An activist has been born.

ABORTION

A Hard Line on the Plains

Tiffany Campbell had a serious problem. The ultrasound showed her 15-week-old embryos had twin-to-twin transfusion syndrome, an often fatal complication. Campbell, who lives in South Dakota, was rushed to Cincinnati, where she underwent a procedure that aborted one fetus in order to save the other. On the way home, says Campbell, she and her husband talked about a new South Dakota law that bans all abortions, except to save the life of the mother. "I'm not really for abortion," says Campbell, 30, still pregnant with the surviving twin. "But then you realize it's not all black and white."

Opponents of South Dakota's abortion ban hope such stories will persuade voters to overturn the law on Election Day next week. Pro-life forces see South Dakota as the beachhead of a new campaign to challenge Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court case that established abortion rights. Pro-choice advocates say that defeating the measure will send a signal to the 14 other states considering abortion bans, including cases involving rape and incest, to abandon their efforts.

The law was driven by Leslee Unruh, a Sioux Falls activist who shared with lawmakers her regret over her own abortion. "I bought the feminist line 'It's my body'," said Unruh. Polls show opponents of the ban with a slight lead. Last week the South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, a grass-roots organization opposed to the ban, signed up a new volunteer: Tiffany Campbell. "As long as I'm on bed rest, I've got plenty of time to stuff envelopes," she says. For Campbell, a registered Republican, this is her first political campaign.

Was Politics Always Such A Contact Sport? (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

It's back-and just in time, too. Gay marriage, the campaign stalwart that pulled such a star turn in the presidential election two years ago, had been unaccountably missing in the previously torpid midterm elections. But thanks to what President Bush called that "activist court" in New Jersey, the old guy is back in the game and ready, it seems, to play for keeps. Less than 24 hours after the New Jersey Supreme Court announced its ruling that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights as heterosexuals, the president slipped a nifty reference to gay marriage into the top of his stump speech (tossing in, for good measure, that Democrats would raise taxes and leave America unprotected), and suddenly he had something to talk about besides Iraq that actually might help his reeling Republican brethren at the polls next week. Well, hope, as the saying has it, does spring eternal.

Say what you will, using the gay marriage issue is good politics. And compared with some of the other shenanigans on the hustings the past few weeks, it looks almost Jeffersonian. Every election year has its share of below-the-belt ads and barroom brawling. But with a turbocharged Internet, the explosion of YouTube and other social-networking sites, and the profusion of so many rabidly partisan blogs, Election '06 has already set new standards for incivility, mendacity, and a bunch of other 75-cent words your faithful Webster's has for generally churlish behavior. The Washington Post called it "kitchen-sink time" in the campaign, and that just about gets it, because it's hard to imagine any unspeakable thing one candidate hasn't thrown at another during this potential power-shifting year. Sexual perversion, moral bankruptcy (the details of the precise charges cannot be shared in a family magazine, sorry)-they've all taken pride of place in campaigns from one end of the nation to another.

In kinder days, Alfred E. Smith said of campaign speech: "No matter how thin you slice it, it's still baloney." This year, you'd have to amend Smith's adage with another term that can't be used in a family publication.

A Bitter War's Latest Front (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087637

SIOUX FALLS, S.D.-There were only about a half dozen of them, but it was the first time they'd shown up at the state's single abortion clinic: veteran protesters in the abortion wars, carrying placards depicting bloody fetuses and aiming cameras at people headed for the clinic run by Planned Parenthood, a simple one-story structure on busy West 41st Street. One protester, in a hooded sweatshirt and camouflage jacket, called a woman leaving the lot a "baby killer" and when asked whom he represented, responded, "Jesus Christ."

Their arrival in this sparsely populated state, a little more than two weeks before voters here will decide whether to overturn a nearly complete ban on medical abortions, infuriated none other than Leslee Unruh, a leader in the state's journey to the March passage of the most restrictive law in the nation. In the process, she has earned a national name by helping to rewrite the antiabortion playbook. "I can't stand the way they do things," Unruh said last week about the protesters' in-your-face strategy. "The anger approach doesn't work because they have no compassion for the women going in there."

During an interview at the Sioux Falls headquarters of Vote Yes for Life, the organization she heads that's campaigning to uphold the state ban, Unruh spoke about her own abortion years ago and her campaign to focus not on confrontation but on the personal stories of women like her who have had or considered abortions. But activists on both sides are riveted by the bottom-line question voters here will answer next week: Can Unruh's new sell persuade South Dakotans to endorse a state law that ignores a U.S. Supreme Court precedent and makes no specific abortion exceptions in cases of incest or rape, or when a mother's health is threatened?

If the answer is no, then the probable conclusion-pending litigation of some sort-is that even abortion opponents aren't willing to so dramatically limit the rights of the mother. But if the answer is yes, then similar legislation is likely to move forward in other states, and so is a legal challenge that could reach the Supreme Court. National abortion-rights groups, alarmed by that possibility, have been working with a state coalition of medical workers, abortion-rights activists, and others to convince voters that the law should be repealed. The group, South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, gathered enough signatures earlier this year to get a challenge to the law on the ballot, arguing that it is unconstitutional and will compromise women's health. "This is not just a ban; it also jeopardizes doctors who even want to talk to their patients openly and honestly," says Jan Nicolay, 64, a former educator and GOP state legislator who speaks for the coalition.

The law, on hold pending next week's vote, makes abortion a felony unless the woman's life is in danger. It also bars anyone-physicians and pharmacists included-from providing emergency contraception, except in cases where a pregnancy has not yet been determined by "conventional medical testing." Unruh argues that the law's minimal emergency contraception allowance provides a rape and incest exception. Planned Parenthood State Director Kate Looby calls that an "inane argument" because emergency contraception is only effective up to 72 hours after sexual contact and is already difficult to access in many parts of the state.

Why I Would Vote No On Pot (TIME)

By Sanjay Gupta

Time, October 30, 2006

Maybe it's because I was born a couple of months after Woodstock and wasn't around when marijuana was as common as iPods are today, but I'm constantly amazed that after all these years--and all the wars on drugs and all the public-service announcements--nearly 15 million Americans still use marijuana at least once a month. California and 10 other states have already decriminalized marijuana for medical use. Now two of those states--Colorado and Nevada--are considering ballot initiatives that would legalize up to an ounce of pot for personal use by people 21 and older, whether or not there is a medical need.

What do voters need to know before going to the polls?

The first is that marijuana isn't really very good for you. True, there are health benefits for some patients. Several recent studies, including a new one from the Scripps Research Institute, show that THC, the chemical in marijuana responsible for the high, can help slow the progress of Alzheimer's disease. (In fact, it seems to block the formation of disease-causing plaques better than several mainstream drugs.) Other studies have shown THC to be a very effective antinausea treatment for people--cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy, for example--for whom conventional medications aren't working. And medical cannabis has shown promise relieving pain in patients with multiple sclerosis and reducing intraocular pressure in glaucoma patients.

But I suspect that most of the people eager to vote yes on the new ballot measures aren't suffering from glaucoma, Alzheimer's or chemo-induced nausea. Many of them just want to get stoned legally. That's why I, like many other doctors, am unimpressed with the proposed legislation, which would legalize marijuana irrespective of any medical condition.

Why do I care? As Dr. Nora Volkow, director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, puts it, "Numerous deleterious health consequences are associated with [marijuana's] short- and long-term use, including the possibility of becoming addicted."

What are other health consequences? Frequent marijuana use can seriously affect your short-term memory. It can impair your cognitive ability (why do you think people call it dope?) and lead to long-lasting depression or anxiety. While many people smoke marijuana to relax, it can have the opposite effect on frequent users. And smoking anything, whether it's tobacco or marijuana, can seriously damage your lung tissue.

The Nevada and Colorado marijuana initiatives have gained support from unlikely places. More than 33 religious leaders in Nevada have endorsed the measure, arguing that permissive legalization, accompanied by stringent regulations and penalties, can cut down on illegal drug trafficking and make communities safer.

Perhaps. But I'm here to tell you, as a doctor, that despite all the talk about the medical benefits of marijuana, smoking the stuff is not going to do your health any good. And if you get high before climbing behind the wheel of a car, you will be putting yourself and those around you in danger.

Does Barack Really Rock? (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

I know: you're sick of politics. That's because we're a week away from the midterm elections, and all you seem to be seeing are nasty TV ads. And if you're going to vote (and please do), chances are you're casting your ballot as a way to register your disgust. You probably want to record your feelings against something-whether it's the war, the president, a Democratic congressional takeover. Most of you think Congress is corrupt, you worry that the situation in Iraq is getting worse, not better, and you don't like the direction in which the country is heading. No wonder you're cranky.

We're all cranky. Which is why, when someone like Barack Obama writes a book called The Audacity of Hope, we perk right up. As cynical as we've all become, we still like the sound of his call for a new kind of politics-rooted in faith, inclusiveness, and bipartisanship. When Obama allowed that he just might be considering a presidential run, some positively jumped for joy: A young (45) African-American with no political baggage, the first-term Democrat from Illinois is full of optimism. He may even be authentic. "A vessel for people's hopes," is how Chicago political consultant and Obama friend David Axelrod puts it. "Someone who can bring some wisdom to the table."

Obama has a great story to tell: half-Kenyan, half-Kansan, born in Hawaii, Harvard law school grad, first black president of the law review, state senator, U.S. senator. Charming, self-effacing, a family man. And as far as Democrats are concerned, he's two more things: first, someone who took an early stand against the Iraq war (unlike, say, John Kerry and Hillary Rodham Clinton). And second, he's not Clinton. "He's not the vehicle for a stop-anybody movement," says Axelrod. "If he runs, it won't be because he's an alternative to anybody."

That may be true-in his own mind. But in the case of just about everyone else, Obama is an alternative-not only to the lightning rod that is Hillary Clinton but also to a generation of boomers who may need to finally cede the stage. In his new book, Obama-born in 1961, which makes him a very late boomer-writes that in watching the Newt Gingrich-Bill Clinton saga play out a decade ago he felt as if he were watching a couple of old generals fight the last war. "I sometimes felt as if I were watching the psychodrama of the baby boom generation-a tale rooted in old grudges and revenge plots hatched on a handful of college campuses long ago-played out on the national stage." He's right-and he's also right to point out that the fights continued right up through the last election, and even into this one. So Obama, his friend Axelrod says, will be able to relate to those younger voters and bring them into the Democratic fold.

Wishy-washy? Maybe, but there's a flip side to Obama's youth: his inexperience. Sure, you say, there's an easy way to handle that problem. After all, the folks with experience are the ones who messed up Iraq. But maybe it wasn't their experience; they could just have been the wrong people. (Paging Donald Rumsfeld.) In a post-9/11 world, it's hard to see how we elect someone without the important national security cred: If terrorism remains the big issue it is now, inexperience won't cut it with the soccer moms. There's no giving anyone the benefit of the doubt, not now. George W. Bush may have chosen-and stuck with-the wrong team. Trouble is, he was too green to understand when they were wrong.

All Politics Is Local? New Mexico Is Test (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087639

Albuquerque — Fighting for control of the House, Democrats and Republicans have cast the midterm election in starkly different terms. To Democrats, it is a national referendum on President Bush; to Republicans, a contrast between local candidates.

The outcome Nov. 7 will probably depend on whether those who turn out to vote are more like Anne Campbell or Don Natvig.

Campbell, a 45-year-old nurse, had trouble deciding between Republican Rep. Heather A. Wilson and her Democratic opponent, state Atty. Gen. Patricia Madrid, until she watched them debate last week. Although Campbell is a Democrat, she was impressed with Wilson's crisp performance and now leans toward the incumbent.

"I think it needs to be a local election," Campbell said, loading groceries into the back of her gray minivan at a big-box mall on the north side of town. "I certainly wouldn't vote against Heather Wilson because of President Bush."

Natvig, who teaches biology at the University of New Mexico, has met Wilson and believes "she's an OK person" and "fairly sincere." But the lanky 54-year-old Democrat plans to vote for Madrid — even though he's no big fan. "I don't want to support the Republican administration," he said, adding, "I see my vote as being in support of a [Democratic] Congress."

New Mexico's 1st Congressional District is high on both parties' target lists in these final campaign days, as Democrats fight for the 15 seats they need to take over the House. More than $11.5 million has been raised and spent here by the candidates and their allies, a state record, and couch potatoes have been bombarded with more than 11,500 TV spots since July.

The district, which takes in Albuquerque and part of its suburbs, is odd in some ways.

Although Democrats outnumber Republicans, the GOP has held the congressional seat for its entire existence, nearly 40 years. No incumbent has ever been defeated, not even in the big Democratic elections of 1974 and 1982.

Still, few places are better to watch the fight for control of Congress. The district, at the intersection of Route 66 and the Rio Grande, is home to a liberal college community, conservative military retirees, and social moderates whose defense and high-tech jobs depend on fat Pentagon budgets. About one in three voters is Latino.

Moreover, as they run neck and neck, the two candidates personify the broad strategy of their respective parties.

Consider the first words each uttered in their televised debate.

"Elections are about choices, and the differences between my opponent and I are many," Republican Wilson said, a line she repeated through the evening. "If you want higher taxes and a weaker national defense, you should vote for Mrs. Madrid."

"I'm running for Congress because it's time for a change in this country," Democrat Madrid responded. "George Bush has been an unmitigated, abject failure, and Heather Wilson has been with him every step of the way."

A political panorama

The issues and advertisements that have played across this high-desert district offer a panorama of the year in politics. There has been scandal, with cameo mentions of former Reps. Tom DeLay, Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Mark Foley. Stem-cell research, soaring gas prices and rising healthcare costs have been discussed, along with the sway of special interests in Washington and Santa Fe, the state capital.

But the war in Iraq has dominated the campaign above all and presented the starkest contrast between the two candidates, just as it has in many races across the country.

Wilson has carefully sculpted an image of independence from Bush and GOP leaders in Congress, parting ways at various times on budget, healthcare and ethics issues.

But the Air Force Academy graduate has been unflagging in her support of the war, casting Madrid as inexperienced and dangerously naive when it comes to Iraq and terrorism.

In the debate, Wilson characterized her opponent's position this way: "Bring the guys home. Quit. Surrender." Madrid, who favors a withdrawal of U.S. troops but has offered no clear timetable, retorted: "Staying the course is not a plan. Paralysis is not a plan."

In terms of public opinion, the Democrat would seem to have the upper hand on the issue. An Albuquerque Journal poll published this month found that 52% of New Mexicans thought the U.S. should have stayed out of Iraq.

More often than not, they believed the administration cherry-picked and sometimes manipulated intelligence, a charge Madrid has used against Wilson, who serves on the House Intelligence Committee.

Wilson rejects the allegation.

But the poll also found considerable ambivalence about the war — only 15% supported an immediate withdrawal — a sentiment that surfaced in a series of voter interviews in the district last week.

Shanna Chavarria, a 49-year-old homemaker and a Democrat, said she wished the U.S. had not invaded Iraq and was eager "to get us home, get us out."

But, she went on, "We're there. I think we need to finish the job."

DOJ_NMG_0087640

She plans to vote for Madrid, however, because Wilson is "just too party-line. Whatever the Republicans did, she did."

The Bush factor

That strong, almost reflexive anti-GOP sentiment poses the greatest threat to Wilson, a smart and nimble campaigner who has weathered several tough reelection fights since going to Congress in 1998.

She won thanks to strong Democratic and Latino support, but surveys suggest many of those voters are straying this time.

"That's where Iraq comes in," said Brian Sanderoff, the state's leading political pollster. "That's where Bush comes in."

With the president at a lackluster 36% approval rating in Albuquerque, Wilson has tried hard to distance herself from Bush and the White House.

She has been hammered for skipping a vote on Iraq this year to attend a presidential fundraiser.

So when strategist Karl Rove came to town in late September, Wilson's campaign announced she would skip the event, which was closed to reporters. Party officials would not even say where Rove planned to appear.

During last week's debate, Wilson twice refused to answer when asked whether she though Bush had been a good president.

The next day, at a news conference at her campaign headquarters, Wilson was asked four more times and again would not offer an opinion.

"History will judge," she said.

The campaign here typifies the broader national contest in other ways.

Both parties have spent millions of dollars on TV spots — mainly attack ads — as have labor unions, trial lawyers, Realtors and other interest groups, according to TNS Media Intelligence/Campaign Media Analysis Group, a national firm that tracks campaign advertising.

The race has been nasty, like so many others in this corrosively negative campaign season.

Madrid calls her opponent a liar and says Wilson, who served on the board overseeing the congressional page program, "looked the other way and didn't protect our children" from Foley's behavior. Wilson said she had no way of knowing what the ex-Florida lawmaker was saying in private e-mails.

Wilson says Madrid is "willing to cheat to win" and aired a TV spot accusing Madrid of allowing a man to "walk" after an attempted rape. A state prosecutor said the ad distorted the facts of a case involving a fictitious teen in an Internet chat room.

The two camps even quibbled over who got the better spot in the State Fair parade, and the politics behind their placement.

Campbell, the nurse who leans toward a Wilson vote, said all of it was enough to make a person stay home on election day.

"They're just awful," she said of the ads, which are inescapable for anyone watching Albuquerque TV.

"You feel bad about both of them."

In Minnesota, 'Everyman' On The Ballot Political Novice Battles Republican Incumbent, With Iraq And Immigration At Forefront By DAVID ROGERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

ROCHESTER, Minn. -- If there is one House race that captures the struggle between Republican power in Congress and a grass-roots demand for change, it is here in Minnesota's First District.

Twelve-year incumbent Rep. Gil Gutknecht is a political survivor and force for the dairy industry as a senior member of the House Agriculture Committee. But in a district President Bush carried twice, the Republican Party and corporate allies are spending heavily to fend off Democrat Tim Walz, a high-school teacher and political newcomer.

Three possible 2008 presidential contenders -- Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama -- are all due here this week. Mr. McCain's appearance, which his camp says is to help re-elect Gov. Tim Pawlenty, not Mr. Gutknecht per se, touches a nerve since Mr. Walz -- a retired National Guard master sergeant -- is a fellow veteran and has been attacked by Mr. Gutknecht for supporting immigration policies akin to the Arizona senator's.

"It's been, 'Holy smokes, the First District can elect a guy who woke up one morning and said let's change this country and let's do this together,' " Mr. Walz laughs.

The heart of his campaign is just that: Everyman running for Congress. With his former National Guard artillery unit deployed in Iraq, Mr. Walz emphasizes the need for change in the war's strategy. But most of all, given the House's low standing in opinion polls and voter anxiety about America losing its way, he sees his candidacy as a wake-up call for Congress and the nation.

REPRESENTATIVE RACES

See more information2 on Minnesota's first congressional district, plus profiles of more than a dozen others across the nation.

"When you wake up Nov. 8, it can be a brand new world," he told supporters last week in Owatonna. "It's not vindictiveness. It's not us saying all our Republican neighbors are wrong. It's us saying this Congress is broken. This rubber-stamp Congress is not giving this country the ability to move forward and compromise.

"If you know how good we are going to feel, picture for a moment how the rest of the world is going to feel. When they wake up Nov. 8, they're going to look and say, 'The Americans are back.' "

Up and down the ballot, Minnesota is a battleground this fall with a Senate seat and the governor's mansion also up for grabs. Early in the nominating process during the spring, Mr. Walz -- who bears a resemblance to another high-school teacher and coach: House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois -- showed promise but was overlooked nationally because of his lack of political experience. He and his fellow Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party candidates are their own cast of characters, less a political party than a repertory company for modern America.

The DFL's field includes a black Muslim; a former Federal Bureau of Investigation agent who was an early outspoken critic of the agency's 9/11 performance; and a child-safety advocate whose son was abducted years ago. But just as the party is seeking change in Washington, it is also struggling to deal with change among its own ranks.

Women and minorities have demanded more of a voice. The retirement of Rep. Martin Sabo, a Democrat, has forced the Fifth District -- made up primarily of Minneapolis and close-in suburbs -- to confront how much it has changed from the working-class neighborhoods that first sent Mr. Sabo to Congress 28 years ago.

Keith Ellison, an antiwar state legislator who would be the first Muslim ever in Congress, won the primary last month with the help of a relatively new Somalian immigrant population. Supporters praise the young African-American attorney as a new voice for the party, but Mr. Ellison's history of parking tickets and tax liens have caused his candidacy to divide longtime allies such as former Vice President Walter Mondale and Mr. Sabo.

The Fifth District is more gentrified but still Democratic. Mr. Mondale says it has changed significantly, "and Keith is part of that change and he will be a good congressman." But Mr. Sabo, whose favored candidate lost in the primary, hasn't made any endorsement. Instead, he has permitted his photograph to be used in campaign literature for independent candidate Tammy Lee, who hopes for an upset and is drawing support from disaffected Democrats as well as conservative bloggers who feel Republican Alan Fine has no chance.

"I'm the palatable alternative to Keith Ellison," says Ms. Lee. "He has a lot of baggage. ... You have a lot of Democrats, lifelong Democrats, who are very uncomfortable sending Keith Ellison to Washington."

Mr. Ellison says of his critics: "When I'm talking about health care and getting out of the war, they are talking about me. The image that's being created is Keith's careless. Maybe I have been careless and I am wrong for it. The voters will decide if I am too careless to go to Congress."

Minnesota's Sixth District, which stretches from the Twin Cities suburbs to St. Cloud, is another open seat -- held by a Republican. Both parties rejected more moderate nominees last spring, and the result has been a nasty, costly contest that has largely eclipsed others in the state.

Democrat Patty Wetterling is proving more resilient than Republicans expected against state Sen. Michelle Bachmann. In recent days, the St. Cloud Times and a suburban newspaper chain, both of which opposed her candidacy two years ago, have endorsed Ms. Wetterling, and polls show a tight race in a district Mr. Bush won with 57% of the vote in 2004.

In the First District, both national parties have entered the fray's home stretch with attack ads focused on the race's top issues: immigration and the war in Iraq. Labor unions are helping Mr. Walz; Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and first lady Laura Bush made back-to-back appearances with Mr. Gutknecht, and, led by agribusiness interests, political action committees have contributed almost $200,000 into the contest since Labor Day.

In an interview during the spring, Mr. Gutknecht played down the political threat posed by the war. But after traveling to Baghdad this summer, he began expressing doubts about the direction of U.S. policy. "The American people are incredibly patient, but their patience is almost at the end," he says.

The congressman faults the Mark Foley page scandal for a drop in his own polls during the first week of October, but says he has recovered. The first lady puts "more of a human face" on the administration and, he says, will help him reach out to swing voters. "They don't wake up in the morning angry at George Bush," he says. "They wake up frustrated and ask themselves, are we doing the right thing?"

Mr. Walz began running a new Iraq war TV ad last week, showing him standing before empty football bleachers intended to represent the number of dead U.S. troops, now approaching 3,000. "Serving right now are kids I taught, coached and trained to be soldiers," he says to the camera. "They deserve a plan for Iraq to govern itself so they can come home."

To blunt the war issue, Republicans have attacked Mr. Walz on illegal immigration. The challenger has proposed that undocumented workers be put on a path toward earned citizenship, but only if they first return to their native country and legally re-enter the U.S.

This is a position akin to one championed by prominent House conservative Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.) and to the right of Mr. McCain, but Republicans are spending heavily on spots accusing Mr. Walz of supporting a sweeping amnesty.

Mr. Walz says he hopes voters will see the attacks as another aspect of Washington they want changed.

Liberal Republican Suburb Turns Furious With G.O.P. (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash., Oct. 24 — The M.B.A.'s have had it. The engineers are fuming.

For as long as anyone here can remember, Bellevue has been a stronghold of socially liberal Republicanism. First, it was a prosperous Seattle bedroom community, then a technological boomtown, where employees of Microsoft and Internet start-ups consistently voted for fiscal restraint and hands-off government.

But now, voters here are accusing the party in power of overspending and overreaching — and when they do, they sound like people who write manifestos, not software code.

"I'm a mild-mannered guy," Michael Mattison, a partner in a software venture development firm, said as he stabbed a piece of halibut in the sunlit dining room of a local bistro. "But we can no longer be subdued."

Bellevue has been growing more Democratic for several years, thanks to an influx of liberal voters and a professional class that is changing teams. This year, Bellevue may send its first Democrat to Congress. Darcy Burner, who even supporters admit is inexperienced, may unseat Representative Dave Reichert, a well-liked, longtime public servant, simply because constituents want Democratic control of the House of Representatives.

"I am a Republican and have traditionally voted that way," Tony Schuler, an operations services manager at Microsoft with a Harvard M.B.A., said as he sat with his wife, Deanna, in their home above Lake Sammamish. But Mr. Schuler abhors what he sees as a new Republican habit of meddling in private affairs.

"The Schiavo case. Tapping people without a warrant. Whether or not people are gay," he said. "Let people be free! It's not government's job to interfere with those things."

In Bellevue, the professional is political. Rather than religion or culture, what unites the diverse population — a quarter of residents are foreign born — are the values of their workplaces: technological innovation, accuracy, efficiency.

And this year, one issue incenses them above all others: restrictions on embryonic stem cell research.

It is a matter of concern across the country, even across parties. But for many engineers and their ilk, restriction of stem cell research is what gay marriage is to conservative Christians, a phenomenon so counter to their basic values that they cannot vote for any candidate who supports it. After all, for Bellevue's professionals, science is not only a means of creating wealth but also an idealistic pursuit, the most promising way they know of improving the human condition.

"For hundreds of years, science has had its own jurisprudence over the truth. It's called peer review, and it works pretty well," said Mr. Mattison, whose father had Alzheimer's and his uncle Parkinson's disease. "I'm outraged that a mere politician would interpret science for me."

Voters like Mr. Mattison should be "natural constituents of Republicans," said Robert E. Lang, a professor of urban planning at Virginia Tech who did research on Bellevue for a coming book on fast-growing "boomburbs," which have city-size populations but suburb-like atmospheres. "They're golfers," Mr. Lang said. (Actually, Mr. Mattison prefers fly-fishing with private guides.)

Voters here also describe themselves as "obsessed" by the mounting national debt, which Mr. Mattison calls a "greater threat than terrorism" to the nation's health.

Lara Peterson, a single mother who markets hardware for Microsoft, said, "It makes me insane to know that we had this huge budget surplus, and yet we've run up such debt in a six-year period."

Ms. Peterson has adopted two daughters from China and is working on a third. As Gwen, her eldest, considered whether biting into an apple would dislodge her dangling front teeth, Ms. Peterson acknowledged that her fixation was personal.

China gains "so much power and control by carrying so much of our debt," said Ms. Peterson, who described herself as a Democrat who often crosses party lines. If the United States one day resists repayment, she said, her girls will "never have an ability to have a relationship with their country."

The politics of Microsoft employees is a subdrama unto itself. In the 2000 presidential election, many voted for President Bush, who was expected to curtail the Clinton administration's antitrust case against the company. But now "the vibe is pretty Democratic," Ms. Peterson said, and many employees who cursed the Democrats just a few years ago now plan on voting for the party.

Microsoft looms so large here, it influences the views even of those it does not employ. Several members of the First Congregational Church of Bellevue, speaking over home-pressed apple cider, said they were mortified by America's role abroad in a way they had not been since the Vietnam War.

They do have one source of global pride, though: Bill and Melinda Gates' work in Africa, which they see as a kind of alternative to official foreign policy and an example of how the United States should be helping the most troubled spots on earth.

When she travels abroad, said Mary Nassif, a school psychologist, "I may not take pride in being American, but I love saying I'm from Seattle."

On a recent evening, immigrants gathered at the Crossroads Mall, where the food court's attempt at internationalism — a pad Thai vendor here, some trays of tandoori there — seemed bland compared with its mix of Eritrean, Laotian and Somali patrons. These immigrants, many from conservative religious backgrounds, are among the Bellevue Republicans who feel the strongest connection to their party on social issues.

Take Pia and Bong Bernadino, who moved here in 2002 from New Jersey, boarding a train without jobs or even acquaintances awaiting them. Ms. Bernadino had been scheduled to meet a friend in the lobby of the World Trade Center at 9 a.m. on Sept. 11, 2001; both she and the friend were late. Later, she taught at a kindergarten on Canal Street, where the students were so traumatized, they used their coloring time to draw babies falling out of the sky.

The Bernadinos moved west to escape their shock and to pursue Mr. Bernadino's long-held dream of working for Microsoft. Now Mr. Bernadino spends his days there as a game developer and his evenings running a Web design business with his wife; they also plan to start an online store for novels signed by their authors. They are saving for a house and sending money home to family in the Philippines.

This year, as always, they are voting for candidates "with a strong family orientation," Mr. Bernadino said. "We're very devout Catholics. If someone is promoting pro-choice it may be questionable for us."

Their other concern is diversity. To their delight, the ballot they received in the mail this year had translations in seven languages, including their native Tagalog. "This is paradise, the land of opportunity," Ms. Bernadino said of Bellevue.

Sheraz Malik, 29, is a Pakistani Muslim who came to the United States alone 10 years ago and became a citizen. Mr. Malik co-founded a long-distance Internet telephone service, which he used to court his fiancée, a Pakistani woman in Dubai. (It is not exactly an arranged marriage, he explained between bites of a hot dog; his parents shortlisted candidates, and after a year of online conversations, he chose one.)

Though Republican policies are generally favorable to his native country and his religious values, Mr. Malik said, he has drifted toward the Democrats since Sept. 11. "When the U.K. had the train blast, they didn't go out and start bombing people," he said. "They examined what they were doing wrong, both in terms of security and why a British-born Pakistani would do that."

Soon he will cast an even more profound vote than the one in November, deciding whether to bring his bride here or move with her back to Pakistan. If he leaves, it will be partly because of post-Sept. 11 changes, like immigration registration measures and what he sees as a general erosion of due process.

"If you're fighting for freedom outside the U.S. and then you suppress freedom at home," he said, "then what are you fighting for in the first place?"

With The House In The Balance, Pelosi Serves As A Focal Point For Both Parties (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

ATLANTA — The young women on the porch were whispering, their tittering just audible over Bill Clinton's remarks to the 300 or so Democratic donors gathered here for lunch.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, mindful that some guests had paid $10,000 for a plate of chicken and bread pudding, shot a frown — the sort a grandmother gives when someone arrives at Christmas dinner in a wrinkled shirt — and in a split second, the whispers ceased. Ms. Pelosi's face resumed its trademark molar-baring smile.

There it was in one brief moment, the three essential elements of Ms. Pelosi's campaign to bring Congress under control of her Democratic Party, preferably with her favored alliteration: message, money, manners.

With the Republican ascendancy in Washington in peril and Ms. Pelosi in line to become the country's first female speaker of the House, she has emerged as a searing symbol of the country's deep partisan divide.

For Republican strategists laboring to maintain control of Congress, she is the personification of liberal lunacy, an Armani-clad elitist who will help push lawmakers toward an agenda of multicultural, tax-raising appeasement.

To many Democrats, Ms. Pelosi embodies their raw antipathy for a Republican Party that has held them largely to the margins for more than a decade, and their hope that a Democratic Congress could make trouble for a president with whom they are at bitter odds.

"I wouldn't say I'm tough," Ms. Pelosi, 66, said in an interview at the home of Representative John Lewis of Georgia, who was host for the luncheon. "I think I am firm and strong."

Indeed, her smile-while-she-gnaws-at-you style and her legislative prowess have gained her respect, if not good wishes, from colleagues and foes.

Aided by a highly partisan House, she has overseen the most uniform voting record of any Democratic caucus since the 1950s. Her steely strategy for sinking President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security succeeded.

She has raised more money for Democrats in this election cycle than any other candidate except Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton — just over $50 million. In September, her party's House campaign raised $14.4 million, outpacing Republicans.

"I am a big fan," said Dick Armey, the former Republican majority leader of the House and co-architect of his party's coup in the 1994 election. "She is an able person and serious about her work and a very pleasant person with whom to work."

Conceding that he disagreed with Ms. Pelosi on everything that matters — "She's misguided" — Mr. Armey added: "You don't get to be minority leader without being intelligent. I'm no longer in office, so I am free to be a nice person. If I had been majority leader and said, 'I like Nancy Pelosi,' I would be crucified."

In her stump speech, Ms. Pelosi has been laying out an agenda for what a Democratic-led House would do in its first 100 hours. Her planning has unnerved Republicans, some of whom are taking aim at her in campaign advertisements.

"I don't take it personally," Ms. Pelosi said, "nor should they."

She arrived at the luncheon here from the airport (she had been raising money in New York, and would go on to Florida to raise more) in a signature lilac suit and strolled into the racially mixed crowd of Atlanta's Democratic elite.

She made her way through the crowd greeting many people by first name, smiling. "How was Paris?" she asked Ann Cox Chambers, a billionaire former ambassador, clutching her hand.

Ms. Pelosi ate nothing and even in casual conversation seemed to be reading from a script. One woman complained to her about Republican advertisements. "The Republicans are unconcerned about money, truth or decency," Ms. Pelosi said, staring into the woman's eyes while delivering one of her standard speech lines.

In her formal remarks over lunch, she forgot one line and stuffed it awkwardly into her close. "Thank — Are you ready for a Democratic victory? — you!"

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, said of Ms. Pelosi, "She smiles too much in public." Mr. Frank attributed her image problems with some people to "sexism, partly."

"She is an attractive woman who dresses very well and is soft spoken, from a generation that has a certain kind of softness," he said.

Ms. Pelosi was uninterested in talking about why some people seem angry that she wears expensive suits or make fun of her speaking style, and she said she found her sex an asset.

"Women are very excited about the prospect of a woman speaker," she said, sitting in the Lewises' living room.

Her campaign aides play down her ambition, denying that she ever planned to lead anything — an assertion Ms. Pelosi repeated in the interview.

But current and former associates describe her as infused with political aspirations almost from birth.

"She has always wanted to be speaker," said Tony Coelho, a former House Democratic whip. "She told me so 10 or 15 years ago."

Born and raised in Baltimore, Ms. Pelosi is a lifelong Democrat raised at the till of the "favor bank" developed by her father, Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., a congressman in the 1940s and the mayor of Baltimore during most of Ms. Pelosi's childhood.

Ms. Pelosi often mentions learning from her father's practice of keeping note of people he had helped and calling in stamp-licking, envelope-stuffing favors from them at election time.

Her family's fierce partisanship is legendary. When President Ronald Reagan was running for re-election against Walter Mondale, the president went to Baltimore to dedicate a monument. White House officials called Ms. Pelosi's mother to ask if they could collect Mr. D'Alesandro on the way.

Her mother replied, "After what he has done to poor people, he should not come to our house," Ms. Pelosi said in the interview here. "She made it clear that would not be happening."

Ms. Pelosi's version of the favor bank involves seeking money and support from Democratic officeholders, donors and organizations around the country. She makes it clear in phone conversations that she knows what their individual wishes may be, and that if they hope to see them attended to should "her candidates" take back the House, they need to pay upfront, several people whom she has contacted said.

"She's relentless," said a national union official, who said Ms. Pelosi had been calling in recent months, looking for money for campaigns and volunteers. The official, an admirer who spoke on the condition of anonymity because getting on Ms. Pelosi's bad side "ain't pretty," added, "She can really smell the goal line."

Ms. Pelosi married her husband, Paul, a millionaire real estate investor, in 1963. They moved to Mr. Pelosi's hometown, San Francisco, and had five children. From early in her married life, she began holding fund-raisers, for which she cooked the food and her children served it.

She rose quickly in the party, becoming chairwoman of the California Democratic Party. In 1983, when Phillip Burton, the congressman for the Fifth District in California, died, his wife, Sala, won an election to complete his term. But in 1987, Ms. Burton became ill with cancer, and she summoned her politically-powerful family to her deathbed to suggest Ms. Pelosi — who had recently lost a bid to become chairwoman of the national Democratic Party — to take her place.

"She saw a lot more than I did at that point about Nancy's leadership potential," said John Burton, a former state senator and Phillip's brother. "And she was more than right."

Ms. Pelosi's victory in that election came in part by coloring her competitor in the primary, Harry Britt, as too liberal. In every election since, she has been derided by her district's most liberal activists as not liberal enough.

That constituency is furious that she has been largely absent from the same-sex marriage fracas, voted to pay for the Iraq war and has refused to move to impeach Mr. Bush.

Code Pink, an antiwar group, has picketed her town hall meetings. "She represents one of the most progressive districts in the country," said Medea Benjamin, co-founder of the group. "We keep pulling her back to what we hope are her real roots."

That first campaign also presaged Ms. Pelosi's proclivity for sticking to her message, her ability to avoid being disarmed by her critics and her taste for retribution.

"The first time she ran for Congress, I was angry about people supporting her opponent," Mr. Burton said. "I was yelling and screaming and she would just go to another church bingo game. She said, 'Don't worry about it; some day they will realize how unimportant they really are.' And after it was over, she didn't do much for them."

Her voting record is among the most liberal in Congress. She gets an "A" from the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League and an "F" from the National Rifle Association. She favors alternative sentencing over prison construction, schools without prayer and death with taxes. She voted against the use of force in Iraq, though after the war started she voted to finance it.

In Ms. Pelosi's vision for those first 100 hours, a Democratic-led veto-proof majority would "drain the swamp of Washington," create a new rules package that would include pay-as-you-go budgeting, immediately adopt the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, increase the minimum wage to $7.25 and broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal money.

She also imagines cutting the interest rate on student loans and "ending tax giveaways for big oil."

Still, she has risen in the ranks by being not a voice of her party, but its able banker. When she campaigned for whip, she filled the Democratic Congressional war chest with $3 million, and she continues to curry favor by flipping through her Rolodex of the rich.

"She has the best personal fund-raising base of any candidate outside of a president," Mr. Burton said.

Ms. Pelosi seemed at her most comfortable — and polished — at a fund-raiser recently in the wealthy Bel Air section of Los Angeles, where she was introduced by the actress Annette Bening, serenaded by a folk guitarist and surrounded by the sort of women who know better than to wear high heels to a garden party.

Before walking into the backyard, Ms. Pelosi went to greet one young volunteer, the granddaughter of the hostess, and took her face gently into her hands and thanked her.

She then emerged, beaming at the crowd, largely female and many of a certain age, and announced, "At last we have a seat at the table."

Lobbyists Won't Like What Pelosi Has In Mind (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Odds are that lobbying in the House of Representatives is about to get harder.

DOJ_NMG_0087646

If Democrats gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House -- and most analysts think they will -- one of the first things the new House will do is restrict or end outright a slew of lobbying practices.

In a little-publicized statement, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the House Democratic leader, has promised to change the chamber's rules to reflect the provisions of her not-so-modestly-named Honest Leadership and Open Government Act of 2006. The months-old measure would, among other things, prohibit House members from accepting gifts and travel from lobbyists or from organizations that employ lobbyists.

The Pelosi bill includes changes not only to House rules but also to federal laws. Any changes in law would have to be approved by the Senate and the president before they could take effect. But the House can alter its own rules anytime, and that's precisely what Pelosi proposes to do as the House's first official act next year -- after it selects her as speaker.

Congress has come close to reining in lobbyists before, and it wound up doing nothing of the kind. Several of the proposals in Pelosi's bill (H.R. 4682, for you wonks out there) were wending their way through the system but died after lawmakers concluded -- incorrectly, it turned out -- that voters didn't care much about congressional "corruption." Pelosi's bill, with small modifications, was tested in the House and lost by just three votes.

Now, spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said, Pelosi is committed to passing "the elements within the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act that are within the House rules." Any variations from the original, Crider said, would be "slight."

That would be a major development for K Street. If the House rules were altered in ways that even came close to Pelosi's preferences, lobbying of House members would be changed significantly and immediately. The new rules would apply as soon as they were approved by a simple majority.

The Senate would be trickier. Election analysts say it's a tossup whether Democrats will control the Senate next year. If it does, Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid, said, "Ethics reform will be a priority." But he noted that a two-thirds vote of the Senate is needed to modify its rules, which would make a quick assault on lobbying difficult.

Not so in the House. The biggest change proposed by Pelosi would be the ban on gifts and travel. Pelosi would prohibit House members and their staff from using corporate jets for travel taken as part of their official duties. She would also prevent them from taking anything of value from lobbyists, including meals, tickets and entertainment.

The ban would apply not just to lobbyists' gifts but also to gifts from nongovernmental groups that hire lobbyists. House members and their aides would also be barred from accepting transportation or lodging for any trips that are funded, arranged, requested, planned or even attended by lobbyists.

These are all reactions to the Jack Abramoff scandal. Abramoff infamously took Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) on a golfing trip to Scotland on a private jet. The result was a series of convictions on fraud and public corruption charges against Ney, Abramoff and others in federal court this year.

In an attempt to slow the revolving door between the public and private sectors, Pelosi would deprive lawmakers-turned-lobbyists of a few of their congressional perks. She would eliminate the House rule that gives access to the House gym, the House floor and its cloak rooms to former members of Congress who are registered to lobby -- access that was temporarily taken away earlier this year.

Pelosi would also require House members and their aides to disclose to the House ethics committee whenever they are negotiating for jobs in the private sector. The disclosure would have to be made within three business days after the talks begin.

Because of the notorious Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska and other controversial pork barrel projects, reform-minded lawmakers have been pressing to make it more difficult to slip narrowly focused spending provisions into legislation. Taking up their cause, Pelosi would end the practice of adding such measures to bills after House-Senate negotiators have completed their work. She would also insist that bills be made available to the public at least 24 hours before they could be voted on by the full House; some types of bills would have to be available for three days.

In addition, Pelosi would broaden a rule change adopted by the House this year that would force lawmakers to disclose the sponsors of "earmarked" spending and tax measures -- and to reveal their details -- before the bills that contain them can become law.

The Pelosi bill would crack down on lobbyists directly by creating an Office of Public Integrity. The new agency, which would be overseen by the House inspector general, would audit and investigate lobbyists' periodic filings and refer any problems they find to the U.S. attorney's office. Currently there is little if any serious enforcement of lobbying-disclosure laws.

The Pelosi measure would also make it tougher for Congress to spend public money in ways that widen the budget deficit. She would bar the House from taking up major budget bills that increase the government's deficit, at least compared to the latest estimate from the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Pelosi would even stop the Democrats from doing what Republicans did to help solidify their majority -- at least when it comes to dealing with lobbyists. Republican leaders pressured major lobbying offices and trade associations in town to hire former Republican staffers and lawmakers in senior positions. That effort, known as the K Street Project, was designed to increase the flow of campaign contributions to Republican candidates and causes.

Pelosi would specifically prohibit House members from using their official actions to influence any employment decisions "on the basis of partisan political affiliation."

None of the provisions would be implemented until early next year, when the new Congress convenes. And if history is a guide, lobbyists and their lawmaker friends will probably manage to water down at least some of them before they come to a vote.

But if Democrats win a congressional majority in next week's elections, a leading reason will be the public's disgust with congressional ethics, or lack thereof. It would only make sense for the new leadership to respond by loosening the links that bind lawmakers and lobbyists.

Pelosi's Liberal Label Is All Relative (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — To much of the country, Nancy Pelosi is the liberal embodiment of a city as crazy as its near-vertical hills. But here at home, the Democratic House leader is seen as something else: sober, centrist and very much a part of the political establishment, for good or bad.

For five years, ever since she entered the congressional leadership, Pelosi has balanced the interests of 200-plus colleagues of varied philosophies with the demands of a district about as far left politically as it is geographically.

Now she is within hailing distance of history; if Democrats win control of the House on Nov. 7, she would be the first woman ever to serve as speaker.

Her success is all the more striking given the persistent through-the-looking-glass quality of San Francisco politics. Where else would Willie Brown be elected as the moderate candidate for mayor? Or dignitaries clamor for a place among the drag queens and genitalia celebrated in the annual Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Parade?

In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry won 62% of the presidential vote at home in Massachusetts. Here, he garnered 85%.

"If there's a stereotype of California as the 'Left Coast,' San Francisco is the epicenter," said pollster Mark DiCamillo.

"Many 'moderates' in San Francisco would be burned as witches elsewhere," agreed Alex Clemens, a local media and campaign consultant.

It is easy to lampoon San Francisco as the world's largest open-air asylum, as conservatives, in particular, are wont to do. On Nov. 7, the day the nation decides control of Congress, voters here will weigh an initiative making it official city policy to seek the ouster of President Bush and Vice President Cheney. This after the pair ignored a ballot measure two years ago demanding an immediate U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

But San Francisco is also a tough political town, more like New York or Boston than any West Coast city. Campaigns, a widely appreciated form of civic theater, are personal and often vicious.

The first time Pelosi, a longtime Democratic activist, ran for Congress, billboards across the city mocked her as "the party girl of the party." She squeaked to victory — thanks, in an exquisite footnote, to the crossover support of San Francisco's Republicans, who found Pelosi less objectionable than her even more liberal opponent.

Since that 1987 race, Pelosi has routinely won reelection with 80% or more of the vote, freeing her to travel the country and pay the dues needed to climb the congressional ladder — and, she hopes, elect enough Democrats in November to make her third in line to the presidency.

Not that everyone here welcomes the prospect. Even as Republicans across the country vilify Pelosi as the face of the lunatic left, here she faces the enmity of the fire-breathing liberals she supposedly represents. Only in San Francisco would Pelosi be picketed as a right-wing warmonger, as she was at a January town hall meeting overrun by protesters who jeered her refusal to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq. There is "always a group that you don't go far enough with," Pelosi said with a shrug a few days later.

Given the intensity of political combat, it is probably no accident that so many of California's elected leaders — from Hiram Johnson to Pat Brown to Dianne Feinstein — emerged from San Francisco's 47 square miles of volatility. (Sen. Feinstein, a liberal by most standards, is another politician seen by the San Francisco left as too cozy with business and a bit of a prig.)

"Every two blocks has its own special-interest group or political club or advocacy organization," said Clemens, exaggerating only slightly. "Those who survive tend to have thick skins, quick minds and a halfway decent sense of humor."

San Francisco, with its seafaring roots in the Gold Rush, has long been a harbor for those of a different ilk: the beatniks of North Beach, the hippies of Haight-Ashbury, the gays and lesbians who transformed the Castro district. But it was not always a Democratic fortress. Just about 30 years ago, a staunchly conservative city supervisor named John Barbagelata came within a whisker of being elected mayor in a brutal election widely viewed as a political watershed. He was defeated by liberal George Moscone, who threw City Hall open to women, gays and other disenfranchised minorities.

That, in turn, hastened the city's leftward shift, which continued even after Moscone's November 1978 assassination by Supervisor Dan White, an avenger of the city's fading old guard. "His mayoralty was the critical break point," said Richard DeLeon, an author and political scientist at San Francisco State University.

Pelosi, a Democratic fixture for nearly 40 years, represents everywhere but the southwest corner of the city. Chinatown, Nob Hill, North Beach and other landmarks are all part of her domain. Even as she built a national profile, her staff worked hard on the nuts and bolts of constituent service — chasing tardy Social Security checks and the like — helping secure Pelosi's hold on the district.

Pelosi has compiled a reliably liberal voting record over the years, supporting legal abortion with few restrictions, stiffer gun control, gay rights and a needle-exchange program to prevent the spread of AIDS. She opposed welfare reform and voted against the 1991 Persian Gulf War and the October 2002 resolution authorizing the invasion of Iraq.

But to critics on the left, Pelosi is a sellout who "can talk the talk [but] doesn't walk the walk," as her Green Party challenger, Krissy Keefer, states on her campaign website. Among the particulars: Pelosi's support for trade deals, commercial activity in the Presidio (part of Golden Gate National Recreation Area) and legislation cracking down on rave parties. On the war, Pelosi is faulted for endorsing an immediate pullout from Iraq but not pushing her view as the party's position — a move that would have surely jeopardized her leadership job.

"From Ohio, Pelosi looks liberal," Keefer said in an interview. But San Francisco has "a completely different paradigm and idea about how things should be."

If that perspective seems loopy to some, Eric Jaye — a consultant on Pelosi's first campaign — offered this: "While you have a certain component of San Francisco that a nation loves to fear, take comfort, America, in the fact those people don't like Nancy Pelosi either."

Menendez Has A Narrow Lead, But It's Kean N.J. Trusts (BCR)

By Herb Jackson

Bergen County Record, October 30, 2006

AP New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez addresses the crowd at a morning East Orange Democratic Fall breakfast at Nanina's in the Park in Belleville, N.J.

Complete results: The Record voter poll

Democrat Bob Menendez holds a six-point lead in the race for U.S. Senate even though more New Jersey voters like and trust Republican Tom Kean Jr., a poll by The Record found.

That may be because New Jerseyans, by a wide margin, want Democrats to control Congress in January, the poll also found.

"Any other political year, I think the Republicans win that seat," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, the Rockville, Md., firm that conducted the survey. "The only thing saving Menendez is the climate out there."

Menendez led Kean 48 percent to 42 percent in the survey of 600 likely voters taken Monday through Wednesday. Just 10 percent said they were very or somewhat likely to change their minds by Election Day.

The poll found the electorate sharply split by gender. Women preferred Menendez 52 percent to 37 percent, while Kean had a three-point edge among men. Kean also held a five-point lead in South Jersey, while Menendez had a 10-point lead in the more populous northern part of the state.

The poll's margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Menendez was appointed to the Senate in January after serving 13 years in the House, and has cast the campaign primarily as a referendum on President Bush and the war in Iraq, which he voted against in 2002. He has depicted Kean as a rubber stamp for Bush and countered attacks on his ethics by questioning Kean's fund-raising practices and votes in the state Legislature.

Kean, a state senator from Union County, has accused Menendez of lining his pockets with taxpayer money by collecting more than $300,000 in rent over nine years from a federally subsidized non-profit organization in Union City. Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed information about the lease, but Menendez says it was approved by House ethics attorneys.

The poll found voters believe Kean is more trustworthy by a 49 percent to 36 percent ratio, and they personally like Kean more than Menendez, 48 percent to 33 percent.

But even among people who consider Kean more trustworthy, 35 percent are voting for Menendez, apparently because other factors are more important.

Thirty percent of voters said the Iraq war was the most important issue in deciding their vote, compared with 10 percent who said corruption. Voters also want to see Democrats rather than Republicans control Congress -- by a margin of 18 percentage points, 53 percent to 35 percent.

To control the Senate, Democrats need to pick up six seats nationwide and not lose any. Menendez occupies the only vulnerable Democratic seat, political handicappers say, and both parties have spent millions of dollars on ads here in recent weeks.

Bush is very unpopular. In the poll, 37 percent said Bush was doing an excellent or good job as president, while 31 percent said he was doing a fair job and 32 percent said he was doing a poor job.

Early in the campaign, Republicans had hoped that raising the state sales tax would make Governor Corzine unpopular and voter anger at Trenton Democrats would drag Menendez down.

But the poll found that while Corzine is not popular, he's faring far better than Bush. Forty-four percent said Corzine is doing an excellent or good job, 38 percent a fair job and 10 percent a poor job.

Voters see both Senate candidates as flawed. The poll found 41 percent have a favorable opinion of Menendez while 38 percent have an unfavorable opinion. Kean's favorable/unfavorable ratio of 40 percent to 32 percent was slightly better.

When asked how they felt about the choice of candidates, 45 percent said they were very or somewhat satisfied, while 44 percent said they were not very satisfied or not at all satisfied.

"I don't think voters are crazy about either man," Ali said. "It's like voting for the lesser of two evils. They really want Democrats to take over, but really don't like Menendez."

Menendez spokesman Matthew Miller said voters "understand the stakes are high in this campaign.

"They're rejecting Tom Kean Jr.'s smears because they want a candidate who is talking about issues that matter to them, and who they know will stand up to George Bush and change the direction of the country."

Kean spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker said it continues to be a tight race, and argued Menendez should be doing better given the way voters feel about his party. She noted that until this weekend, Menendez had been spending more heavily than Kean on TV advertising, but the two candidates' airtime is going to be closer down the stretch.

"I think you're going to see numbers move a bit," Hazelbaker said. "We just started running some positive advertisements. As people are given more reasons to vote for Tom Kean, as they see him as a moderate, as independent, you're going to see numbers change from Menendez to Kean."

The poll found voters consider both candidates to have run equally negative campaigns, and most said TV advertising had not affected their choice. But among those who said their vote was swayed by the depictions in the ads of Menendez as corrupt and Kean as a rubber stamp, slightly more said they were inclined to vote against Menendez than against Kean.

That difference could be critical if the spread between the candidates was one or two percentage points, Ali said, "but you have to give the edge to Menendez.

"In spite of all his problems, his unfavorables, he's still ahead. If voters were going to make the jump to Kean, you'd think he'd be ahead by now," Ali said.

Poll: N.J. Democrat Leads Senate Race (AP-Y)

By Rebecca Santana

AP, October 30, 2006

Sen. Robert Menendez holds a slight lead over Republican Tom Kean Jr. in their Senate race with just over a week left before election day, a poll published Sunday found.

Democrat Menendez leads Kean 48-42 percent, according to a poll of 600 likely voters published Sunday in The Record of Bergen County.

Thirty percent of voters said the Iraq war was the most important issue in deciding their vote. Voters also want to see Democrats rather than Republicans control Congress, 53-35 percent.

President Bush remains unpopular, with only 37 percent saying he was doing an excellent or good job. Menendez's campaign strategy has been dominated by efforts to tie Kean to Bush administration policies, while Kean has painted Menendez as a corrupt politician.

"Any other political year, I think the Republicans win that seat," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, the Rockville, Md., firm that conducted the survey. "The only thing saving Menendez is the climate out there."

The poll said voters found Kean more trustworthy by a 49-36 percent ratio, and they personally like him more than Menendez, 48-33 percent. But of those voters who consider Kean more trustworthy, 35 percent are voting for Menendez because they feel other factors, such as the war in Iraq and putting Democrats back in control of Congress, are more important.

The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points. It was conducted by phone Oct. 23-25.

Gay Ruling May Boost N.J. Values Vote (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Last week's New Jersey Supreme Court decision granting recognition to same-sex couples could energize concerned values voters, some activists say, in a heavily Democratic state where Republican Tom Kean Jr. is making a strong challenge to Sen. Robert Menendez.

"There'll be a backlash," predicted Len Deo, president of New Jersey Family Policy Council. "I've been talking to friends, and they're bewildered by this decision. They're upset."

New Jersey's state Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that same-sex couples were treated unequally by the state and ordered the Legislature to correct this -- leaving open the question of whether the new status would be called "marriage." Richard J. Codey, Democratic president of the state Senate, told the Philadelphia Inquirer that the state will stop short of calling it "marriage."

But Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs at the Family Research Council, said the decision "could make a difference" for Mr. Kean, who said last week that he'd support a state constitutional amendment to protect traditional marriage. The amendment is being pushed by conservative groups.

But Larry Cirignano, executive director of CatholicVote.org said that both Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean are "hedging" on the complex issue and that values voters won't be energized unless they see a "champion" against same-sex "marriage" -- which neither candidate is.

"Unless the candidates make it an issue ... I don't see that it will have a huge impact," Mr. Cirignano said.

The hard-fought contest between Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean is one of the few Senate seats that Republicans think they can wrench away from Democrats next week. The National Republican Senatorial Committee recently purchased $3.5 million in ad time to help Mr. Kean in the final days.

Both candidates have said they support traditional marriage as between a man and a woman but oppose amending the federal Constitution to ban same-sex "marriage."

After last week's decision, however, Mr. Kean wasted no time in saying he'd support amending the state constitution to clarify that marriage should be between a man and a woman.

"I still believe that marriage is and should be between one man and one woman, and I would support an amendment to the state constitution reaffirming that definition," he said.

Mr. Menendez reiterated that he also believes marriage is between a man and a woman, but supports civil unions that afford same-sex couples full legal benefits.

"The Supreme Court affirmed those rights today, and it is now up to the Legislature to decide how they are to be administered," he said. "I will not support any constitutional amendment that takes away people's legal rights."

Mr. Cirignano said that neither of the candidates' positions are crystal clear and that "neither campaign is going to be out touting" the marriage issue with a little more than a week until the election, especially because it's difficult to gauge where the state electorate stands.

Indeed, both camps quickly shifted focus to other topics, with the Kean camp returning to corruption accusations against Mr. Menendez and Mr. Menendez attacking Mr. Kean over the Iraq war.

Democrat state lobbyist Rick Thigpen said Republicans have used same-sex "marriage" to rally their base in other states, but won't be able to do that in liberal New Jersey because Mr. Menendez's position doesn't present "a clear target for them to shoot at."

A Rutgers-Eagleton poll in June found that 49 percent of New Jerseyans support legalizing same-sex "marriage" and 44 percent oppose it.

New Jersey's Senate Race (NYT)

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

One of the first big decisions Jon Corzine had to make as governor of New Jersey was the appointment of a new senator to take his place in Washington. Mr. Corzine chose the less-than-charismatic Representative Robert Menendez, and as a result,

New Jersey has the only Senate race this fall in which a Democratic incumbent seems to be in any danger of defeat. Nevertheless, in his race with State Senator Thomas Kean Jr., there is no question that Mr. Menendez is the better choice.

The 38-year-old Mr. Kean, a son of the former New Jersey governor and co-chairman of the 9/11 commission, is the latest in what has become a very long line of second- and third-generation politicians hoping to achieve high office on the back of their parents' reputations. Many of his positions seem to come from a campaign playbook rather than conviction. He has called for the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld while failing to criticize President Bush for keeping Mr. Rumsfeld on.

Mr. Kean supports both balanced budgets and all of the administration's tax cuts. Except for vague promises to vote against pork and to be tough against corruption, he fails to suggest any budget reductions to deal with the deficit. He wants voters to believe he would practice his father's moderate brand of politics, but there is little to suggest he is much more than a conservative Republican who opposes drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Mr. Menendez, 52, shows a much better grasp of the issues. In the House, where he was the third-highest ranking Democrat, he was an accomplished legislator. He opposed the resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq, and he has been outspoken in criticizing the administration's conduct of the war.

Mr. Menendez has a history of ethical lapses that have been all too common for Democratic officials in New Jersey, especially for those, like him, who continue to take an active part in local party politics. If re-elected, the senator should make it clear he is giving up any role in the Hudson County Democratic organization. But Mr. Kean has gone so far overboard in criticizing the senator that he has attempted to use an episode in which Mr. Menendez actually fought corruption early in his career as an example of unethical behavior.

Mr. Kean actually has a couple of ethical blemishes of his own. In one case, he accepted thousands of dollars of campaign donations last year from executives of the Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance companies while on the same day voting with his party in the State Senate to maintain a tax exemption for the companies.

New Jersey voters have a choice between a lawmaker who has done a good job of representing the state's concerns and the nation's interests in the House and the Senate and a state legislator with a shallow grasp of the issues and a famous name. Our unqualified endorsement goes to Robert Menendez.

Kennedy Targets Klobuchar's Character In U.S. Senate Debate (KCS)

By Patrick Condon

The Kansas City Star, October 30, 2006

ST. PAUL - Republican U.S. Senate candidate Mark Kennedy questioned the honesty of his Democratic opponent Amy Klobuchar during a debate Sunday night, scaling up his rhetoric against her with ten days to go until the election.

Kennedy several times brought up the flap over a possibly stolen Kennedy ad that was leaked to the Klobuchar campaign, suggesting that Klobuchar waited several days before reporting the incident to the FBI; and what he claimed was the refusal of the Klobuchar-led Hennepin County Attorney's office to fully respond to Republican Party requests for information about the office's prosecution of criminals.

"If you won't give Minnesota voters straight answers on these issues, why should they trust you in the U.S. Senate?" Kennedy asked Klobuchar.

Klobuchar hit back by contrasting her response to the stolen ad to the response of Republican congressional leaders in the scandal surrounding disgraced U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, who recently resigned amid allegations of improper contact with underage House pages. Kennedy is a Republican U.S. House member, though he's had no connection with the Foley incident.

"When I found out someone not from our campaign had improperly taken an ad, I immediately reported it to the FBI," Klobuchar said. "That's more than I can say about the leadership of this Congress when they found out someone was soliciting pages."

Klobuchar fired her chief spokeswoman after she viewed the content of an unreleased TV ad for Kennedy that had been sent to the Klobuchar campaign by a liberal blogger.

Klobuchar said Kennedy's tack illustrated that his campaign is one of "attacks instead of ideas."

With the Foley affair and other congressional scandals generating headlines this election season, Kennedy also was asked during the debate if the Republican Party still represents American values.

"Yes, Republicans I believe do represent the values of Minnesotans," Kennedy replied. "Yes, there have been scandals, and some have been horrifying. Those involved need to be held accountable, and they are being held accountable. Some are in jail, and they deserve to be."

The televised debate, held at the University of St. Thomas, touched most often on the war in Iraq and homeland security. Kennedy, as he has in recent days, touted his support for the U.S. effort in that country, saying that mistakes have been made but that drawing down resources now would create a breeding ground for future terrorist attacks on American soil.

Klobuchar and Independence Party candidate Robert Fitzgerald both called for new strategies in Iraq. With Kennedy criticizing Klobuchar's calls for diplomacy as naive, she pointed out that even Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said recently that the solution must be "a political one. This country is in civil war," Klobuchar said.

Fitzgerald seized on his first opportunity to bring his upstart candidacy to TV viewers, having been excluded from the first TV debate two weeks ago on NBC's "Meet the Press." Fitzgerald said both candidates are too reliant on support from corporate donors and their own political parties.

"To think that either of these two is going to achieve meaningful reform is ludicrous," Fitzgerald said. "You don't put replacement parts into a broken machine."

The candidates are set for two more debates between now and Election Day, the next this Thursday in Rochester and the final one the following Sunday at the Fitzgerald Theater in downtown St. Paul.

Allen Credo Is Put To The Test (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

When Virginia legislators gathered around Gov. George Allen's kitchen table in 1994 and told the Republican they thought eliminating parole would never work, he dismissed their skepticism in plain terms: "Nothing's impossible."

It was that attitude and his work as governor that made national Republicans take notice and begin considering Mr. Allen, now a U.S. senator, as a 2008 presidential contender.

Mr. Allen, seeking a second term on Nov. 7, had hoped accomplishments such as parole abolition would define his candidacy and secure an easy re-election. Instead, calling an Indian-American staffer for Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. "macaca" this summer thrust the race into the national spotlight and made it a neck-and-neck contest.

"All this stuff he did as governor, it's absolutely unbelievable," said Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax Republican, who recalled the kitchen meeting. "But no one ever knows anything about that because all they hear about is 'macaca.' "

Mr. Allen has apologized and says he made up the word, adding he never would have used it had he known it was considered a racial slur in some cultures.

Still, the incident set in motion a chain of events that have kept the cowboy-boot-wearing Mr. Allen below 50 percent in the polls, despite his past popularity in Virginia and a more-than-20-year political career.

Some of Mr. Allen's former football teammates at the University of Virginia told reporters that as a young man he regularly used racial slurs to describe blacks, but Mr. Allen, 54, says the "N-word" was never part of his vocabulary, and most teammates say they never heard him use the term.

The tobacco-chewing senator is often teased for making too many football references during legislative speeches, but says the game has shaped his governing philosophy.

Mr. Allen says his father, the late famed Redskins coach George H. Allen, taught him the four "F's" -- faith, freedom, family and football.

Among those football lessons: "Get knocked down, get back up," and a player's ability to "catch, kick, punt or long snap" is more important than his background.

"You don't care about [players'] race, religion, their ethnicity, what college they went to," Mr. Allen says. "You care about whether they can help the team win. [Football is] a true meritocracy, where everyone has that equal opportunity to compete and succeed, based upon their own hard work, diligence and capabilities. That's what we should aspire to in our society."

That theory has led to Mr. Allen's own trademarked brand of politicking -- "commonsense Jeffersonian conservatism."

He says the ideals include limited government, low taxes and improving education to keep the United States globally competitive.

This year is the first time Mr. Allen, a former state lawmaker and congressman, has had to run a major race as the establishment candidate instead of as a reformer. That style helped him unseat two-term Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

Most Virginians remember Mr. Allen for his gubernatorial record -- parole abolition, welfare reform and working with a Democrat-controlled state legislature to create nationally recognized education standards.

His good-natured public disposition and record have attracted national attention and prompted 215 Washington insiders to choose him in an April 2005 National Journal poll as the most likely 2008 Republican presidential nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0087653

Supporters lauded his "Reagan-like" appeal and said he was one of few Southern politicians with "the experience and charisma to become a national candidate."

But 177 Republican and Democratic insiders in a recent National Journal poll agreed that he has run the worst campaign of any Senate candidate this fall.

"This one-time presidential wannabe has ushered himself off the national stage, and he will be lucky to win re-election," one Republican said. "Should have been a slam dunk in Virginia."

Mr. Allen further complicated his re-election bid when he said a reporter asking about his Jewish heritage was making "aspersions." The next day, he acknowledged his maternal grandfather was Jewish.

Mr. Allen says he learned to be tough by spending summers on a cattle ranch as a young man. While there, he learned the Western way with horses, "breaking them fast and hard in the mud and sand," and an Eastern way, with "a cube of sugar and an apple."

He was employing the Western way when he said of the Democrats who controlled the legislature in the 1990s: "Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whiny throats."

Mr. Allen's younger sister, Jennifer, in her 2000 book "Fifth Quarter," portrays her oldest brother as a bully unafraid of roughing up his siblings.

Passages from the book are often cited as examples of Mr. Allen's character, but critics usually don't mention his sister's depiction of him as a star student, or that he set out a chair in honor of his late father at his gubernatorial inauguration.

Mr. Allen has dismissed the questions of his character as a liberal smear and says if the election is decided on the issues and his record, he will beat Mr. Webb, 60, a decorated Vietnam veteran and former secretary of the Navy under President Reagan.

Webb Of Deception (WT)

By Milton R. Copulos

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

In this age of political cynicism, it is unremarkable that a politician would change his position on an issue, or even take conflicting positions. But Jim Webb's transformation from the nominally conservative Republican who served as the Reagan administration's secretary of the Navy to a left-wing Democratic Senate candidate rivals St. Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus. Divine intervention, of course, is one possibility. A more likely explanation, however, is that the public persona Mr. Webb presents is actually a fabrication, as carefully crafted as any character in the novels he has penned.

The shift is truly remarkable. He once refused to shake John Kerry's hand, and in a 2004 USA Today editorial wrote that his 1971 Senate testimony had "defamed a generation of honorable men." Now he trumpets Mr. Kerry's endorsement. He once called the Clinton Administration among "the most corrupt" in modern history in one of many attacks aimed at the former president. Now he has Bill Clinton host a fundraiser. Mr. Webb served in one of the most conservative administrations in American history. Today, he has embraced the entire agenda of the Democratic Party's far-left wing.

In fairness, Mr. Webb has remained extremely consistent on some issues. One example is his disdain for women in military service. When his 1979 article "Women Can't Fight" and its impact on the treatment of women at the United States Naval Academy became a major campaign issue, Mr. Webb quickly countered with claims that when serving as Secretary of the Navy he "opened up more billets" (e.g. military specialties) to women than any of his predecessors. What he fails to note in heralding this accomplishment was that it occurred under duress.

The truth is that Sens. William Proxmire, William Cohen and John McCain had all informed Mr. Webb that legislation forcing the Navy to open more billets to women would be forthcoming if the action was not taken independently. Moreover, Maryland Rep. Beverly Byron had already introduced legislation (H.R. 3786) that would mandate just such changes. So, the expansion of opportunities for women was not the result of some epiphany, but rather an instance of Mr. Webb simply yielding to congressional pressure.

A perhaps more revealing indication of his true feelings at that time was his attempt to forestall construction of a Vietnam Women's Memorial. In 1987, the addition to the existing memorial of a statue to recognize the service of women in Vietnam had become a matter of controversy. Jim Webb, then Secretary of the Navy, contacted Interior Secretary Don Hodel, saying that as a member of the administration, he wanted to discuss the proposed change. A Hodel undersecretary, Earl Gjelde, was given the job of responding to the query.

I found out about this when Mr. Hodel, who was inclined to approve the addition, called me to ask my opinion. He also asked that I call Mr. Gjelde about Mr. Webb's call. I explained that since my mother had held ID card #1008 in the Women's Auxiliary Army Corps in World War II, and my mother-in-law had been in the nurse cadet corps, I could hardly object to recognizing the wartime service of any woman. Besides, having spent several years in military hospitals, I deeply appreciated the contribution of women in uniform, particularly nurses.

When I reached Mr. Gjelde, I understood why I had been asked to make the call. He was appalled at Mr. Webb's attitude and comments. First, Mr. Webb was incensed that Mr. Hodel had not called him back personally, arguing that since he was a service secretary, the secretary of the interior, not his deputy, should have responded. After mollifying Mr. Webb, they got to the real issue. Mr. Webb listed his reasons for opposing the change.

First, he argued, "only" (his characterization) 10,000 women served in Vietnam. Moreover, "Only" eight died. Finally, women did not serve in combat. In his typically understated fashion, Mr. Gjelde said he found the comments "inappropriate." The question on both our minds was: Where was Mr. Webb's arbitrary line? Would it be 25,000 serving? Or would it be 50,000 or 100,000? Would it require that at least 50 have been killed, or 100 or 1,000? While it was true that women did not carry rifles in the jungle, they dealt daily with the carnage that came with combat. This included broken and torn 19-, 20- and 21-year-old bodies, some of which would never again be whole. Further, the field hospitals and bases they served in were just as vulnerable to rocket attack as any other post. Perhaps in the macho world according to Jim Webb that sort of stress didn't warrant recognition, but in mine it certainly did.

Ironically, Mr. Webb often noted that his second wife, a remarkable and accomplished woman, had been a military nurse in order to refute charges that he was disdainful of women in uniform. This fact makes his opposition to the women's memorial even more revealing, and even more shameful.

Milton R. Copulos served as one of the four members of the sculpture selection panel that chose the statue added to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

Md. Senate Rivals Spar On Iraq, Abortion (MERCN)

By Kristen Wyatt

The San Jose Mercury News, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rivals in Maryland's closely watched Senate race sparred over Iraq, abortion and stem cell research on Sunday, with the Republican saying the war is "a mess" and states should decide abortion rights.

Michael Steele, the Republican lieutenant governor, said the situation in Iraq was not President Bush's fault and he faulted the Pentagon for poor planning.

"There's not a great deal of confidence on the ground that we can get this thing done," Steele said. "The Department of Defense did not give the president the kind of strategy to win this war." Asked where the war stood now, he replied, "I think the war in Iraq stands with a mess we have to fix."

Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin repeated his opposition to the war - he voted against authorizing the use of force - but said he opposed a deadline for withdrawal.

Cardin has said he thinks U.S. troops could be withdrawn by 2007, but said during the debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the date is a goal, not a deadline.

"I don't believe in a time schedule," Cardin said. He said some troops should come home immediately while the U.S. regroups and tries to find other countries as partners in stabilizing Iraq.

"It is reasonable to believe our troops could be out by the end of 2007," he said.

Steele and Cardin are competing for the seat left open by retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes in predominantly Democratic Maryland. Democrats must gain six seats to take control of the Senate.

A poll released Sunday by The Washington Post had Cardin leading Steele by 11 percentage points.

Steele, a conservative Catholic, would not say whether he would vote for a constitutional amendment banning abortion, saying abortion was not an issue for the federal government to decide.

"I think Roe v. Wade is a matter that should've been left up to the states," Steele said.

Cardin said abortion should remain legal and that he would have opposed the nomination of the newest Supreme Court justice, Samuel Alito. While Alito worked in the Reagan administration, he wrote a memo that said there was no constitutional right to an abortion.

The candidates also clashed on embryonic stem cell research. Steele defended his television ad in which his sister, who has multiple sclerosis, calls a Cardin ad tasteless because it airs an endorsement from actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease.

Steele repeated that he opposes funding for stem cell research that kills a human embryo and said he would like to see unused embryos at fertility clinics be used in adoptions rather than discarded.

"We could set up adoptions for those embryos," Steele said. He said embryonic stem cell research is "not fully developed" and should not be funded.

Cardin repeated his support for federal funding of the research. It holds promise for advocates of patients with a variety of illnesses because of the cells' potential to transform into any type of human tissue, perhaps leading to new treatments.

Meanwhile, Steele was questioned about whether he tries to distance himself from the president.

"I'm not running away from George Bush. I'm not running toward George Bush. I'm running for the United States Senate," Steele said.

Cardin said Congress should have investigated whether the president overstepped the law with his domestic wiretapping program. "Congress needs to exercise its oversight function," Cardin said.

An independent candidate in the race, Kevin Zeese, was not invited to the debate. The Cardin-Steele debate, their fourth meeting, may be the last before election day, though Cardin's camp said it was possible they would meet again Friday.

Debate Puts Steele On Defense (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Republican Michael S. Steele struggled to soften his long-held views on touchstone social issues yesterday after being challenged repeatedly on his conservative beliefs during his final televised debate in the campaign for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat.

The debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" put on display the stark differences between Steele and Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin as they enter their final week of campaigning.

The two spent half the debate clashing on the war in Iraq -- with Steele saying the conflict "has been worth it to the extent that what we're trying to establish there is a beachhead of democracy." Cardin called it a "tragedy" and urged a gradual pullout of troops.

But the most dramatic exchanges came when host Tim Russert pressed Steele about his opposition to abortion and embryonic stem cell research, and about his long-standing support for President Bush. Such views don't typically sit well in heavily Democratic Maryland, and they have gone largely unmentioned by Steele during his year on the campaign trail.

The lieutenant governor responded by telling Russert that he would not support a constitutional amendment to ban abortion and would support research conducted on embryonic stem cells, so long as the embryo is not destroyed.

When Russert asked him, "Are you running as a proud Bush Republican?" Steele replied pointedly, "I'm a proud Republican."

This marked the first time in a series of debates that Steele has appeared on the defensive. During a televised forum last week, it was Cardin who was put on the spot about the route of Metro's proposed Purple Line and, more broadly, his knowledge of key issues in the Washington suburbs.

Cardin, a 10-term congressman from the Baltimore area, appeared nervous at times yesterday but stuck to a series of talking points about his consistent opposition to the president and the war.

Steele's answers showcased what has been a slow drift from his conservative moorings. It's a shift that in part owes to the realities of campaigning in a state where two-thirds of all voters support abortion rights and only one-third approve of President Bush's job performance, according to a Washington Post poll published yesterday.

"Steele got caught between his base and the deep blue sea," said Walter Ludwig, a Democratic consultant who advised Kweisi Mfume in the primary. "It's tough for him because he knows that if he says what he really thinks, that's not what voters of Maryland really want."

Steele acknowledged after the debate that he has undergone something of a transformation. In February, he likened embryonic stem cell research to Nazi experimentation, later apologizing for the remarks. And he campaigned fiercely for Bush in 2004.

"Have I moved off of my philosophical orientation on these issues? The answer is no," Steele said. "But I have learned to listen to the people. . . . In that sense, I have grown."

Carol Hirschburg, a GOP political consultant, said Russert's selection of such topics -- abortion and stem cell research rather than taxes or homeland security -- "were not designed to favor a Republican." She said it highlighted the difficulty Steele faces, especially when Cardin consistently tries to link him to the unpopular president. The Post poll showed Steele trailing Cardin by 11 percentage points.

"The challenge Michael faces, which I think he has handled extremely adroitly, is that he has to make the campaign about him and what kind of human being he is, and that he can be trusted by the people to do what he thinks is the right thing," Hirschburg said.

If the race were merely a contest of personalities, the Post poll shows, Steele would fare better. By 2 to 1, likely voters said they found the lieutenant governor more appealing than Cardin. Even Democrats said that was clear during the debate, with Steele appearing engaging while Cardin was sober and restrained.

When pressed, Steele tried to use humor to diffuse awkward moments, as when Russert played a clip of Steele forcefully endorsing Bush at the 2004 Republican National Convention and read news clips saying Steele was recruited to run by Bush strategist Karl Rove and Vice President Cheney.

"I've been outed," Steele said, laughing. "Okay, everybody, I'm a Republican."

Russert was undeterred, holding up a Steele bumper sticker that read, "Steele Democrat."

"That's not truth in advertising," Russert said.

"You've never heard of 'Reagan Democrats?' " Steele responded.

"It doesn't say, 'I'm a Steele Democrat.' It says 'Steele Democrat.' "

At times, Steele attempted to take on the role of moderator, directly challenging Cardin, for instance, on a vote against stem cell research. The bill would have required the National Institutes of Health to conduct the research without destroying embryos.

In the House, all of Maryland's Democrats and Republican Wayne T. Gilchrest joined in voting against the measure. In the Senate, though, the bill was passed with the support of both of Maryland's Democrats.

"What do Senator [Paul S.] Sarbanes and Senator [Barbara A.] Mikulski not know that you know, that caused them to vote for it, and you against it?" asked Steele, who sat elbow-to-elbow with Cardin.

Cardin responded that the vote "would do nothing at all to advance embryonic stem cell research," and that the Senate backed it as part of a compromise bill.

On the same topic, Russert asked Steele whether his opposition to destroying embryos for research would extend to fertility clinics that routinely discard embryos not used in pregnancies.

"I won't close down the fertility clinics," Steele said, but would "pursue options that would allow us to look at adoption."

Among the most jarring moments came when Russert confronted Steele on contradictions from past statements.

For instance, Russert asked Steele whether he still considers Clarence Thomas a hero. Steele replied that he has disagreed with the black Supreme Court justice on a number of issues, including affirmative action.

"I strongly support affirmative action," Steele said, an assertion Russert quickly disputed.

"No, I've always supported affirmative action," Steele said sternly.

"Well, if we go back in 1991, we've got a program here called 'Affirmative Action That Doesn't Work,' 'Affirmative Action's Become a Race-Based Quota Formula,' " Russert said.

"That's -- but that's not the same as saying, 'I don't support it," Steele responded.

Russert also pressed Steele on whether he would support a constitutional amendment to outlaw abortion. At first, Steele said, "I don't think that's been proposed."

When Russert corrected him, Steele said he would not and believes laws on abortions should be left to the states.

After the debate, Steele said, "Everyone knows I'm a pro-life Roman Catholic. The idea of tinkering with the constitution goes against my sensibilities."

Douglas Stiegler, executive director of the socially conservative Family Protection Lobby, said Steele's answers did not concern him. "It sounds like he's trying not to get into that debate," Stiegler said. "From a political standpoint, I don't blame him."

Russert also pressed Cardin on abortion, asking about his vote against requiring minors to consult parents about the procedure.

"Parents should be involved in their children, absolutely," Cardin said. "The problem is you don't want it to become an obstacle, particularly where there has been family abuse. . . . You don't want it used as a way of preventing a child from getting the necessary medical attention."

Half of the one-hour show was devoted to the public's growing unease with the Iraq war.

Russert opened the show with a litany of Steele's shifting statements on the war and later asked Cardin to defend his suggestion that he would consider cutting off money for the war to force President Bush to withdraw troops.

Steele acknowledged that the war has "frustrated the American people" but said that even knowing what he knows today, "I would think we'd still prosecute the war."

Russert then presented Cardin with his own words from a newspaper article that suggested he would be willing to cut off money for troops in Iraq.

"You would vote to cut off funding for our troops while the war is going on?" Russert asked.

"No, I will never support turning our backs on our troops," Cardin said, adding that he would consider using the appropriations process to put pressure on the president to present a detailed war plan.

Steele Regrets The Race Issue Not Mentioned In Cardin Debate (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin debated yesterday on national television about the Iraq war, the Republican Party and stem-cell research, but the decisive role that black voters will play in Maryland's U.S. Senate race was not mentioned.

"I would have liked to spent a little more time on ... an attitude in this campaign, where race has come into play," Mr. Steele, a Republican, said after appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," the country's top-ranked Sunday morning political show.

Mr. Steele, who in 2002 became the first black person elected to a statewide office in Maryland, must win over black Democratic voters to overcome the Democrats' 2-to-1 advantage in registered voters. That's possible, say the state's black leaders, because Democrats have taken their vote for granted.

"Meet the Press" host Tim Russert asked pointed, detailed questions about plans for U.S. troops in Iraq, stem-cell research, abortion, judicial nominees and whether Mr. Steele was a "proud Bush Republican."

But Mr. Russert did not ask about the prospect of black Democrats, who make up about 40 percent of the state party, crossing party lines to vote for Mr. Steele.

"I don't do horse-race questions," Mr. Russert told The Washington Times. "Black voters have the same concerns as white voters, when it comes to the war in Iraq, stem-cell research, abortion, Supreme Court."

Mr. Russert also said it was important to know "whether this was a referendum on George W. Bush, and whether Michael Steele was running away from him."

He asked Mr. Steele about "Steele Democrat" bumper stickers and whether he was "running away" from President Bush.

Mr. Steele, 48, said he was not running away from the president.

"That's exactly what Ben Cardin wants this race to be about," he said. "When this race is about Democrats and Republicans ... all they have to say is, 'The bogeyman is Republican.' "

Mr. Cardin's two-pronged campaign strategy has been to portray Mr. Steele as an ally of President Bush and to run on his record as a 10-term congressman to prove he knows how to "get things done" in Congress.

A Democratic memo last spring advised Maryland Democrats to "knock Steele down" by tying him to President Bush, turning Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Mr. Cardin's primary win over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was by a small margin because Mr. Mfume overwhelmingly won in Prince George's County and Baltimore city, where black Democrats make up most of the electorate.

The televised debate was a more favorable setting for Mr. Cardin, 63, than a debate Wednesday in which Green Party candidate Kevin B. Zeese, 51, and a free-for-all atmosphere put Mr. Cardin on the defensive.

Mr. Cardin declined to appear at a debate Thursday with Mr. Steele and Mr. Zeese before the Charles County NAACP, citing previously scheduled events.

Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin may debate one more time this Friday before the Collective Banking Group, a group of black pastors in Prince George's County.

Some Democrats thought Mr. Steele received favorable treatment from Mr. Russert.

"Russert treated you very unfairly," Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski told Mr. Cardin before a rally in Montgomery County. "He let Steele go on these monologues and he cut you off too many times, but you held your own."

On Iraq, Mr. Russert asked Mr. Steele whether he had a firm position, pointing out statements he has made that have contradicted one another.

Mr. Steele said the U.S. government should pressure the Iraqi government to take responsibility for its country. If that does not work, he said, then in 60 to 90 days, the U.S. should "evaluate whether it is ... worth sacrificing another American life for a cause that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi people do not themselves believe in."

Pulling U.S. troops out "would be on the table, absolutely," Mr. Steele said.

Mr. Russert pressed Mr. Cardin on a comment he made in the Baltimore Sun this month that he would be open to cutting off funding for U.S. troops.

Mr. Cardin said he would "never support turning our backs on our troops."

Mr. Cardin also said the war in Iraq is a civil war and "not a war on terror." He denied ever calling for a timetable to withdraw troops, though he has said "it is reasonable" to expect all U.S. troops to be out by the end of 2007.

Mr. Steele said the war "has been worth it to the extent that what we're trying to establish there is a beachhead of democracy." He also said that he would have voted to invade Iraq, even knowing all he does now.

Mr. Cardin reiterated his support for embryonic stem-cell research, while Mr. Steele again said he supports all types of stem-cell research except for embryonic.

Mr. Cardin said he has "supported" anti-cloning legislation. However, Douglas Johnson, legislative director of National Right to Life, said Mr. Cardin has twice voted against bills that would have banned cloning, in 2001 and 2003.

Mr. Russert asked Mr. Steele whether he would vote for a constitutional amendment to ban abortion, and Mr. Steele said he would not.

A Washington Post poll released yesterday showed Mr. Cardin leading Mr. Steele by 11 points. However, two polls in the last week have shown the race to be a dead heat, and the Cook Political Report on Friday switched the race from a likely Democratic retention to a tossup.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele are vying to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat.

O'Malley, Party Try To Stir Base Vote (WP)

By Steve Vogel And John Wagner

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley looked at the sea of enthusiastic Democratic supporters at a Silver Spring high school yesterday and was quick to lay claim to his roots.

"It's great to be back in Montgomery County, my home county," O'Malley, who grew up in Bethesda and Rockville, said at the outset of his remarks at a rally at Montgomery Blair High School.

Both Democrats and Republicans are pouring time and resources into capturing votes in Maryland's most populous county, and any hometown claim a candidate can make cannot hurt.

With 273,234 registered Democrats in Montgomery -- more than twice the 125,534 Republicans -- it is a battle the Democrats can feel comfortable about winning. But the margin of victory will probably play a large role in determining the outcome of both O'Malley's gubernatorial race against Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and the U.S. Senate race between Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Ehrlich and Steele appeared in the county last week and say they hope to improve on their performance in 2002.

Yesterday's rally -- held before several hundred cheering and sign-waving supporters -- was part of an effort to mobilize the Democratic base and to reach out to Democratic voters who do not normally vote in non-presidential election years. O'Malley was joined by all of the statewide candidates, including Cardin, as well as a large roster of county Democrats.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, appearing with O'Malley for the first time since he dropped out of the Democratic primary for governor in June citing depression, was given a rousing welcome. In his remarks, Duncan criticized a new television ad for Ehrlich that includes disparaging remarks the county executive made about O'Malley before dropping out of the race.

Duncan called the ad an attempt to "mislead the public" into believing he supported Ehrlich. "If they got quotes from me about Ehrlich, you couldn't print them," Duncan added.

Ehrlich, who was shown to be trailing O'Malley by 10 percentage points in a Washington Post poll published yesterday, said his campaign was making a vigorous play for the Montgomery vote.

"People tend to look at Prince George's County and Montgomery County as places a Republican is just not going to win," Ehrlich said Thursday during a visit to a Wheaton police station, where he announced funding for programs to track sexual predators. "However, you still need to hit your targets in order to win."

Although Republicans acknowledge that it is impractical to expect to win a majority of votes in Montgomery, they want to do better than in the last election, when Ehrlich won 38.3 percent of the vote against former lieutenant governor Kathleen Kennedy Townsend (D).

"We've picked up," Ehrlich said. However, the Post poll of 1,000 likely voters yesterday showed Ehrlich with no greater support in the Washington suburbs than he had in 2002.

But Ehrlich said the endorsement he received last week from the Washington Post might help him win over voters in the Washington suburbs. The governor said his positions on the environment, education and transportation -- including the intercounty connector -- have won him support.

"Last time, it was a very tough thing," Ehrlich said. "I was a Baltimore area congressman, unknown around here, running against Bobby Kennedy's daughter in the Washington suburbs. This time, I've spent a lot of time here."

O'Malley portrayed the governor yesterday as out of touch with the Montgomery electorate, hammering Ehrlich for saying two years ago that multiculturalism is "bunk."

"Anybody who doesn't think multiculturalism is good for America, come to Montgomery County," O'Malley said.

Democrats are hoping the presence of two Montgomery candidates on the statewide ticket -- State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, the nominee for attorney general, and Del. Peter Franchot, the nominee for comptroller -- will bring out voters who will also support O'Malley and Cardin.

In an effort to blunt the impact of the Post poll, Ehrlich's campaign sent a memo to supporters via e-mail suggesting the contest was much tighter. It said the most recent survey conducted by Ehrlich's pollster found O'Malley leading Ehrlich 46 percent to 45 percent. One percent favored third-party candidates, the memo said, and 8 percent were undecided.

"We are sending this information to you because we are convinced that recent public polls have been wildly off the mark and run counter to what we have been seeing," the Ehrlich campaign e-mail said.

Meanwhile, O'Malley won the endorsement of the Baltimore Sun yesterday. The Democratic candidate also touted the results of the Post poll. In an appearance in Arbutus, Ehrlich's home town, O'Malley acknowledged that polls are only "snapshots in time."

"The nice thing about this snapshot is it's only nine days out and we're 10 points up," O'Malley said.

His comments came at an event where O'Malley won the endorsements of two former leaders of Democrats for Ehrlich, a group formed in 2002 to support the then-congressman.

"I am ashamed, embarrassed and feel very foolish for what I did," said Wayne Frazier, the group's former chairman.

Unregulated Groups Wield Millions To Sway Voters (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

— Unions, corporations and wealthy individuals have pumped nearly $300 million this year into unregulated political groups, funding dozens of aggressive and sometimes shadowy campaigns independent of party machines.

The groups, both liberal and conservative, air TV and radio spots, conduct polls, run phone banks, canvass door-to-door and stage get-out-the-vote rallies, with no oversight by the Federal Election Commission. Set up as tax-exempt "issue advocacy" committees, they cannot explicitly endorse candidates. But they can do everything short of telling voters how to mark their ballots.

Because they can accept unlimited donations from any source, the committees — known as 527s — have emerged as the favored vehicle for millionaires and interest groups seeking to set the political agenda.

"It's become the new way to do business in politics," said Pete Maysmith, a national director of Common Cause, a nonprofit that lobbies for more transparency in campaign finance.

Named for a section of the IRS code, 527s have been around for years but became a political force in 2004 after the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 — also known as the McCain--Feingold Bill — limited donations to political parties. Groups such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth on the right and America Coming Together on the left contributed $600 million that year, with a heavy focus on the presidential race.

The cash flow is lower this year because it's a midterm campaign, but 527s and a related type of organization known as 501(c)s have expanded their reach. With the Nov. 7 election days away, the groups are flooding the airwaves in state and local races as well as congressional contests.

By far the largest chunk of unregulated money — nearly $60 million — comes straight out of union treasuries and is used mostly to benefit Democratic candidates and causes. Conservatives are fighting back with multimillion-dollar donations from a California TV executive and the Texas developer who financed the Swift Boat ads.

In California, unregulated funds — mostly donated by New York developer Howard S. Rich — are bankrolling the campaign for Proposition 90, which would limit the government's ability to seize private property. In Missouri, such money paid for a celebrity-studded TV ad opposing a ballot initiative on stem-cell research.

In Ohio, a 527 has run some of the most provocative radio spots of the campaign season, with an African American announcer accusing Democrats of "decimating our people" by promoting abortions of "black babies." Another group funded by black Republicans has bought airtime on radio stations in Maryland and Florida to assert that Democrats "have bamboozled blacks" and want to keep them in poverty.

'Yeah, right'

Here in eastern Colorado, a 527 called Coloradans for Life has raised more than $1 million to oppose Republican Rep. Marilyn N. Musgrave — spending nearly as much on the race as the Democratic candidate. A radio ad championing "the unborn" gave many voters the impression the group was an anti-abortion organization attacking Musgrave from the right. In fact, it's funded by three millionaire liberals.

At a recent reception for rural Republicans, chiropractor Philip Pollock rushed up to Musgrave to complain about what he called the "underhanded, back-door" tactic.

"I just heard those ads. Coloradans for Life — totally ridiculous," he said. "What happened to ... campaign finance reform?"

"You mean getting the big money out of politics?" Musgrave asked.

Pollock shook his head in disgust. "Yeah, right."

The campaign finance reforms that took effect for 2004 limit individuals to about $100,000 in total contributions to all candidates, parties and political action committees per election cycle. Parties and PACs remain extremely influential. PACs, for instance, are expected to funnel more than $1 billion to candidates this year by bundling contributions from trial lawyers, beer wholesalers, pharmaceutical makers and other groups.

But more than 70 individuals have maxed out their PAC and party contributions; If they want to pump more cash into the election, they must donate to 527s and 501(c)s. Many prefer that approach because they can control how the money is used.

The 501(c) groups do not have to disclose donors or itemize spending. The 527s must report donors and expenses, but the groups are often ephemeral, forming under a generic name for a few months and then dissolving. That makes it all but impossible to sort through IRS filings and pick out which organizations will get involved in which races. By law, these groups cannot coordinate their activity with candidates.

"The first warning you have is often when you see their ad on TV," said Robert Duffy, a political scientist at Colorado State University who tracks the groups. "These 527s throw a whole lot of unpredictability into campaigns."

In 2004, Democrats dominated 527 fundraising, led by financier George Soros and insurance magnate Peter B. Lewis, who each contributed more than $23 million. This year, Soros and others are focused instead on long-term party-building efforts, such as strengthening liberal think tanks and building a national voter database.

Two Republicans now top the donors' list compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonprofit research firm based in Washington.

Homebuilder Bob Perry, who financed the Swift Boat ads, has pumped $5 million into TV ads attacking Democratic congressional incumbents in Georgia, Iowa and Oregon as tax-and-spend liberals. GOP backer A. Jerrold Perenchio, who owns the Spanish-language television network Univision, has spent $5 million on ads in Missouri and Ohio featuring images of terrorism and warnings about those who would "cut and run" in Iraq.

Here in Colorado, the 527 targeting Musgrave is funded by siblings Patricia Stryker and Jon L. Stryker, billionaire heirs to a medical-supply fortune, and by Tim Gill, a software developer.

They bankrolled a similar effort in 2004, with TV ads that portrayed Musgrave picking soldiers' pockets as an announcer accused her of voting to cut veterans' benefits.

Their TV campaign this year has been far less dramatic but still controversial, accusing Musgrave of cutting a program that protects clean drinking water. In fact, Musgrave did not vote on that issue, though she has cast other votes that environmentalists say would weaken water protection.

Thanks, but no thanks

Musgrave's Democratic challenger, Angie Paccione, watched the water ad with a sinking heart. Like many candidates, she regards 527s as a mixed blessing. The independent group has undoubtedly given her campaign a boost; when the national Democratic Party canceled $630,000 worth of TV ads in the district, Patricia Stryker wrote a check for $720,000 to keep anti-Musgrave spots on the air.

But Paccione has no control over the message. Attacks such as the pickpocket dramatization could alienate voters. She considers ads like the one on water a waste of money.

"Clean drinking water?" Paccione said. "Holy smokes! There's a litany of things you could do against Marilyn Musgrave. Clean drinking water is not one of them."

Paccione's own ads portray Musgrave as a conservative ideologue.

A lawsuit pending in federal court aims to rein in 527 activity. But political analysts say they don't expect much to change, even if the case succeeds.

"Political money is like water. It will find an outlet," said Jeffrey M. Berry, a political science professor at Tufts University. "If 527s are banned, will another vehicle pop up? Absolutely."

Party Chiefs Debate Voter Motivation (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Democratic and Republican party leaders continue to debate which issues -- and scandals -- will drive voters to the polls next week for midterm elections.

"I think that there will be different issues in different districts," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation." "There are two kinds of overriding issues that seem to be applying in most districts, and one is the question of whether Americans want to see their taxes go up. ... The other question is, 'What do we do in the war on terror?' "

During his own CBS appearance, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said his party would not raise taxes on all Americans and promised to fight a "smarter" war on terrorism.

"We have no intention of raising taxes except on the people who have got enormous tax breaks, like the oil companies, from the Republicans," Mr. Dean said. "We need a minimum wage [increase]. America needs a raise. The Congress has gotten their raises, but the American people haven't gotten theirs."

Mr. Dean denied Republican accusations that his party would try to impeach President Bush if it wins control of Congress.

"I think that is also a scare tactic," he said.

Meanwhile, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said he doesn't think the Mark Foley congressional page scandal will hurt Republicans at the ballot box.

"The House ethics committee is doing a very good investigation in a bipartisan way. I was happy to meet with them, and I believe that they'll have a report coming soon," the Ohio Republican said on ABC's "This Week." "What the American people want to know is who is going to take care of them when it comes to lowering their taxes, securing our borders and providing the president with the tools to fight the terrorists?"

Mr. Boehner acknowledged that Iraq is a prominent issue but said it won't work in the Democrats' favor. "We don't have a national election. And all these big national polls that show the trends don't mean anything because what we have are 435 individual races all around the country, local candidates running on local issues."

The two sides also debated the motives behind a campaign advertisement run in the U.S. Senate race in Tennessee. Critics said the ad, run against Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a black Democrat, has racist overtones. The ad was pulled after criticism from both parties.

"The ad that you are talking about is an ad that is being run independently of the Republican National Committee," Mr. Mehlman said.

Mr. Ford told "Fox News Sunday" that he thinks the ad is racist and is glad it was pulled. "I think it was smut. I don't think race had anything to do with that ad," he said. "The party of family values should not have run that in Tennessee, or anywhere for that matter."

The System's Broken (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

Greencastle, Ind.

The middle-aged woman filling her gas tank on a day of endless rain laughed when a reporter asked her about the coming elections. "Politics," she said, "are for silly people. Those ads come on television and I reach for the remote."

I asked if she was planning to vote on Nov. 7.

"No," she said. "That stuff really turns me off."

If you pay close attention to the news and then go out and talk to ordinary people, it's hard not to come away with the feeling that the system of politics and government in the U.S. is broken. I spent the past week talking to residents in Chicago, southern Michigan and Indiana. No one was happy about the direction the country has taken, but not even the most faithful voters were confident that their ballot would make any substantial difference.

"I vote," said Angela Buehl, who lives in a suburb of Indianapolis, "but I don't think anybody in Washington is listening to me." She mimicked talking into a telephone: "Hello ... Hello ...?"

The politicians, special interests and the media are in a state of high excitement over next week's midterm elections. They are addicted to the blood sport of politics, and this is a championship encounter. But that excitement contrasts with what seems to be an increasing sense of disenchantment and unease that ordinary Americans are feeling when it comes to national politics and government. For far too many of them, the government in Washington is remote, unresponsive and ineffective.

Voters and nonvoters alike expressed frustration with the fact that we are stuck in a war in Iraq that hardly anyone still supports but no one in government knows how to end.

Several people mentioned that their families were struggling financially at a time when the stock market had soared to all-time highs and the Bush administration was crowing about how well the economy was doing.

Nearly all said they were repelled by the relentless barrage of tasteless and idiotic campaign commercials. “Talk to me,” said a woman in Mishawaka, Ind. “Don’t assume I’m an imbecile.”

A pair of front-page articles in The Times last week showed the stark contrast in the way that insiders and outsiders view the off-year elections. Corporations, reacting to the possibility that the Republicans might lose control of one or both houses of Congress, are hedging their bets by pumping up campaign donations to Democratic candidates. One way or another, they will be in the loop. That story ran on Saturday.

A day earlier, The Times reported on Democratic concerns that black voters, disillusioned by voter suppression efforts and a pervasive belief that their votes will not be properly counted, may not turn out in the numbers that the party was hoping for.

The system is broken. Most politicians would rather sacrifice their first born than tell voters the honest truth about tough issues. Big money and gerrymandering have placed government out of the reach of most Americans. While some changes in the House are expected this year, the Brookings Institution and the Cato Institute tell us (in a joint report) that since 1998, House incumbents have won more than 98 percent of their re-election races.

Millions of thoughtful Americans have become so estranged from the political process that they’ve tuned out entirely. Voters hungry for a serious discussion of complex issues are fed a steady diet of ideological talking heads hurling insults in one- or two-minute television segments.

DePauw University held a two-day conference last week on issues confronting the U.S. I was struck by the extent to which the people who attended the forums were interested in seeking out practical, nonpartisan, nonideological solutions to the wide range of problems discussed.

The frustration with the current state of government and politics was palpable. One man, Ned Lamkin, asked me if it wouldn’t be a good idea to create some sort of national forum for a serious extended discussion of ways to fix, or at least improve, the system. He’s on to something. Among other things, I’d love to see a nonpartisan series of high-profile, nationally televised town hall meetings that would explore ways of making government and politics fairer, more open and more responsive to the will of the people.

American-style democracy needs to be energized, revitalized. The people currently in charge are not up to the task. It’s time to bring the intelligence, creativity and energy of the broader population into the quest for constructive change.

The Decline Of Trust (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

In 1995 Francis Fukuyama came out with a book called "Trust," in which he argued that a society's capacity for cooperation underpins its prosperity. The same year, Robert Putnam's famous article, "Bowling Alone," lamented that the United States was depleting its stock of precious social capital. The question of trust -- in government and also in communities -- preoccupied politicians too. "It Takes a Village," Hillary Rodham Clinton urged in the title of her 1996 book, which became a best seller.

You don't hear much about trust these days. Instead, we want accountability.

You see this most viciously in politics. In the mid-term campaigns, nobody has time for trust. The name of the game is to hold opponents accountable by attacking their records -- for failings real or imagined. If the Democrats capture one or both chambers, it will be largely because they promise to hold the president accountable.

This reflects a shift somewhere around 2003 or 2004. In the 1990s, after academics and pundits began talking about trust, the nation did actually become more trusting. The share of Americans saying they trust government "most of the time" or "just about always" rose from 21 percent in 1994 to 56 percent in 2002. Equally, elections became less abrasively focused on accountability. In 2000, according to John Geer of Vanderbilt University, a relatively low 40 percent of the messages in presidential TV spots were negative, down from 47 percent four years earlier.

But some time after the Iraq invasion, these trends reversed. In 2004 the share of Americans saying they trusted government fell to 47 percent, and this month a CBS News-New York Times poll put it at a rock-bottom 28 percent. Meanwhile Geer's measures show that in the 2004 election negative messages jumped to 50 percent of the total, and he guesses that this year's congressional races are the most negative in history.

There's been a similar change in corporate America. In the late 1990s, the new thing for corporate managers was to trust ordinary employees. Company hierarchies were flattened so that people in the middle could demonstrate initiative rather than suffocating under bureaucratic controls. In 1999, the Harvard Business Review reported that 30,000 articles on trusting and empowering middle managers had appeared in the business press over the previous four years.

That paradigm ended in 2002 with Enron, WorldCom and dozens of lesser corporate scandals. Suddenly nobody wanted to trust managers; they wanted to audit them. Instead of the era of management empowerment, we entered the era of mandatory online ethics training. Meanwhile private-equity firms are raising record sums to take over companies on the premise that incumbent managers need to be kicked rather than trusted.

What to make of this shift? Holding people accountable is a good thing:

This season's negative campaigning

can be seen (admittedly, with many despicable exceptions) as a healthy reaction to poor congressional performance. Equally, the 2002 scandals justified the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms of corporate governance. There are reasons we hold teachers accountable for failing schools and put travelers through metal detectors.

But trust, when not abused, is nonetheless an asset. Accountants, lawyers and online training sessions impose costs on businesses; it would be cheaper to trust people if that were possible. Likewise, as Marc Hetherington of Vanderbilt University has demonstrated, government is constrained if nobody trusts it. The Great Society programs were possible because Americans trusted government in the 1960s; the creation of the Medicare prescription drug program arguably reflected the peaking of trust in government in 2003. But Bill Clinton's health care reform was thwarted in the low-trust early 1990s, and nobody now trusts government to modernize entitlements. Meanwhile President Bush had enormous foreign policy momentum in 2002-03 because Americans trusted him. Thanks to the Iraq mess, Americans are now focused on holding Bush accountable, and his options are limited.

There are powerful reasons trust tends to decline and accountability advances. Mobile societies tend to have weak bonds; the Internet makes it easier to hold people accountable and encourages acerbic negativity. And the absence of trust can feed on itself. Leaders function under stifling oversight; this causes them to perform sluggishly, so trust continues to stagnate. But occasionally there is a chance to escape this trap: A shock causes trust to rise, leaders have a chance to lead and there's an opportunity to boost trust still further.

We've recently had a double opportunity. The boom of the 1990s boosted trust in business; the 2001 terrorist attacks boosted trust in government. But CEOs and politicians abused these gifts with scandals and incompetence. Such is the cost of corporate malfeasance and the Iraq war: Precious social capital is destroyed by leaders' avarice and hubris.

Out Of Work In Michigan? Wyoming Wants You. (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 30, 2006

WRIGHT, WYO.

When Zeb and Sharon Goodrich look out their front door these days, they see antelope, sweeping treeless plains, and dozens of jack rabbits - a far cry from the view at their previous home in Lake Odessa, Mich.

"I miss the trees," Mr. Goodrich admits. "I was in shock when I [saw] how many trees there weren't." On the other hand, he likes that "you feel like you have room to breathe."

More important: He has good work, and lots of it.

Goodrich's job as a welder for a mine- services company pays far better than the welding he was doing back in Michigan, especially when he factors in the opportunity for overtime. And unlike the jobs in Michigan, it's not in danger of disappearing any time soon.

The Goodriches are at the vanguard of a small, new migration westward. As a result of aggressive recruiting on the part of job-rich and labor-poor Wyoming - and their family's willingness to leave roots and relatives behind in search of a more secure future - Zeb, Sharon, and their two young boys moved more than 1,000 miles this spring to a region in the throes of an oil, gas, and coal boom.

Employers in Wyoming are hoping that many more follow. For nearly a year, several county economic development councils and companies have targeted Michigan, with its large pool of skilled blue-collar labor and dwindling jobs, to try and fill the state's thousands of job openings. They've conducted three job fairs and placed a huge billboard outside Flint, Mich: "Live and Work in Wyoming!" And they're having some success.

"The Michigan folks are really fitting in," says Ruth Benson, director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corporation, just back from a recent recruiting trip.

Few of the Michiganders who move let Ms. Benson know they've done so, but she knows of at least 65 who have moved to her county in recent months, and hears of many more. Her county's website, www.jobswyoming.net, has been getting thousands of hits. "It's not for everyone," she says of the move, "but it's good for some."

Campbell County - which produces more than 35 percent of the coal used for the nation's electricity - is filled with evidence of the boom. Lines of trucks and cars - especially at shift changes - wind through roads in an otherwise barren landscape. Gas wells dot scrubland near the highway. Houses are going up all over.

Unemployment in the county is 1.7 percent - compared with 3.6 percent in the state and 7.1 percent in Michigan. And the mineral industry has given Wyoming a budget surplus of nearly $2 billion - evidence of which is seen in the new schools, civic centers, and infrastructure springing up.

In tiny Wright, for instance, where the Goodriches live, the population of 1,500 has four or five new playgrounds, a stocked fishing pond for kids, a new library, and a recreation center with an indoor pool.

"They're not burning the desk to heat the school," Zeb says with a laugh.

Such a boom has a downside too, though, as many families learn when they try to find a place to live - especially if they also need to sell a home in a depressed market like Michigan's.

The growing population has sent housing prices soaring, and many newcomers have to wait months just to find a place that's available. Motels are filled with laborers, and many companies need to offer temporary housing to lure workers. The lower-paying service sector has also had a hard time finding and keeping workers, with so many better-paying jobs available.

Benson is hoping that once the county is able to lure more skilled workers for the high-paying energy-related jobs, their "trailing spouses" will follow, and hopefully fill some of the many service and part-time positions. Sharon, for instance, has already bought a day-care center in Wright, which serves 51 kids.

She's enjoying her work, especially since it keeps her with 4-year-old Zeb Jr. and 3-year-old Jacob.

But the main change for the better has been for her husband. Back in Michigan, Zeb was doing welding on water heaters, bored by the monotonous work and making some $30,000 to $40,000 a year. Now, he works at P&H MinePro Services, repairing and building the massive coal mining equipment. The only thing that keeps him from overtime is the need to spend time with his family, and he loves the work - even when it means 14-hour nighttime shifts.

"I call my friends and ask how their job is, and then say, 'Oh, I worked on the world's largest electric shovel last night,' " he says, grinning. "It's not hard to make six figures here if you don't mind working."

He remembers an ethanol plant back in Michigan that got 10,000 applications for 35 jobs. Here, he jokes, "you've got 35 people applying for the 10,000 jobs."

Still, despite his best efforts, none of his friends have followed him. And even Benson admits it can be an uphill struggle to get people to leave their extended families to come to an area they may never have heard of.

When she and officials in several other counties first realized what a labor shortage they had, they tried recruiting from Texas and the Gulf states, encouraging those displaced by hurricane Katrina to move to Wyoming.

"It was late fall, and they'd call and ask about the weather and all but hang up on you," she remembers.

Michigan, with its own tough winters and outdoorsman culture, has been a better fit, but it's still a challenge. Also, the area's employers don't want just any workers - they need heavy equipment operators, electricians, welders, mechanics, and other skilled laborers.

The growing population, though, is creating some need for a few other professions too. Richard Andriaens, Gillette's chief of police, moved here from Royal Oak, Mich., nearly two years ago. Budget cuts forced him to take an early retirement from the police department there, and as he scanned Michigan for police chief openings, he happened across an advertisement for Gillette, Campbell County's largest town.

"I thought, if we're going to move an hour, why not 20 hours?" he remembers. Since then, he's brought three more Michiganders to the department, and is going back on another recruiting trip in November.

The lack of shopping has been a bit tough for his wife, but mostly he says it's been a welcome change.

"I used to commute to work with half the number of people in this entire state," he says. His oldest son shot his first antelope and mule deer a few weeks ago, and his other three kids have all adapted quickly. "The best kept secret out here is the weather," he laughs.

As with the Goodriches, Chief Andriaens says the hardest part has been being away from family, but he's never looked back.

"I'm from a blue-collar family, and the blue-collar orientation makes you set strong roots," he says. "But if you have even a little bit of an entrepreneurial spirit, then the opportunities here are just incredible."

Fewer Teens Are Giving Birth, But Cost To Taxpayers Still Steep (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 30, 2006

Teen childbearing has declined sharply since the early 1990s but remains costly to U.S. taxpayers, incurring a tab of least $9.1 billion in 2004, according to a report released today.

The children of teen mothers have higher health care, foster care and incarceration costs than those of older parents, says the report commissioned by the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, a non-profit advocacy group. Like their parents, they earn less as adults and pay less in taxes.

"It's important to remind people the problems are very serious and expensive," says Sarah Brown, the group's director. She welcomes a one-third decline from 62 births per 1,000 teen girls in 1991 to 41 births in 2004. She attributes the drop to social changes that have led teens to use contraception or abstain from sex.

The abortion rate dropped even more, from 37 abortions per 1,000 teen girls in 1991 to 22 in 2002, the last year for which figures are available, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a non-profit organization that studies sexual and reproductive health policy.

Still, Brown says, the teen birth rate is four to five times the rate in much of Europe and more than twice that of Canada. "We can't let this nation think everything's been done," she says, noting the rate of decline has slowed.

The report, By the Numbers: The Public Costs of Teen Childbearing, looks only at costs clearly linked to a teen birth rather than associated risks such as poverty. Written by Saul Hoffman, an economics professor at the University of Delaware, it is based largely on 2004 data that have not been publicized.

Most of the costs in 2004 — $8.6 billion — were incurred by mothers 17 and younger. Compared with women who have a first child at 20 or 21, those girls are more than twice as likely to have a child placed in foster care, to be reported for child abuse or neglect, and to have a son sent to prison. Their kids are far more likely to drop out of high school and their daughters to become teen mothers themselves, the report states.

"Teen birth rates drive a lot of negative social indicators," says Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Health and Human Services Department.

The report says the 2004 costs of teen childbearing include $1.9 billion for health care, $2.3 billion for child welfare, $2.1 billion for incarceration and $2.9 billion in lower tax revenue. That federal, state and local tab is offset slightly by family support for younger teens. The cost to government averages $1,430 per child per year.

The price tag varies by state, depending on the number of births and benefit levels, from $12 million in Vermont to $1 billion in Texas.

Teen birth rates generally have fallen since 1957 but rose in the late 1980s. The subsequent drop saved taxpayers an estimated $6.7 billion nationally in 2004, the report says. The savings ranged from more than $1 billion in California to $5 million in Wyoming.

The report updates a 1996 study on the costs of teen childbearing but is the first to provide state-by-state costs.

A Case For Strengthening Marriage (WP)

By Leah Ward Sears

For the first time in history, less than half of U.S. households are headed by married couples. And on Sept. 29, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released data showing that almost 36 percent of all births are the result of unmarried childbearing, the highest percentage ever recorded.

In family law, as in the rest of American society, there is an intensifying debate about how we should respond to this kind of news. Should law and society actively seek new ways to support marriage? Or should family law strive to be marriage-neutral by providing more rights and benefits to its alternatives, such as cohabitation and single parenthood?

Some family law experts argue that our most pressing need is to find ways to equally support a wide variety of family forms. For example, the respected American Law Institute, an organization of judges, lawyers and legal scholars that periodically drafts model laws and other proposals for legal reform, has proposed a new set of laws that promotes this "family diversity model." In "Principles of the Law of Family Dissolution," some ALI scholars argue that family law should focus less on trying to channel people into marriage and more on being "fair" to people in different relationships -- in other words, that it should take families as it finds them.

I am not a law professor. But from where I sit as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia, a family law that fails to encourage marriage ignores the fact that marriage has long been associated with an impressively broad array of positive outcomes for children and adults alike. Experts who contend that we need to move "beyond marriage" say they are only responding to the facts. But here is one major fact: High rates of family fragmentation hurt children.

For example, studies have consistently shown that children raised outside marriage suffer disproportionately from physical and mental illness; are more likely to drop out of school, abuse drugs or alcohol, and engage in violence or suffer it in their homes; and are less likely to attend college. Child Trends, a nonpartisan research organization summed up the evidence in 2002: "Children in single-parent families, children born to unmarried mothers, and children in step-families or cohabiting relationships face higher risks of poor outcomes."

Of course, many hard-working single parents do an excellent job of raising children, and they need our support, too. But I believe that building a healthy marriage culture in America is a legitimate concern for family law.

I am not alone. For example, "Reconceiving the Family," a new book published by Cambridge University Press critiquing the ALI's "principles," has contributions from 27 family law scholars, including two other state supreme court chief justices. The Institute for American Values recently published a statement, signed by many legal and family scholars, that concluded that "a prime goal of family law should be to identify new ways to support marriage as a social institution so that each year more children are protected by being raised within the marital unions of their parents." Moreover, the supreme court in my state just established a Commission on Children, Marriage and Family Law with an important goal: to find ways to reduce unnecessary divorce and unmarried childbearing.

Why are state judges such as myself so concerned about strengthening marriage? Start with the basics: Fragmenting families are flooding our court dockets. Since I became a trial judge in 1989, the percentage of domestic relations cases has risen sharply; they now account for 65 percent of all cases in Georgia at the Superior Court level. Last year more than 14,000 children were in the care of the Georgia Division of Family and Children Services, and nearly 24,000 were admitted to a youth detention center. One out of every four Georgia children under 18 has a case with the Office of Child Support Enforcement.

These figures are typical of what is happening in every state. For judges, they represent a difficult workload. For families, they represent an astonishing level of necessary but intrusive government oversight. For government, they represent a mountain of resources that could be used for other purposes. For children, they are a tragedy.

As a judge I am often frustrated that I must work within a system designed only to pick up the pieces after families have already fallen apart or failed to come together. We must work to prevent family fragmentation, because the consequences for children and society are severe.

If we look for solutions, we will find them. What we do not yet know how to accomplish, we can learn. Americans believe that problems, no matter how difficult, should be addressed and not merely endured. Whether it is racism, crime or poverty, Americans believe that we can find ways to make a difference. Accepting the decline of marriage as inevitable means giving up on far too many of our children. They deserve better than that.

Supply Side The Sanford Model By STEPHEN MOORE (WSJ)

Just when you thought that there weren't any small-government conservatives left in the Republican Party, along comes South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who may be the only politician in America this year under assault for governing as a fiscal tightwad. What's really unusual about Mr. Sanford's bid for re-election is that some of his most formidable adversaries are the old bull politicians in his own party.

The state's Republican Senate Finance Committee chairman Verne Smith, for example, has just cut a campaign ad for Tommy Moore, the Democrat running against the governor. The ad slams Mr. Sanford for his attempts to squeeze too much grease from the state budget. Mr. Smith has evidently never forgiven him for dramatizing the legislature's overspending by holding a press conference inside the state Capitol in Columbia with two squealing pigs: one named "Pork" and the other "Barrel."

"Hey, it worked," Mr. Sanford says unapologetically of this stunt, which attracted nationwide attention. The legislature went back and cut $16 million in earmarks. He has vetoed hundreds of spending bills, including the entire budget in 2004 and 2006 -- although almost all of these vetoes were overridden by -- who else? -- the state Republican House and Senate. "If I weren't fighting the legislature on overspending, I wouldn't be doing my job," he says about this intraparty squabbling. Then he adds: "Frankly, I wish there were more of this budget strife in Washington." Words for George W. Bush to live by.

Despite the turmoil Mr. Sanford has stirred up during the past four years, he's racked up some pretty impressive accomplishments. Though his effort to phase out the state income tax was killed in the senate, he chopped the personal income tax rate on small businesses, to 5% from 7%, for the first time in South Carolina history. He took a state that was labeled a "judicial hell hole" and passed reforms, despised by trial lawyers, that will penalize frivolous lawsuits. He even cut the average wait time to get a driver's license renewal to 15 minutes from over an hour.

Mr. Sanford's real passion is school reform -- which is urgently needed in a state that ranks 48th, 49th or 50th in almost all measures of student performance. He openly ridicules the "failed monopoly" school system and for this the left has accused him of being virulently anti-public education (although school spending rose 20% in his first term). He also persuaded the legislature to approve charter schools and a private school tax credit bill -- and might have gotten more done if it weren't for his prickly personality.

This is the lingering complaint about Mr. Sanford (which he readily concedes): He "doesn't play in the sandbox well with others." Even some of the governor's first-term supporters, who at first liked the idea that this former three-term congressman would shake up the stuffy political establishment in Columbia, have come to regard Mr. Sanford as too abrasive and self-righteous.

Just last week South Carolina's largest newspaper, The State -- which endorsed him four years ago -- published a scathing denunciation charging among other things that the governor "doesn't want government to be more effective as much as he wants it to be cheaper," and that his first term has been all about "tax cuts and privatizing everything he could -- even the schools." The fiercest indictment: "He had run as a conservative . . . but [is] as close to an ideologically pure libertarian as you can get." Egads!

But with qualifications like his, it is no wonder that a number of leading conservatives across the country, disgusted with GOP gorging on pork and deficit spending, are looking at Mr. Sanford as a potentially attractive new entrant into the 2008 presidential race.

First, however, there is the little matter of re-election. Opponent Tommy Moore -- a man who boasts that he has spent half his life (28 years) in the state legislature -- is predictably attacking the governor for slashing vital services like education. Mr. Sanford is certainly vulnerable to the Democratic tide that could oust many GOP incumbents next week, but he remains admired by most voters. The latest Clemson University poll has him leading the race 58% to 31%.

Those good numbers may seem surprising, given the budget wars in Columbia and the drubbing he has taken from the media for being so aggravatingly uncompromising. But Mr. Sanford has a gift for turning liberal complaints against him into virtues with voters. After Time magazine rated him one of the three worst governors in America, Mr. Sanford openly scoffed. "All the top grades went to the tax and spenders," he laughs. "Believe me, I'm never going to win that kind of beauty contest, nor do I want to." He points out that in the same issue Time rated Ted Kennedy one of the top 10 senators in America. In South Carolina, that's enough said.

Mr. Sanford is still criticized to this day for the piggies stunt -- the House speaker claimed that he "defiled" the state capital -- but the governor says the voters have a different attitude. Breaking into a pronounced Southern drawl he says: "They tell me: 'You go bring some more pigs up there, governor. We're tired of the way they're spending our money.'"

That's the way many conservative Americans feel about Washington these days -- and why Republicans may fare so poorly next Tuesday. Political commentators such as the Washington Post's David Broder may write glowingly about how California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has discovered the new formula for GOP governance: Toss aside ideology and sprint to the 50-yardline. But the Sanford model -- holding firm on limited government principles -- is a far more compelling lesson for how Republicans can recapture the good graces of their conservative voting base.

Big-Name Anger On Behalf Of The Little Guy (WP)

WAR ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

How the Government, Big Business, and Special Interest Groups Are Waging War on the American Dream and How to Fight Back

By Lou Dobbs

Viking, 251 pp., $24.95

Lou Dobbs is one of the professional angry men of cable television news.

The host of CNN's "Lou Dobbs Tonight" has carved a niche as a self-styled former Republican who refuses to sit by while big corporations, Congress and the Bush administration repeatedly take aim at the little guy in America.

On his show and in his book, "War on the Middle Class," the financial reporter-turned-pundit rails against "elites," globalization, illegal immigrants, the outsourcing of U.S. jobs, lobbyists, politicians, health-care costs and exorbitant CEO pay.

"I can't take seriously anyone who takes either the Republican Party or Democratic Party seriously," writes Dobbs, 61, "in part, because neither party takes you and me seriously; in part, because both are bought and paid for by corporate America and special interests. And neither party gives a damn about the middle class."

Dobbs sees an America with failing public schools, increasingly unaffordable health care, timid news media, politicians who serve the interests of lobbyists and corporations, and big companies that pay executives far too much while laying off workers and sending their jobs overseas in pursuit of cheap labor. And don't get him started on the "dysfunctional" federal government's failure to stop the entry into the country of illegal immigrants, whom he views as a threat to American culture, security and wages.

Dobbs details his displeasure in 12 easily digested chapters, each taking on a different subject but all replete with overheated prose.

"Each night, as I conclude my nightly broadcast on CNN, I have the gut-sick feeling that we have chronicled another twenty-four hours in the decline of our great democratic republic and the bankrupting of our free enterprise economy," he writes in a typical passage.

Still, millions of Americans share his anger, and it is not hard to see why. From 1992 to 2004, average pay for corporate chief executive officers rose from $1.8 million a year to $9.6 million. The heads of some bankrupt companies continue to collect millions of dollars in compensation even as workers are sent packing. Big businesses and other organizations spent $2.14 billion -- more than $5.8 million a day -- lobbying Congress and federal agencies in 2004. Ordinary Americans would be forgiven for suspecting that most of those efforts were not to benefit them.

The United States has lost millions of manufacturing jobs in recent decades. Increasingly, companies are shedding U.S.-based software programmers, call-center employees, aircraft maintenance personnel and accountants and replacing them with cheaper labor in countries such as India. Corporate profits have nearly doubled since 2000, while U.S. workers have seen little or no increase in real wages, their pension plans have disappeared, and employers have shifted health-care costs to them.

"[H]ow prosperous a nation are we when working Americans aren't being allowed to share equally in what we glibly call 'prosperity?' " Dobbs asks.

The book is well packaged but does not break new ground. The outrages Dobbs chronicles, such as the influence-peddling of lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the nominal relocations overseas by U.S. companies seeking to evade taxes, have been well documented in the same media that Dobbs complain have "turned away from the hard work and expense of fact-finding and investigation to the reporting of what is easy and convenient."

Speaking of easy and convenient, Dobbs seems to have done no new interviewing and instead quotes most of the people in his book straight from their appearances on his show. Even the book's title is a rip-off of the name of an ongoing series on his broadcast, making it essentially an exercise in brand extension. The inclusion of the full texts of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution may be patriotic, but they also add bulk to what otherwise would be a modest volume of 212 pages.

There are a few sloppy errors: "California congresswoman Dana Rorhbacher," a Republican, is, in fact, a man whose last name is spelled "Rohrabacher." Democratic Sen. Byron L. Dorgan is from North Dakota, not North Carolina. And Dobbs's critique of national media organizations as being out of touch with Middle America because they are headquartered in New York and Washington falls flat coming from a man whose television show is based in New York.

Like many pundits, Dobbs is better at identifying problems than at solving them. Urging people to be more engaged in the political process and to vote the bums out is a sensible suggestion, if not a novel one. But if voters drop their party affiliations and register as independents, as he recommends -- and has done himself -- the result will be major-party candidates more tied to the views of the hard-core primary voters who remain.

Dobbs proposes "complete public financing" of federal elections, an idea that would not curtail outside political spending by people such as billionaire George Soros and groups such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. Dobbs would make members of Congress wait five years to become lobbyists, rather than the current one year. But earlier he points out that such waiting periods do not work because former politicians immediately land lucrative jobs advising big firms on lobbying matters anyway.

Dobbs advocates inspecting every cargo container bound for the United States, rather than the 5 percent currently examined, a sound idea from a security standpoint but a policy so logistically difficult and costly that it would probably bring ports to a standstill.

Dobbs would fine employers $50,000 for every illegal immigrant they hire. He would establish a national core curriculum and standards for classroom size and teacher pay, effectively removing schools from the control of the local and state officials -- and taxpayers -- who provide most of the funding.

"No one will give us our country back, not without a fight," he writes.

Dobbs, a well-compensated television personality, is not a member of the middle class that he defends so vigorously. He has the kind of national profile that led his publisher to put his face on the book's cover to sell more copies. While outsourcing, illegal immigration and high CEO pay may be bad for the middle class, they have been pretty good for Lou Dobbs's career.

For Congress In Virginia (WP)

AFTER SIX terms in Congress representing Northern Virginia's 11th District, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III , a one-man political whirlwind, is a force to be reckoned with. Energetic, practical and astute, he is a deal-maker's deal-maker who has used his considerable clout as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee to good effect.

One example is his bill to give the District of Columbia's delegate in Congress full voting rights -- a proposal that would, at last, enfranchise the District's mostly Democratic residents while placating the GOP by adding a second new congressional seat for mostly Republican Utah. Another example is his important proposal to ensure Metro's future with $1.5 billion in federal funding over a decade -- a fat carrot conditioned on Maryland, Virginia and the District together dedicating an equal amount to the transit system. The bill, which still faces hurdles in the Senate, is a smart and creative bit of legislating.

Mr. Davis is a partisan Republican but also a moderate and a pragmatist who knows how to strike deals with Democrats. That alone makes him part of a small fraternity and an important one for a congressional district that is itself politically moderate -- and increasingly Democratic.

His Democratic opponent, Andrew Hurst, is a thoughtful, articulate lawyer. He has bruised Mr. Davis by spotlighting his partisanship and fundraising -- voting with the Bush administration the great majority of the time and sharing his own campaign cash with right-wing Republican candidates for Congress elsewhere. However, Mr. Hurst, whose own local civic involvement has been slight, concedes he is no match for the incumbent on local issues.

In Virginia's 8th District, we have been critical of Rep. James P. Moran Jr. , a Democrat whose past bouts of hot temper, atrocious judgment and ethical bumbling cast doubt on his fitness for office. Nor have we forgotten his pernicious remark that Jewish Americans bore special responsibility for leading the nation into war in Iraq.

However, neither major party has come up with a viable alternative to Mr. Moran, and after more than two decades in public office, including five years as mayor of Alexandria and 16 years in Congress, he appears unlikely to be dislodged. Mr. Moran has broken with his party in backing sensible free-trade measures and is pressing for infrastructure improvements to help absorb the 20,000 new military employees whose jobs are to be relocated to Fort Belvoir. He had a decent record in the past two years in Congress. He is well liked by many of his constituents, who have been willing to overlook his missteps because he remains conscientious about his duties in office and attentive to local concerns. There is something to admire in all that, and it is the basis for our endorsing him this year, with the above-stated reservations.

By contrast, his Republican opponent in this year's race, attorney Tom M. O'Donoghue, is a blank slate on issues of special concern to the 8th District. Mr. O'Donoghue, a major in the Army Reserve and a veteran of Iraq and Afghanistan, is intelligent and eager to serve. But having all but ignored local questions during the decade-plus he has lived in Northern Virginia, he is ill-equipped to represent the area in Congress. An independent candidate, James T. "Jim" Hurysz, is running a hard-line anti-growth campaign; he has little local support.

In Virginia's 10th District, we endorsed Rep. Frank R. Wolf , a Republican, in a previous editorial.

Two Top Jobs In Maryland (WP)

HAVING ALREADY endorsed Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) for a second term in office, we turn our attention to the other two top jobs in state government: attorney general and comptroller.

Democrat Douglas F. Gansler and Republican Scott L. Rolle, two tough-minded, able and experienced prosecutors, are running to be Maryland's attorney general. The race is one-sided: no Republican has been elected attorney general of Maryland since 1919, and Mr. Gansler enjoys an enormous edge in campaign cash, name recognition and organization. That's a good thing, since it is also the case that he is the better pick to be the state's top law officer and run an office of nearly 400 lawyers.

Mr. Gansler, Montgomery County's top prosecutor since 1999 and a federal prosecutor before that, is a fine lawyer and administrator who has set himself an ambitious agenda for the job he seeks. He has pledged to focus on the environment, particularly cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay; he plans to employ underutilized state and federal enforcement tools to crack down on agribusiness polluters that he believes have evaded the law.

As we noted when we endorsed Mr. Gansler for the Democratic nomination, he is an unusually brash, outspoken public official whose appetite for publicity has earned him detractors. Still, if he sticks to the law and learns the art of understatement, he may easily win allies, for he has the energy and intellect to be a first-rate attorney general.

Mr. Rolle, the chief prosecutor in Frederick County, has run a campaign stressing tougher treatment for child sex predators, including abolishing parole for them. On a range of other issues -- including abortion, which he opposes -- his views are well to the right of what most Marylanders believe. We don't doubt his legal acuity, but his experience is no match for Mr. Gansler's.

The race for Maryland's comptroller, the state's chief tax collector, is even more one-sided. Del. Peter V.R. Franchot , a Montgomery County Democrat, is a 20-year veteran of state politics whose independent-mindedness and broad familiarity with state finances make him easily more qualified than Anne M. McCarthy, the Republican candidate. Ms. McCarthy, a former business school dean, is a novice in state politics who has lived in Maryland just four years.

Yemen Arrests 8 It Links To Plot By Al Qaeda (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Oct. 29 — Security officials in Yemen have arrested eight men, including several Europeans and Australians, as well as a Somali, in what was described as a plot linked to Al Qaeda to smuggle weapons from Yemen to Somalia, Yemen's official news agency reported Sunday.

Security officials said the men, who were arrested Oct. 16, include three Australians, a Briton, a German, a Dane, a Somali and an eighth suspect of undisclosed nationality.

"Preliminary investigations indicate that they are members of Al Qaeda," an Interior Ministry official said in a statement carried by the state-run news agency, Saba.

If the men are convicted, it may offer the most concrete link of a growing Qaeda presence in Somalia, where the Islamic Courts Union, an Islamist group, has struggled to consolidate its position after taking control of Mogadishu, the country's capital, in June.

Officials said the men, who were not identified, had converted to Islam and had received religious instruction in Yemen. They were arrested trying to smuggle light arms, presumably across the Gulf of Aden, a common smuggling route for refugees escaping Somalia and for drugs and contraband brought into Africa.

Yemen, where tribal wars and revenge attacks claim up to 1,200 lives every year, has one of the largest ratios of guns per capita in the world, with thriving arms markets in most major towns and cities.

U.S., Allies Practice Intercepts In Gulf (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

The United States and five other countries will begin an exercise in the Persian Gulf today simulating the interdiction of a ship carrying nuclear materials to a state of "proliferation concern" -- most likely Iran.

U.S. officials said that Muslim countries will take part for the first time in a Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI) exercise, part of Washington's global effort to disrupt traffic in weapons of mass destruction and related materials.

"From news reports, we know that the exercise has gotten the attention of the Iranian government," said Robert G. Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security. "This is an exercise that will test our capability to intercept illicit traffic."

The West suspects Iran of trying to build a nuclear weapon, but Tehran insists that it seeks nuclear energy only for civilian purposes.

Vessels, aircraft and special teams for the live phase of the exercise will be provided by the United States, Britain, France, Italy, Australia and the host, Bahrain. Preparations have involved 25 countries, including South Korea, which has not formally joined the PSI, Mr. Joseph told reporters.

"The United States appreciates the leadership of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates to ensure that the Gulf states will actively prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, their delivery systems and related materials," the State Department said.

The PSI began in 2003 with 11 countries and has grown to 80, Mr. Joseph said.

The Bush administration plans to apply some of the program's interdiction practices in carrying out a U.N. Security Council resolution imposed this month that bans imports and exports of nuclear and other illicit cargo to North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0087671

China and South Korea, however, are reluctant to intercept North Korean ships. Seoul has said it is thinking of joining the PSI, but a senior State Department official said China ruled out membership during a visit last week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Also today, the United States and Russia will head the first meeting of an initiative to combat nuclear terrorism, announced by Presidents Bush and Vladimir Putin in July.

The session will be held in Morocco, which the senior official said has "very strong nonproliferation credentials" and whose participation will "send the right signal" that this is not just a Western effort.

The other participants will be Britain, China, France, Australia, Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan, Kazakhstan and Turkey, the official said.

Report Assails N. Korea Rights Record (AP)

By Edward Harris

AP, October 30, 2006

A Nobel prize-winning Holocaust survivor, an anti-Soviet dissident and a former European leader called Sunday for U.N. Security Council action on North Korea over its "egregious" human rights record.

Elie Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camp at Auschwitz and later won a Nobel peace prize, commissioned a 123-page report detailing North Korean atrocities with dissident playwright turned Czech President Vaclav Havel and a former prime minister of Norway, Kjell Magne Bondevik.

In the report, the three said the dispute over the country's nuclear program should not eclipse deadly political repression there, but rather the council should open another path to influence North Korea by taking on leader Kim Jong Il's regime over its treatment of the country's 23 million people.

While a unanimous October Security Council resolution imposed sanctions on North Korea over its Oct. 9 nuclear test, the report is "urging the United Nations to get involved in the North Korea issue also from the human rights perspective," Bondevik said by telephone from Norway.

"Nowhere else in the world today is there such an abuse of rights, as institutionalized as it is in North Korea," Bondevik told the Associated Press. "The leaders are committing crimes against humanity."

The report argues that Security Council action is warranted under a resolution unanimously approved in April by the 15-nation council that endorsed a 2005 agreement aimed at preventing tragedies like the 1994 Rwanda genocide.

North Korea's actions toward its people — like food policies that helped fuel a late-1990s famine that killed as many as 1 million people and a prison system holding some 200,000 political prisoners — present a nontraditional threat to international peace, which the report argues is covered by the recent resolution.

The report, written by law firm DLA Piper and the non-governmental organization U.S. Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, urged the Security Council to adopt a non-punitive resolution that would demand unhindered access to North Korea by humanitarian workers, the release of all political prisoners and the admission of U.N. human rights investigators.

The report envisions a diplomatic process parallel to the one dealing with North Korea's nuclear program.

"Although in recent weeks the international focus has been on North Korea's nuclear weapons test, the situation in that country is also one of the most egregious human rights and humanitarian disasters in the world today," the report said.

Reached Friday, the North Korean mission to the United Nations said no officials, including U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon, were available for comment.

Bondevik acknowledged that a resolution on North Korea over its internal policies could be a hard sell for some council members — like China, which is also accused of holding political prisoners.

But he said the threat to international peace posed by North Korea would trump such considerations.

"I hope this report will describe in detail the abuses — and this will encourage the member countries, even China, that we have to act," he said. "We can't wait any longer."

Nuclear Test Should Prompt Action On Human Rights In North Korea: Experts (AFP-Y)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, October 30, 2006

North Korea's defiant nuclear weapons test paves the way for UN Security Council action to combat the country's perennial human rights and humanitarian problems, an expert report says.

DOJ_NMG_0087672

The 142-page report, commissioned by former Czech president Vaclav Havel, ex-Norwegian prime minister Kjell Bondevik and US Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel, said the human plight in the reclusive nation deserved to be treated on a parallel track with the security threat.

The trio commissioned the report because they felt that "for far too long, the security threat posed by North Korea has relegated the human rights concerns in the impoverished country to a second-class status."

The October 9 nuclear weapons test "demonstrated the fallacy of the argument that not antagonizing its government on human rights concerns would promote successful engagement on security issues," said the report prepared by DLA Piper LLP, a global legal firm, and the US Committee for Human Rights in North Korea.

"Our argument is very clear: the North Korean themselves have formally decoupled the security issue from the human rights and humanitarian issues," said Jared Genser, a DLA Piper lawyer who coordinated the project.

Based on a comprehensive review of published information and first-hand interviews, the report concluded that "North Korea has violated its responsibility to protect its own citizens from crimes against humanity being committed in the country."

Coupled with North Korea's refusal to accept prior recommendations from UN bodies to remedy the situation, "UN Security Council action is warranted," it said.

The report covered research on areas such as the historical context of international concern over the Korean peninsula, the major human rights concerns, including food policy, famine and political prisoners, and the transnational effects of the crises, such as refugee exodus.

"The evidence and analysis contained in this report is deeply disturbing," Havel, Bondevik and Wiesel of Boston University, the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize winner, said in a foreword of the report.

"Indeed, it is clear that Kim Jong Il and the North Korean government are actively committing crimes against humanity," they charged.

North Korea allowed as many as one million, and possibly many more, of its own people to die during the famine in the 1990s, they said.

Hunger and starvation remained a "persistent" problem, they said, pointing out that over 37 percent of children in North Korea were "chronically malnourished."

Furthermore, North Korea imprisons more than 200,000 people in its modern-day gulag, and it is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in that system over 30 years, they said.

Widely condemned internationally, the North Korean nuclear test came after Pyongyang walked out of prolonged nuclear talks with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

Pyongyang had earlier agreed in principle to abandon its nuclear weapons in return for energy and other aid as well as diplomatic guarantees.

Turn North Korea Into A Human Rights Issue (NYT)

By Vaclav Havel, Kjell Magne Bondevik And Elie Wiesel

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

WHILE the focus in recent weeks has been on North Korea's nuclear test, we shouldn't lose sight of the fact that the government there is also responsible for one of the most egregious human-rights and humanitarian disasters in the world today.

For more than a decade, many in the international community have argued that to focus on the suffering of the North Korean people would risk driving the country away from discussions over its nuclear program.

But with his recent actions, North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, has shown that this approach neither stopped the development of his nuclear program nor helped North Koreans. It is time, therefore, for a renewed international effort to ameliorate the crisis facing the country's citizens.

And with the unanimous adoption by the United Nations Security Council of the doctrine that each state has a responsibility to protect its own citizens from the most egregious of human-rights abuses, a new instrument for diplomacy has emerged.

States will retain sovereignty over their own territory, but if they should fail to protect their own citizens from severe human-rights abuses, the international community now has an obligation to intervene through regional bodies and the United Nations, up to and including the Security Council.

It is in this context that, working with the law firm DLA Piper and the United States Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, we commissioned a report on the failure of the North Korean government to exercise its responsibility to protect its own people. The evidence and analysis in this report are deeply disturbing. Indeed, it is clear that North Korea is actively committing crimes against humanity — against its own people.

North Korea allowed perhaps one million — and possibly many more — of its own citizens to die during the famine in the 1990's. This was caused in part by the government's decision to reduce food purchases as international assistance increased so that it could divert resources to its military and nuclear program.

Hunger and starvation remain a persistent problem today, with more than 37 percent of North Korean children chronically malnourished. And yet North Korea has requested less food assistance from the World Food Program and refuses to let the program monitor food distribution in some 42 of 203 counties in the country.

As a result of the cuts in food aid, the program has said that millions of North Koreans will face real hardship this winter and many aid groups have warned of another famine.

Furthermore, North Korea holds as many as 200,000 people in its political prisons. Not only are real or imagined dissenters imprisoned, but so are their relatives, including the elderly and children, under a guilt-by-association system instituted by North Korea's founder, Kim Il-sung.

Prisoners in the gulag are provided starvation-level rations, forced to work long days under brutal conditions, and many face torture or execution for trivial offenses. It is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in the North Korean gulag over 30 years.

The few attempts by the international community to engage with North Korea on human rights and humanitarian concerns have come up short. Resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights have been repudiated by North Korean representatives and then ignored.

In addition, North Korea refuses to recognize the legitimacy of the United Nations special rapporteur on human rights in North Korea and has denied his numerous requests for access to the country.

Kim Jong-il has proven that the international community's restraint in openly discussing North Korea's treatment of its own people did not yield compromise on the nuclear issue. It merely allowed him to decouple the two issues.

Now that Kim Jong-il's nuclear weapons test has attracted the attention and condemnation of the world, it is imperative to seize this opportunity and once again engage with Pyongyang on human rights and humanitarian concerns.

Our report recommends that, as a first step, the Council should adopt a non-punitive resolution urging open access to North Korea for humanitarian relief, the release of political prisoners, access for the special rapporteur and engagement by the United Nations.

We also urge the incoming secretary-general, Ban Ki-Moon, to make his first official action a briefing of the Security Council on this dire situation.

Protecting the people of North Korea requires nothing less.

Bush May Start Talks With N. Korea, Former Envoy Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Heejin Koo

Bloomberg, October 30, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush may bow to political pressure from within the U.S. and agree to direct talks with a nuclear-armed North Korea, according to a former State Department specialist on Kim Jong Il's regime.

``President Bush doesn't change his policy because of external pressure," Kenneth Quinones, 63, said in an interview on Jeju island, South Korea. ``If he's going to change in the near future, it's because of domestic political pressure."

U.S. officials have refused North Korea's demands for bilateral talks, urging the Asian nation to return to six-nation negotiations on ending its weapons program that have been suspended since November last year. North Korea announced on Oct. 9 it had detonated a nuclear bomb.

Failure by the Republican Party to keep control of Congress in elections on Nov. 7 will probably encourage Bush to begin direct negotiations, according to Quinones, a former State Department director of North Korean affairs. Democratic candidates are backed by 53 percent of likely voters, according to a Newsweek poll of 1,002 people, conducted between Oct. 19 and 20 with a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

``In Washington, surprisingly, there is within the Republican Party growing pressure on Bush to show flexibility," said Quinones. ``If the Republicans lose, then yes, I have no doubt Bush will show greater flexibility."

Reaching Agreements

Quinones, a professor of Korean Studies at Japan's Akita International University, was involved in so-called back channel talks between the State Department and North Korea's delegation to the United Nations till February this year. He was in South Korea last week to give a lecture.

The U.S. and North Korea in 1994 reached an agreement for North Korea to abandon its weapons program to get assistance to build two reactors for generating power.

The accord unraveled when the North admitted in October 2002 it was proceeding with its weapons plan in violation of the pact. Bush had already branded the country part of an ``axis of evil'' for developing weapons of mass destruction and selling drugs and counterfeit money. Iraq and Iran were the other countries named in the ``axis of evil.''

North Korea must return to the six-nation talks, which include the U.S., China, Russia, Japan and South Korea, and the U.S. won't negotiate outside that framework, according to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Oct. 20.

Refusal to Return

Kim's regime has refused to return until the U.S. removes financial sanctions imposed last year for money-laundering and counterfeiting.

``President Bush's whole claim of `I want a peaceful diplomatic solution, but I won't negotiate' -- it's a total contradiction,'' Quinones said. ``You can't have one without the other.''

The commander of the U.S. Forces Korea and the United Nations Command, General Burwell Bell, also urged North Korea to return to talks.

``I hope for a peaceful and diplomatic resolution to the North Korean nuclear issue,'' Bell told reporters at a briefing held at the Yongsan Eighth U.S. Army base in Seoul today. ``If deterrence fails, and North Korea attacks the Republic of Korea, the ROK-U.S. alliance will quickly and decisively defeat any aggression.''

The nuclear test heightened tensions on the Korean peninsula, where North and South remain technically at war because no peace treaty was signed to end their 1950-53 conflict, and raised concerns of a regional arms race.

``Moderate right-wing factions'' including former Secretary of State James Baker and former President George H.W. Bush will urge the administration to meet with the North, Quinones said.

Frozen Funds

One possible compromise is over $24 million of North Korean funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia in Macau, China, after the U.S. Treasury Department in September last year designated the lender as a money-laundering threat, Quinones said.

North Korea offered to transfer the money to a New York account, allowing the U.S. to monitor its distribution, according to Quinones.

``The Treasury Department flatly rejected the idea,'' Quinones said, without specifying where he obtained the information. ``If it comes to a choice between Washington accepting that compromise and allowing the transfer of funds, or war, everybody will push Washington to take the compromise offer.''

Quinones said he does not expect Japan, Taiwan or South Korea to begin nuclear weapons programs while the international community to trying to revive negotiations.

``If the six-party talks completely collapse, then we could see an unraveling of the present balance of power.''

A Campaign For Settlers In Golan Heights (WP)

By Scott Wilson

KATZRIN On the edge of this growing Jewish settlement, which bills itself as "the city of water and wine," Moti Bar is building a stylish microbrewery and restaurant in a glass and stone shopping mall that opened a few months ago. His venture, all the way down to the imported copper brew tanks, is a bet that Israel will remain in the Golan Heights for years to come.

The high-end beer and view of the Sea of Galilee are designed to appeal to Israeli yuppies, who are being encouraged more aggressively than ever to move to this rugged plateau seized from Syria in the 1967 Middle East war. Dozens of newly graded home sites stretch westward, and a large industrial park called Golantech is emerging a few miles from Bar's pub.

"We're living our life as if we'll be here forever," said Bar, 42, who commutes from the nearby community of Kanaf. "And I don't think there is any reason why we should leave."

Israel's summer war with Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia that acts as Syria's military proxy, has revived the decades-old contest over the Golan Heights. This latest phase is also being shaped by demographic changes epitomized by this expanding settlement.

Israel annexed the Golan Heights in 1981 and offered its Arab residents citizenship in the Jewish state, something it has not extended to Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The annexation was not recognized internationally, however, and most of the Arabs here refused the offer as a protest against what they consider an illegal occupation. But they do have residency rights that allow them to travel throughout Israel and vote in local elections.

Most of the Arabs in Golan are Druze, members of a sect that split from Islam centuries ago and has large followings in Lebanon, Syria and Israel. Unlike most of the Druze in Israel, those here identify themselves as Arabs and do not serve in the Israeli military. The vast majority consider themselves citizens of Syria, although a small percentage support Israel's presence here.

For years, the Israeli military discouraged civilian settlement in Golan, particularly along the frontier with Syria, for fear the area would emerge again as a battlefield. Some small Israeli settlements were established there anyway, but in the past 15 years all new growth has occurred within existing settlement boundaries rather than in new areas.

The pace has picked up in recent years. Now, for the first time, the number of Jewish settlers in Golan may soon exceed the nearly 20,000 Arab residents whose families remained here after the war. The milestone may have already been passed, Arab leaders concede, with 400 Jewish families moving into Golan each year.

Since the Lebanon war ended on Aug. 14, settler leaders have launched a $250,000 advertising campaign to attract young Israelis with the lure of free land and a lifestyle ethic that blends Marlboro Country, Napa Valley and the X Games. Their goal is to double the Jewish population in Golan to 40,000 within a decade through an appeal that emphasizes cowboy hats over skullcaps.

At the same time, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has called for new negotiations on Golan, emboldened by Israel's inconclusive fight against Hezbollah. For years, the Syrian government has helped arm and fund Hezbollah to strengthen its own hand in talks on the region. The Syrian army, meanwhile, has maintained quiet along the heavily mined frontier.

In a recent interview with the German magazine Der Spiegel, Assad added an ominous note to his previous calls for talks, warning that "when the hope disappears, then maybe war really is the only solution." In response, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called Golan "an inseparable part of the state of Israel."

"No doubt the steadfastness of the resistance in Lebanon, ending the legend of the undefeatable Israeli army, has strengthened our belief that the end of the occupation is closer than ever," said Hail Abu Jabal, 62, a Druze political leader in the town of Majdal Shams who spent seven years in Israeli prisons for campaigning against Israel's hold on Golan. "But expanding these settlements is a mistake, making peace more distant and violent confrontation closer."

Rising from the Sea of Galilee to snowcapped Mount Hermon, Golan is a rocky slope of vineyards, cattle ranches, fruit orchards and remnants of conflict. Vast minefields stretch out behind barbed-wire fences, and the overgrown remains of Syrian houses, military barracks and mosques line mostly empty roads. Trenches and earthworks still score the land where the Israeli army has twice fought Syrian forces.

For decades, Israeli military leaders considered Golan an essential high-ground buffer against Syrian invasion and peppered the region with bases. In recent years, though, some Israeli generals have argued that air power has reduced the strategic importance of the heights. It still remains a training ground for the infantry and armored corps.

Perhaps more important, the region provides a third of Israel's drinking water.

"Until the war with Lebanon, there was no talk of giving back the Golan Heights. Most of the focus was on Israel's real problem, which is with the Palestinians," said Eli Malka, 48, the leader of a group of Golan settlements that is using government money to fund the ad blitz. "We're building, we're growing. And I don't see the prospect of any talks with Assad."

Jewish history here is visible in the remains of a 4th-century synagogue, among others found in Golan, that has been turned into a tourist site on the edge of this settlement of 7,500 people. But most of the roughly 100 families moving each year to Katzrin -- the largest of 33 Jewish communities in Golan -- are secular Israelis like Topaz Barkai, a 32-year-old former banker who arrived last month.

Barkai's father was killed in Golan during the 1973 Arab-Israeli war while her mother was pregnant with her. She was born here, then spent much of her adult life studying and working in Tel Aviv, the cosmopolitan coastal city she still visits for professional soccer games and nightclubs. Her new job is to persuade friends to move to Golan, with its skiing, water sports, cattle ranching and boutique wineries.

"We're trying to make this place younger," Barkai said.

A year and a half ago, the Golan lifestyle drew Einbar Pelter and her husband, Tal, an army officer and aspiring vintner. The couple moved with their two young children from a town near the seaside city of Netanya to Merom Golan, a farming collective founded a month after the 1967 war.

Pelter, a landscaper whose front yard is now a mix of grape vines, lavender and herbs, said the promise of free land, a communal setting and wilderness made them set aside qualms about relocating to an occupied region. Pelter Wines now appear on Tel Aviv wine lists.

"Even if it is going to be temporary, we thought it would be worthwhile," said Pelter, 32, who has seen her new neighborhood fill up over the past year. "A community that isn't growing has an expiration date on it."

The population of roughly 7,000 Arabs who remained after the 1967 war has grown to about 20,000. Most of them refused citizenship. Those who accepted are ostracized to this day in the four insular mountain towns where the Druze population is concentrated.

"After almost 60 years, the basic question of whether the Israelis have a right to create a Jewish state is being asked again after this war," said Taiseer Maray, director of Golan for Development, an Arab-rights organization in Majdal Shams. "This shows the stupidity of power. If I were a clever Zionist, the first thing I'd do is seek peace."

In Maray's Israeli travel document, the space beside "Nationality" reads "undefined." It is an apt description of a population that gathers Fridays at an overlook on the edge of the town to shout to relatives across the border with Syria.

The Arabs here are allowed to sell their apples in Syria and study at Damascus University. Hundreds of graduates have returned, many of them working in summer camps, professional clubs and civic groups, the main venues for political organizing.

"The feeling among the people here is that the Syrians could come back any day," said Maray, who has not seen his three brothers in Damascus since the 1967 war. "The settlers now talk about breaking down the boundaries between us with jobs and investment."

Arab grievances here center on the preferential treatment Israeli settlements receive in allocation of water, which is scarce and expensive for many Arab farmers. Meanwhile, civic campaigns for the removal of the Israeli military base on a hill in the center of Majdal Shams have been ignored.

In recent weeks, a group calling itself the Syrian National Alliance has been posting communiques around town calling for a new campaign against the Israeli occupation, including armed operations. "But we really don't know who they are," said Ayman Abu Jabal, 40, a former prisoner who works for Golan for Development. "So far they have not been very convincing."

Abu Jabal, a distant relative of Hail's, has followed that route before. As a member of the now-defunct Syrian Resistance Movement, he spent 12 years in Israeli jails for blowing up an Israeli military warehouse in 1985. No one was injured.

"What we want is for our rights to be the same as theirs," Abu Jabal said. "I'm not against the Jew as a person. But we want the occupation to end and for us to live in peace."

Israeli Labor Votes To Stay In Gov't (AP)

By Mark Lavie

AP, October 30, 2006

Israel's dovish Labor Party bent its ideology Sunday and voted to stay in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government, despite his intention to add an ultra-hawkish party to his ruling coalition.

The vote clears the way for Olmert to bring hard-liner Avigdor Lieberman and his party into the government, giving the premier a large cushion of parliamentary support with the approach of crucial votes, including the state budget. In the past, Lieberman has called for bombing Iran, Egypt and Palestinian population centers, as well as drawing Israel's borders to exclude most of its Arab citizens.

In a show of hands after a stormy convention, the party endorsed the stand of its leader, Defense Minister Amir Peretz, that it was better to stay in the government and influence policy than to wither away in the parliamentary opposition.

Peretz denounced Lieberman's policies. "We're talking about a man with a world view that is extreme, clear and infuriating," he said. "We will stay (in the government) in order not to let these views be realized."

Opponents, led by Cabinet Minister Ophir Pines-Paz, argued that Labor would be committing electoral suicide by sitting at the same Cabinet table with Lieberman and his hawkish Yisrael Beiteinu Party. Labor traditionally has led the dovish camp that favors compromise toward peace with the Palestinians.

Pines-Paz was expected to resign from the Cabinet, where he serves as culture, science and sports minister. Arab members of the party also were considering an exit.

Peretz dismissed his critics. "I don't need anyone to preach to me about my loyalty to peace," he told the gathering, where rivals scuffled in front of the podium. "I certainly don't need anyone to preach to me about principles of human dignity and equality."

Olmert is to convene a Cabinet session Monday to approve the addition of Yisrael Beiteinu, and the parliament is expected to give its endorsement later in the week.

Lieberman is to be the only Cabinet minister from his party, serving as deputy prime minister in charge of dealing with strategic threats against Israel, primarily the nuclear threat from Iran.

Olmert's original coalition had a seemingly comfortable majority of 67 seats in the 120-seat parliament, but Labor itself disrupted the equation when several of its lawmakers said they would vote against the budget. If the Olmert government fails to pass a budget by the end of March, it must resign.

With Lieberman's 11 seats, the coalition's strength is boosted to 78 seats, and a mini-rebellion by some of the 19 Labor Party lawmakers would not bring down the government.

Israeli Official Asks President To Step Aside (NYT)

By Greg Myre

JERUSALEM, Oct. 29 — Israel's attorney general said Sunday that President Moshe Katsav should temporarily step aside while prosecutors decide whether to charge him with sex crimes.

Mr. Katsav has come under intense pressure to resign, or at least to suspend his official duties temporarily, and the remarks by the attorney general, Menachem Mazuz, made the president's position appear even more tenuous. Two weeks ago, the police recommended that prosecutors file charges, including rape and sexual assault, after accusations were made by several women who have served on his staff.

Mr. Mazuz will make the final decision about whether to charge Mr. Katsav. That announcement could still be weeks away.

"The more serious the allegations and the farther along in the process, the obligation increases for the president to take the step of temporarily suspending his term," Mr. Mazuz said in a letter to the High Court of Justice.

Mr. Katsav, whose position is largely ceremonial, has denied any wrongdoing. "Sooner or later it will be proven that the allegations against him are false," the president's office said in a statement on Sunday evening.

An Israeli president cannot stand trial while in office. However, the Parliament can impeach him, and once out of office, a former president can be prosecuted. Mr. Katsav's seven-year term expires next year.

In a separate development, neighboring Egypt has renewed its efforts to ease Israeli-Palestinian tensions and to try to broker a deal that would free an Israeli soldier captured by Gaza militants in return for a large number of Palestinian prisoners.

Egypt said Sunday that it had invited the exiled political leader of Hamas, Khaled Meshal, who is based in Syria, to come to Cairo for discussions on a prisoner exchange.

Such talks would also address the stalled efforts by Hamas, a militant Islamic group that controls the Palestinian government, and Fatah, a secular movement, to end their feuding and to form a national unity government.

Senior Hamas leaders plan to travel to Cairo for the talks in the next few days, but Mr. Meshal will not be among them, [a news agency] reported Sunday night from Damascus, Syria.

Egyptian officials have privately expressed sharp criticism of Mr. Meshal and Hamas, which has strong links to the Muslim Brotherhood, a group that is officially banned in Egypt. The Egyptians have also expressed frustration at the inability of the Palestinian government to calm the turmoil in the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian militants, including members of Hamas, seized the Israeli soldier on June 25, and the Palestinians are seeking to swap him for a large number of Palestinian prisoners. Israeli troops, who left Gaza last year, re-entered the coastal territory after the soldier was captured.

In a related development, the Israeli newspaper Maariv reported Friday that Israel might bomb a narrow strip along Gaza's southern border in an attempt to destroy weapons-smuggling tunnels linked to Egypt.

Israel's military has not commented on the report, but it appeared to raise concerns in Egypt about further instability in Gaza.

Palestinian security officials said a Hamas militant, Baker al-Assar, 20, was killed Sunday when a tunnel he was digging from southern Gaza into Egypt collapsed.

Egyptian officials said they had redeployed security forces around the border with Gaza specifically to help stop the smuggling. They denied reports, though, that they had moved 5,000 troops to the border, which would be a violation of an agreement with Israel that allows 750 Egyptian border guards.

"Egypt is anxious to have calm on its border with Gaza and there are communications to guarantee this between the Egyptian and Palestinian sides," an Egyptian presidential spokesman, Soliman Awad, said in an interview.

Muslim Leader Dies In Nigeria Air Crash (FT)

By Dino Mahtani

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Nigeria's top Muslim leader, at least two senators and a state deputy governor were killed on Sunday when a passenger aircraft crashed shortly after take-off from the capital Abuja. The crash, involving the local ADC Airlines, is Nigeria's third big civil aviation disaster in the past year.

According to the airline, the aircraft was carrying 105 passengers and crew.

The crash will be a significant blow to the country's efforts at persuading international aviation agencies it has done enough to merit a clean bill of health in its aviation sector since embarking on urgent reforms in recent months. The sector faces an international audit next month.

The death of Muhammed Maccido, who is otherwise known as the Sultan of Sokoto, will also send shockwaves through the mainstream Islamic community in Nigeria, where half of the estimated 140m population is Muslim.

The sultan is an influential figure among the Nigerian political elite and normally would have been expected to play a role in endorsing the selection of what many Nigerians are expecting to be a Muslim candidate for presidential elections next year.

Muslim leaders will be expected to elect a new sultan after a period of mourning, and the appointment of a successor will be followed with interest by political forces in the north. While the sultan may be the spiritual head of Nigeria's Muslims, his authority depends on political leeway given to him by politicians, including the president.

President Olusegun Obasanjo yesterday ordered an investigation into the crash. He has previously blamed corruption and corner cutting for two air disasters last year that killed more than 200 people.

Sunday's crash adds yet more influential Nigerians to the country's aviation death toll. In September, 10 senior generals died in a military aircraft crash. Last year, a leading presidential adviser also died in one of the two passenger airline crashes.

The country's aviation accident investigation and prevention bureau blamed bad weather, poor runway lighting and crew incompetence for one of last year's airline crashes. But Roland Iyayi, head of the Nigerian Airspace Management Agency, has said measures are needed to counter "systemic failures" inherent in air safety infrastructure and procedures.

Nigeria, which has seen domestic air travel boom in the past few years, is due to be audited by the International Civil Aviation Organisation next month. The audit will be instrumental in determining whether Nigerian-registered air carriers, such as Virgin Nigeria, can fly to other countries, in particular the US.

Industry executives say they do not expect Nigeria to meet the main regulatory and infrastructure requirements demanded by auditors.

Nigerian Airliner Carrying 104 Crashes In Abuja (WP/AP)

By Bashir Adigun, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

ABUJA, Nigeria, Oct. 29 -- A Nigerian airliner with 104 people aboard slammed into the ground moments after takeoff Sunday, the third deadly crash of a passenger plane in less than a year in this West African country. Six people survived.

Among those killed was the man regarded as the spiritual leader of Nigeria's Muslims, and thousands of people gathered at a regional airport to receive his body.

The Boeing 737 crashed one minute after taking off from the Abuja airport, said Sam Adurogboye, an Aviation Ministry spokesman. President Olusegun Obasanjo ordered an immediate investigation into the cause of the crash, said his spokeswoman, Remi Oyo.

Rescue workers found debris from the plane, body parts and luggage strewn over an area the size of a football field. The plane went down inside the sprawling airport compound about two miles from the runway. Smoke rose from the aircraft's mangled and smoldering fuselage. Its tail hung from a tree.

Emergency workers pulled blackened corpses from the wreckage, then covered the bodies with white sheets and hauled them away in stretchers.

Through the day, airport security officials kept back anxious people seeking information about friends or loved ones.

Adurogboye said 104 passengers and crew members had been aboard the flight, and he knew of six survivors who had been taken to a hospital. "Obviously the rest are feared dead," he said.

The plane was bound for the northwest city of Sokoto, about 500 miles northwest of Abuja, the capital, state radio said, adding that it had gone down during a storm. Witnesses said there was a rainstorm around the time the aircraft took off, but rains later subsided, giving way to overcast skies.

In an announcement broadcast on state radio, the Sokoto state government announced that the sultan of Sokoto, Muhammadu Maccido, died in the crash. Maccido headed the National Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs in Nigeria. The panel determines when Muslim fasts should begin and end, and decides policy for Nigeria's 70 million Muslims.

Maccido's body was immediately flown to Sokoto, where thousands of people awaited its arrival at the airport. He was buried Sunday in accordance with Islamic custom, and the Sokoto state government declared six days of mourning.

Mustapha Shehu, spokesman for the Sokoto state government, had said earlier that the sultan's son, Muhammed Maccido, a senator, also was aboard the flight, along with Abdulrahman Shehu Shagari, son of former Nigerian president Shehu Shagari, who was in office from 1979 to 1983. Their fates were not immediately known.

Oyo said Obasanjo was "deeply and profoundly shocked and saddened. . . . He offers condolences to all Nigerians, especially family, friends and associates of those who may have been on board."

The Boeing 737-2B7 owned by ADC Airlines, a private Nigerian company, was manufactured in 1983, Adurogboye said.

Nigerian Plane Crash Kills 98, Including Top Muslim Leader (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

DAKAR, Senegal, Oct. 29 — A commercial airliner with 104 passengers and crew members on board, including the spiritual leader of Nigeria's vast Muslim population, crashed shortly after takeoff in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, on Sunday. It was the third deadly passenger plane crash in Nigeria in a little more than a year.

Six people were taken to local hospitals, aviation officials told reporters at the crash site. The other 98 people on board were presumed dead. The plane crashed just past the runway at the Abuja airport after taking off in stormy weather, and the wreckage was strewn across a wooded area beyond the runway. News agencies reported that some bodies had been recovered, but it was unclear how many.

The flight was operated by ADC Airlines, one of Nigeria's many small domestic airlines. The 23-year-old plane was a Boeing 737-2B7, The Associated Press reported, quoting an Aviation Ministry spokesman.

The plane was headed to Sokoto, the capital of a state near Nigeria's northern border. Among the passengers was the sultan of Sokoto, Muhammadu Maccido, the spiritual leader since 1996 of Nigeria's Muslims, who are believed to constitute half of the country's estimated population of 130 million.

"It is a terrible tragedy, an unimaginable loss," said Mustapha Shehu, a spokesman for the Sokoto State government, in a telephone interview just moments after the sultan's body had been brought to Sokoto for burial by a government plane. "Everyone is in mourning."

The crash was the latest in a string of disasters in Nigeria's skies. More than 200 people died in two aviation accidents in Nigeria in 2005. Last October, a flight operated by Bellview Airlines, one of the country's most popular carriers, crashed shortly after taking off from Lagos on its way to Abuja, killing 117 people.

Just two months later, a flight operated by Sosoliso Airlines crashed on the runway at Port Harcourt, the main hub of Nigeria's oil industry. Dozens of high school students on their way home for Christmas from an elite boarding school in Abuja were among the more than 100 people killed in that crash.

The two episodes, coming just months apart, prompted the government to ground the entire domestic fleet of both airlines for inspections. Nigerian aviation officials later said that sudden weather changes were to blame for both accidents.

Last month 10 senior military officials were killed in a military plane crash in Benue State.

Despite its vast oil wealth — Nigeria is the world's sixth-largest oil exporter — its infrastructure is crumbling, and traveling even a few hundred miles by road takes more than a day.

With most domestic fares running at least $100 one-way in a country where 60 percent of the people live in poverty, the airlines tend to cater to the country's business and political elite. Politicians, diplomats and prominent business people have been among the dead in recent crashes.

In addition to the sultan, several top Sokoto State officials were on the plane, Mr. Shehu said, including two senators and the deputy governor. The group had been in the capital attending a government meeting on education, Mr. Shehu said.

The death of the sultan leaves Nigeria's Muslim population without one of its most prominent voices against interreligious conflict as the country enters a contentious period leading up to elections next year. Mr. Maccido was crucial in calming religious tensions in 2002, when deadly riots broke out over a beauty pageant in northern Nigeria, and in 2004, when interreligious violence killed dozens in Plateau State.

The 2007 presidential election is likely to fan these flames again as the largely Muslim north and the largely Christian south battle over which region the country's next president will come from.

Is A Moat The Answer? (NSWK)

By Kevin Peraino And Joanna Chen

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

In search of a creative way to stop militants and weapons smugglers from infiltrating across the Egypt-Gaza border, Israelis are talking about building a six-mile moat filled with Mediterranean seawater along the southern boundary. The plan was first considered seriously in 2000; in 2004 the Defense Ministry even opened bids for construction. But the project was dropped after government legal experts feared it would require destroying hundreds of Palestinian houses along the canal route. Brig. Gen.

Tzvika Foghel, who studied the idea in 2001 as the IDF Southern Command chief of staff, says geologists warned that if the construction weren't done right, it could contaminate water supplies in both Gaza and Egypt and destabilize land under Palestinian homes. It would also have been prohibitively expensive—$250 million.

That doesn't matter so much now. After this summer's conflicts—during which militants tunneled from Gaza to Israel to capture and kill Israeli soldiers—the idea has gained new currency. Nervous Israelis are eager to put distance between themselves and their enemies. "I don't believe in coexistence," hard-liner Avigdor Lieberman, who just agreed to join Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's coalition, told NEWSWEEK recently. Neither do a growing number of his countrymen; polls show strong support for his hawkish views. Even Foghel says he's convinced the moat is "a good solution," adding that Gaza residents might grow to like relaxing by their new moat, and even fishing in it. "It will be something nice to look at," he says.

Central America: Ortega And Ollie—Again (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Joseph Contreras

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

The Bush Administration is increasingly worried that ex-Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega—once the scourge of the Reagan White House—may prevail in the first round of Nicaragua's presidential election Nov. 5. But it wasn't happy when another Reagan-era figure flew to Managua to rally opposition to Ortega. In a speech to a group of old anti-Sandinista rebels, Iran-contra figure Oliver North compared an Ortega victory to the seizure of power by Mussolini and Hitler—and charged that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez was behind Ortega. The visit blindsided officials in the U.S. Embassy, who demanded to know why North was stoking old passions. North said he was simply responding to an invitation from his old contra pals, who wanted to give him an award. "I only go where I'm invited," he said.

Bush officials are worried that Chávez is backing Ortega financially. The Venezuelan president has signed a deal to provide low-cost oil to Sandinista mayors as a way of boosting Ortega's campaign. The prospect of another leftist taking power in Latin America prompted Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to warn that an Ortega triumph might endanger a free-trade treaty with the United States. But officials are wary of saying too much—or backing one of several rival candidates—lest they too be accused of meddling.

Mexican Police Move Into Oaxaca (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Mexican federal police have moved into the southern state of Oaxaca in response to growing levels of violence that has turned the once-popular tourist destination into a virtual war zone.

President Vicente Fox decided to act after three people, including a US citizen, were shot dead on Friday in what were believed to be skirmishes between local police and protesters.

The presence of federal forces – about 3,000 arrived in and around the city of Oaxaca on Saturday – is the latest reminder of how far things have spun out of control from what initially began in May as a strike by teachers who were demanding more pay.

Mr Fox, who ends his six-year mandate on December 1, is desperate to hand over a peaceful and law-abiding country to Felipe Calderón, the president-elect and a member of Mr Fox's centre-right National Action Party (PAN), and Oaxaca has become the biggest test of his ability to do so.

Last week most of the state's 50,000 teachers voted to return to classes after five months of occupying the colonial city's main square. But the remaining teachers, together with members of the People's Popular Assembly of Oaxaca (Appo), an umbrella group of indigenous, social and labour organisations, have vowed to continue the resistance until Ulises Ruiz, the state's governor, resigns.

The teachers and the Appo accuse Mr Ruiz, of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), of electoral fraud and authoritarianism. On Saturday, Appo leaders rejected the federal government's demands to clear the barricades that the protesters have raised all around the city to prevent reprisals from local police.

Flavio Sosa, leader of the Appo, said on the weekend that Mr Ruiz's resignation is not negotiable, although he said that his organisation is willing to continue talks with the federal government.

Police Storm Oaxaca To Suppress Protest (WP/AP)

By Mark Stevenson

DOJ_NMG_0087681

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 29 -- On the order of President Vicente Fox, federal police backed by armored vehicles and water cannons tore down barricades and stormed embattled Oaxaca on Sunday, seizing control of the city center from protesters who had held it for five months.

A 15-year-old boy guarding one barricade was killed by a tear gas canister, said Jesica Sanchez, a human rights worker.

The conflict has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster.

With helicopters roaring overhead, police earlier entered the city, normally a picturesque tourist destination, from several sides. They marched up to a final metal barrier blocking the center, but pulled back as protesters armed with sticks attacked them from behind, hurling burning tires. The air filled with black smoke and tear gas.

Some demonstrators used syringes to pierce their arms and legs, then painted signs in their own blood decrying the police.

As night fell, however, protesters abandoned the center and regrouped at a local university. They pledged to continue their battle to persuade Gov. Ulises Ruiz Ortiz to resign, even as police tore down the banners and tents in the center that had served as demonstration headquarters.

At least eight people have died in the unrest since August, including Brad Will, an American and volunteer correspondent for the Web site Indymedia.org who was shot dead Friday along with two Mexican protesters. Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had for months resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to quell the protests.

In Oaxaca, the teachers protest is an annual rite that began 26 years ago. The protests are usually peaceful and generally last a week or two, but this year the teachers became infuriated when Ruiz sent police to forcefully remove demonstrators from the city's idyllic squares.

Last week, teachers tentatively ratified an agreement that would allow them to return to classes at an unspecified date and receive 30 percent raises spread over six years. Their unmet central demand, Ruiz's resignation, threatened to undermine the fragile pact.

Police Start Push To Retake Oaxaca (WT/AP)

By Mark Stevenson

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico -- Federal police with assault rifles and riot shields advanced into Oaxaca yesterday, bypassing or extinguishing barricades of burning tires and tree trunks in this normally picturesque tourist destination that has been racked by five months of protests and violence.

Officers in bulky black helmets lined a highway just shy of a sign reading "Welcome to Oaxaca" and used fire extinguishers to douse flames at a roadblock abandoned by retreating demonstrators.

Flanked by armored vehicles, water cannons and bulldozers and with helicopters roaring overhead, they faced a knot of protesters who yelled insults and readied piles of stones to hurl. Some protesters used syringes to pierce their arms and legs, then paint signs decrying the police in blood.

In other parts of the city, columns of police climbed over burned cars and moved past hijacked tractor-trailers, buses and other debris used to block streets, in their march downtown. Instead of offering resistance, many protesters retreated, pledging a massive defensive in the city center.

Some residents emerged from their homes to cheer and wave white flags at marching police.

What began in late May as a teachers strike in this colonial southern Mexican city spiraled into chaos as anarchists, students and Indian groups seized the central plaza and barricaded streets throughout the city to demand the ouster of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz.

Police and state forces, often in plain clothes, have shot at protesters, setting off clashes in which at least eight persons have died.

President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to Oaxaca until Saturday, a day after gunfire killed a U.S. activist-journalist and two residents.

Although some protesters retreated, others fortified their posts at street blockades, pledging a street-by-street defense against the Federal Preventive Police. Bertha Munoz, one of the movement's leaders, said many of the demonstrators were peaceful.

"How can we confront them? We have already seen the R-15 [rifles] and AK-47s they carry," she said. "What do our people have? Most have just come to bring them flowers."

The Interior Department issued an ominous statement demanding that protesters give up their occupation of the city immediately, but officials said yesterday that they hoped negotiations could avoid further bloodshed.

Protesters accused Mr. Ruiz of rigging his 2004 election and using thugs to kill or intimidate political opponents. They say they will not return home without his resignation.

In Mexico City, several hundred supporters of the Oaxaca protests converged on a hotel where Mr. Ruiz was rumored to be staying, damaging the grounds around the entrance and screaming, "Murderer."

The protesters estimated that 4,000 federal police officers had taken up positions on the edges of the city. There were no official reports, however, on how many officers were sent to Oaxaca, which is the capital of the state of the same name.

Mexican Federal Police And Army Move To Retake Oaxaca (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 29 — Federal forces moved to take back this picturesque tourist town one cobblestone street at a time on Sunday, bashing through barricades and pushing back activists who had seized the downtown five months ago in an increasingly ugly dispute with the state governor.

Police officers wearing riot gear and carrying shields were backed by water cannons, police helicopters and heavily armed soldiers as they marched from all directions toward Oaxaca's main square, the Zócalo, which used to draw tourists but in recent months has been a giant encampment for an array of groups intent on toppling Ulises Ruiz, the governor of Oaxaca State.

The police, estimated to number in the thousands, met resistance in some areas. Demonstrators clutching rocks and sticks tried to stop them. Buses shuttling police officers to the center of town were pelted with stones, and bonfires in the middle of streets sent huge plumes of smoke into the sky.

By Sunday night, the Zócalo was ringed by police officers in riot gear and appeared to be controlled by federal forces.

The tension here spilled over into Mexico City on Sunday, with supporters of the Oaxaca protesters surrounding a hotel where Governor Ruiz was thought to be staying and shouting: "Murderer! Murderer!"

The operation, ordered by President Vicente Fox in his final month in office, did not become the bloodbath that many had feared. Mr. Fox ordered the raid on Saturday after two protesters and an American activist working as a journalist here were killed Friday, the latest in a string of deaths for which protesters blamed provocateurs linked to the government.

Protesters said the police killed one of their supporters in the raid, although police officials did not confirm the death.

The Fox administration said in a statement on Sunday night that it had acted because state and local authorities could no longer guarantee public security and "radical groups, out of control, had put at risk the peace of the citizenry."

The unrest began in May as a teachers' strike. But when Mr. Ruiz sent the police to break up the peaceful demonstrations, other activists joined in and the situation quickly spiraled out of control.

The original dispute with the teachers was recently settled with a pay raise. The teachers have said they intend to return to classes on Monday, allowing 1.3 million children to resume their studies.

But on Sunday, many demonstrators, some with bandanas pulled over their noses to protect against tear gas, vowed to continue pressing for the removal of Mr. Ruiz. They accuse him of rigging the 2004 gubernatorial election and ruling the state with an iron hand.

"The very hour that the governor leaves, we will stop these protests and go home," said Joel Santiago, 38, who stood on the front lines of one standoff with officers on Sunday. "The people are tired of this man treating us as though we're nothing."

Some residents were clearly tired of the protesters, as well. As troops advanced, some people came out of their homes to applaud their arrival, and what they hoped was the end of the lawlessness that had taken over Oaxaca. "Thank you for coming to the rescue of our city," said Teófilo Rodríguez, 56, a businessman.

Oaxaca, a six-hour drive southeast of Mexico City, is known for its colonial charm, with centuries-old architecture and a distinct regional cuisine. But on Sunday it more closely resembled an urban jungle. Protesters from the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, or A.P.P.O., a loose coalition of interests that had laid siege to the Zócalo and taken over radio stations, hustled through the streets, taunting the authorities and then fleeing at each advance.

Protest slogans were painted on buildings everywhere and the burned-out remains of cars and buses litter the roads. On Sunday night, protestors were torching buses in the center of town.

On the main highway leading to Mexico City, police officers in riot gear spent most of Sunday standing in formation, eyeing several hundred protesters manning a barricade of stones and tree trunks 200 feet away.

At one point, a woman approached the officers and stuck white roses and carnations in their all-black uniforms. "It makes me sad that they want to kill my people," she said. "I want to change their hearts."

Other demonstrators drew their own blood to protest the arrival of the authorities. They had health workers stick needles in their veins, and the blood that flowed out was then dripped onto street signs and used to paint messages on their chests.

At about 3 p.m., the police officers began advancing. Water cannons were fired on people who did not clear the way. Chaos ensued as men, women and children fled.

Elsewhere, bulldozers cleared some of the hundreds of barricades that had been erected around the town.

The roots of the conflict have less to do with leftist ideology or a peasant uprising than with political patronage and old political rivalries, people here say.

Over the past two decades, as Mexico's political system has opened up, brutally poor Oaxaca has remained a virtual one-party state, controlled by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, the machinelike organization that ruled the entire country until Mr. Fox's victory in 2000.

After taking office in a disputed election, Mr. Ruiz eliminated millions in community subsidies and began a series of public works projects that involved condemning land, often taking it from farmers at rock-bottom prices, protesters say. He also forbade marches and protests in the Zócalo, angering groups that routinely used protests to demand more government aid.

"He didn't realize it, but he was closing the escape valves that let the pressure off," said Flavio Sosa, the head of the New Left of Oaxaca, a political pressure group, and a leader of the A.P.P.O.

When Mr. Ruiz sent in poorly trained riot police officers to oust striking teachers from the Zócalo on June 14, the crisis began.

"This is a fight about power, about money, and the problem of poverty, as well," said Rosa Nida Villalobos, the head of Priista Women, a group that supports the governor, in an interview last week. "It's a monster with a thousand heads and a thousand interests."

Mexican Police Storm Protesters In Oaxaca (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Reed Johnson

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Oaxaca, Mexico — Thousands of federal riot police using tear gas and water cannons battled demonstrators in this once-picturesque state capital Sunday, prompting striking teachers and leftist groups to abandon the central square they had held for five months.

After hours of smoky clashes in the streets, the end of a political crisis that had left at least nine dead and tested President Vicente Fox came quietly.

With police halted at the edge of the central square, or Zocalo, late Sunday, demonstrators who had encamped there since May demanding the resignation of the state's governor started heading home.

"We've decided we're going to leave this space," said Daniel Reyes, a spokesman for the striking teachers.

But Reyes added that a march was planned for today, ending at the Zocalo.

"This is the heart and the house of the people," he said. "This is ours, and we'll take it back peacefully."

Protest leaders also said that a 15-year-old boy had been shot and killed, a report that could not be verified.

About 4,600 Federal Preventive Police officers moved into the sprawling city of 275,000 people about 230 miles southeast of Mexico City on Sunday morning after three people, including an American, were killed Friday.

With water cannons and riot shields, police dispersed protesters from behind barricades of rocks, tree trunks and sheet metal.

They were met with taunts, pleas, scoldings and the occasional hurled rock. Some demonstrators threw Molotov cocktails, triggering a return volley of tear gas.

Police then retreated to the edge of the Zocalo and waited for several hours before protesters started leaving about sundown.

Most of the resistance appeared to be peaceful. Many protesters stood face to face with the rows of incoming officers, chanting slogans. Others cut themselves with knives and syringes, smearing their blood on placards and the Mexican flag. Local websites reported about 50 arrests.

Protest leaders voiced anger at police tactics.

"The police came in fighting, as is their habit," Flavio Sosa, a leader of the protest coalition, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, said in a radio interview.

The federal forces were dispatched over the weekend by Fox to end an increasingly ugly standoff between local government authorities and the union representing 70,000 striking public school teachers.

The dispute over better pay and working conditions had mushroomed into a larger political struggle as a loose coalition of trade unionists, indigenous groups, anarchists and leftist activists backed the teachers' call for Gov. Ulises Ruiz to resign.

Teachers union leader Enrique Rueda Pacheco said the protesters' demand for Ruiz's resignation was not negotiable.

"We don't agree with an operation of this nature they will resolve the conflict, because it's not going to resolve it," Rueda Pacheco said in a radio interview. "There are going to remain some wounds that this police operation isn't going to be able to wipe away."

The protesters accuse Ruiz of rigging the 2004 gubernatorial election, and more generally of maintaining the system of autocratic rule and patronage politics used by his Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, during the 71 years it held a virtual monopoly on Mexican government.

Ruiz, speaking to local media Sunday, ruled out resignation.

Famous for its graceful colonial-era buildings and vibrant indigenous cuisine and art, the city of Oaxaca is now a trash-strewn, graffiti-covered combat zone that has seen its normally flourishing tourist trade fall drastically.

Fox's decision to send in federal police, after insisting for months the standoff was a local problem, caps a strategic battle to wrest control of the state capital without sparking a major altercation at a time of great political tension nationwide.

The country has been on edge for months after a disputed presidential election in July, escalating drug-related violence along the U.S. border and the Pacific coast, and a high-profile street brawl in May pitting federal and state police against residents of the town of San Salvador Atenco, near Mexico City.

A week ago, it seemed the conflict in Oaxaca might be at an end, after teachers tentatively agreed to return to work in exchange for a 30% raise over six years.

But the killing of American journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, and two Mexican men Friday apparently prompted Fox to send in federal police, ostensibly to prevent further bloodshed.

Will, a photojournalist with an Internet-based alternative news agency, was shot in the abdomen while trying to conduct interviews at a street barricade.

Fox has been criticized by political opponents who charge that by not intervening sooner in Oaxaca, the federal government was seeking to placate Ruiz, because Fox's successor, President-elect Felipe Calderon, will need the support of the PRI to govern.

Fox's decision to send police to Oaxaca also goes against a long-standing reticence to use federal forces against protesters, after the government's brutal suppression of demonstrations in the 1960s and 1970s during the so-called dirty war sparked international condemnation.

The long-term aftermath for Fox and Calderon is unclear. The Zocalo, once filled with the tents of protesters, began to be covered again — this time with the tarps of soldiers and police.

Brazil's Da Silva Wins Re-Election, But Campaign Rifts May Persist (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett And Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Using charisma and a common touch to overcome corruption scandals, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva easily won a second four-year term in Brazil's balloting.

Mr. da Silva, a pragmatic leftist who gained respect from financial markets in his first term, led centrist challenger Geraldo Alckmin by 60.8% to 39.2%, with 99.6% of the vote counted.

Despite the wide margin of victory, Mr. da Silva, Brazil's first blue-collar president, will face a formidable challenge to heal the rifts left by a bitter, bruising campaign that played on class and regional differences. Fallout from the electoral fight, including a criminal investigation of alleged smear tactics by operatives of Mr. da Silva's Workers Party, could undercut Mr. da Silva's ability to push the legislative changes needed to spark Brazil's slow-growing economy.

To overcome a series of corruption scandals during his administration, Mr. da Silva rallied his base using a strategy of attacking "elites," who he warned would cut social-welfare programs. The results of yesterday's election exposed deep divisions within Brazilian society.

Mr. da Silva won 77% of the vote in the vast, arid Northeast, where the president was born and where people tend to be poorer, darker-skinned and less-educated than in the South of Brazil. The Northeast has benefited from the administration's program to provide welfare stipends to poor families.

But Mr. Alckmin won in the more developed South, outpolling Mr. da Silva 53%-47%. Mr. Alckmin also won by four points in his home state of São Paulo, center of much of Brazil's industry and media. Overall, Mr. da Silva won in four of Brazil's five geographical regions. The shrillness of the campaign prompted two of Brazil's newsmagazines to devote recent cover stories to the polarization between the country's poorer north and richer south. "Two Brazils after the vote?" asked one publication, Veja, while another, IstoE, exhorted, "We must unite Brazil."

The wounds left by the election may make it harder for Mr. da Silva to take steps to boost an economy that has grown an average of 2.8% a year during his first term, far below the pace of Brazil's emerging-market peers. Economists say Brazil needs to overhaul its labor, tax and social-security laws to shrink government and make the business environment less costly and bureaucratic.

Mr. da Silva will have to move quickly. "His best chance to get the needed reforms passed will be early into his administration, since his power will decline the closer he gets to the end of his second term," says Susan Kaufman Purcell, director of the Center for Hemispheric Policy at the University of Miami. Brazilian presidents are constitutionally barred from a third successive term.

Mr. da Silva may well begin his second term ensnarled in further controversy. Mr. Alckmin's coalition has motioned for Brazil's Electoral Court to investigate whether Mr. da Silva used his office to plot and later cover up a case in which Workers Party operatives were caught with $770,000 that prosecutors allege they were going to use to buy a bogus dossier linking a leading opposition politician to a procurement scam.

If the court finds that Mr. da Silva was involved, the attorney general could file suit to strip the president of his office. Mr. da Silva has denied involvement and hasn't been charged. Most analysts don't envision such a scenario. "If the dossier has not done [Mr. da Silva] in by now, it is improbable it will in the future," says Johns Hopkins University Latin America scholar Riordan Roett.

But dealing with the dossier mess could dissipate the da Silva administration's energies and make it harder to coexist with Mr. Alckmin's Social Democratic Party, the main opposition. In a radio interview last week, former Social Democratic President Fernando Henrique Cardoso said the party wouldn't seek to impeach Mr. da Silva. But he added, "That doesn't mean mistakes go unpunished. ... Are we going to pretend [the dossier affair] doesn't exist?"

With many of his closest allies having been forced to resign because of corruption scandals, Mr. da Silva has been reaching out to some business and political heavyweights who might bring new blood into a second-term administration. In the past few months, Mr. da Silva has been courting industrialists, including Jorge Gerdau, chairman of the giant steelmaker Gerdau SA, say people familiar with the matter.

Mr. da Silva is also considering an administration post for Antonio Delfim Netto, a former finance minister during a relatively prosperous period of the 1970s known as the "Brazilian Miracle," according to local media reports and political watchers. Besides being well-regarded by business, Mr. Netto is a member of a large party whose support Mr. da Silva will need to push his agenda through Congress.

Despite political roadblocks, Brazil's economy has some trends working in its favor. Besides healthy international demand for Brazilian commodities, such as soybeans and iron ore, Brazilian interest rates have been moving steadily downward. They have fallen to 13.75% from 19% a year ago.

Brazil's President Roars Back To Win Vote (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 29 — Overcoming a series of corruption and political scandals that tarred his image and undermined his credibility, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil won a landslide re-election victory in a runoff vote on Sunday.

With 99 percent of the vote counted, Mr. da Silva, a former factory worker and labor union leader running as the candidate of the left-wing Workers Party, had 60.8 percent of the vote. The percentage of the vote going to his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin of the center-left Brazilian Social Democratic Party, dropped in comparison with the 41.6 percent he won in the first round of balloting on Oct. 1, when Mr. da Silva fell just short of the majority he needed to win outright.

"This is an extraordinary result, one that gives him a legitimacy that all the accusations had perhaps broken," said Jairo Nicolau, a television commentator and political science professor at the Candido Mendes University here, referring to Mr. da Silva. "It's one thing to win a narrow victory and something else altogether to register this level of support after all that has happened."

Wearing a T-shirt that proclaimed "The victory is Brazil's," Mr. da Silva spoke to supporters at a hotel in São Paulo on Sunday night, saying that "Brazil is living a magical moment" and expressing his gratitude to voters for their faith in him. "The people knew how to distinguish between what was true and what wasn't," he said, before adding that he had "learned a lot" in power and promising to make a greater effort to combat corruption.

Mr. da Silva took office in January 2003, promising a new era of social justice and clean government in this nation of 185 million people, the world's fourth-largest democracy. But his luster began to fade a year later, when an aide was caught on film soliciting campaign donations from numbers-game kingpins here.

Then, in May of last year, a much larger scandal erupted. Though it was initially limited to corruption in government contracts, investigations by congressional committees and the news media soon established the existence of an illegal multimillion-dollar slush fund used to finance Mr. da Silva's 2002 campaign, and to pay off legislators from small political parties to support his government.

The metastasizing scandals forced the resignation of Mr. da Silva's chief of staff and his minister of finance, as well as the president, treasurer and secretary general of the party Mr. da Silva founded in 1980 and has led ever since. As a result, opinion polls taken late last year consistently indicated that the president would be defeated if he ran for re-election.

To make matters worse, the police last month apprehended operatives of Mr. da Silva's party as they were about to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently thought would damage Mr. Alckmin's chances. Though that weakened Mr. da Silva in the first round of balloting, he benefited from an improved economy and a welfare program that delivers a monthly stipend of about $45 to nearly 12 million poor families.

"Lula's turnaround is based mostly on the economy," said Alberto Carlos Almeida, a political scientist. "That, combined with the social programs, gives the electorate the impression that he is really taking care of the poor. There is the appearance of stability, and so people want continuity."

After being chastised by the first-round vote on Oct. 1, Mr. da Silva adopted a new campaign slogan: "Don't trade the sure thing for the dubious." That clearly resonated with the working-class voters who have always provided his electoral base.

"Lula cares about the poor, and that's what matters to me, more than all this talk about corruption, which we've always had," Jane Cunha, a 56-year-old maid, said at a polling place here Sunday morning. "I earn the minimum wage, and thanks to him, my salary has gone up $20 a month and the price of food has gone down enough that I'm eating a lot more meat than in the past."

Mr. da Silva has governed on the right, at least as regards his conservative economic policy. He has run up the kind of budget surpluses that delight Wall Street and the International Monetary Fund, and bank profits are at an all-time high.

But in recent weeks, he has "campaigned on the left," in the words of Marco Aurelio Garcia, Mr. da Silva's national security adviser. A loan repayment to the I.M.F., for example, was repackaged as Mr. da Silva giving the organization its walking papers, and telling it to keep its nose out of Brazil's affairs.

In addition, the president repeatedly accused Mr. Alckmin of planning to dismantle the government's social welfare programs and to privatize state-owned companies and banks.

"Alckmin was pushed to the right and placed on the defensive, and was never able to get out of that posture," Mr. Nicolau said. "He could neither defend himself nor offer his own program."

As is often the case, the candidates' personalities also played a part in voters' calculations. Mr. da Silva never passed up an opportunity to refer to his humble origins, similar to those of a majority of the electorate, while Mr. Alckmin, a physician whose specialty is anesthesiology, proved unable to shake his image as a bland and somewhat pedantic son of the middle class.

"I think Alckmin had the better platform, but he lacks charisma," said Renato Bruzzi, a 57- year-old engineer who voted for the challenger nonetheless. "Lula is a fighter and the people identify with him. Alckmin is well-qualified to be a good president. But he has that professorial air that irritates people a bit."

Mr. Alckmin sought to capitalize on the corruption scandals, making them the centerpiece of his campaign. But he was perceived as being too aggressive on the subject, and the lack of progress in the official investigation of the dossier scandal undermined his argument that Mr. da Silva was ultimately responsible.

"Because of all the corruption denunciations, I voted for Alckmin in the first round, based on emotion," said Valmir Moura, a 38-year-old office clerk here. "But this time I stopped to reason things through, and I realized his whole campaign is based on nothing but accusations and that he hasn't presented a program for governing. So I went back to Lula."

Brazilian President Wins Second Term By Sizable Margin (WP)

By Monte Reel

DOJ_NMG_0087687

RIO DE JANIERO, Oct. 29 -- Brazilians cast a vote of confidence for President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva on Sunday, granting a landslide victory to the former union leader whose first term was marked by a significant reduction of poverty and by corruption scandals that implicated some of his closest aides.

Lula received about 60 percent of the votes, outpacing former Sao Paulo state Gov. Geraldo Alckmin by more than 20 points.

During the campaign, Lula cast himself as the champion of the country's poor, touting a 19 percent decrease in poverty rates, minimum wage increases and millions of new jobs. But he also had to defend himself against several corruption allegations, the most recent of which was an accusation that his campaign had paid for damaging information against his political opponents. That accusation dominated headlines before the first-round vote on Oct. 1, when Lula narrowly failed to win a majority, forcing Sunday's runoff against Alckmin.

During a victory speech Sunday night, Lula thanked voters for rejecting the allegations and credited a rising standard of living among the poor as a key to his victory.

"Above all, the people felt they were improving -- no one can be opposed to that idea," Lula said. "The people felt -- at their tables, on their plates and in their pockets -- their lives getting better."

Lula, 61, grew up in poverty, dropping out of school in the fifth grade and working as a shoeshine boy, peanut vendor and lathe operator. During the country's military dictatorship of the 1970s and '80s, he became a union leader and a prominent voice of opposition. He was elected president of the world's fifth-largest country in 2002, becoming a by-the-bootstraps symbol of success in a country where two-thirds of the population lives on less than $500 a month.

His first term's signature program extended welfare benefits to more than 11 million low-income families on the condition that their children attend school and get health checkups. Such programs have helped increase the spending power of the poorest tenth of the population by about 23 percent.

"During the first round, I didn't vote for Lula because of all of the corruption, but this time -- at the last minute -- I decided to vote for him," said Lucia Moraes de Souza, 42, a cashier in a market here. "He has done a lot to help the poor and the middle classes. Alckmin to me looks like he was born rich."

Alckmin, 54, a former doctor, had pinned much of his election hopes on the scandals, which began more than a year ago with congressional vote-buying evidence against Lula's political party. That scandal forced cabinet minister Jose Dirceu to resign. Lula's finance minister also stepped down after being accused of involvement in a kickback scheme for municipal contracts. Alckmin tried to cast himself as a counterpoint, adopting the slogan: "For a Decent Brazil."

"People have had enough of the scandals. They don't want to hear about them anymore," Rogerio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo, said before Sunday's balloting. "There has been little new evidence of wrongdoing, so very few people are paying attention to it."

Alckmin's promises of lower taxes and more rapid growth of the gross domestic product also failed to energize voters. That the economy grew by only about 2.5 percent last year -- one of the most sluggish rates in Latin America -- seemed less important to many voters than the lowered inflation and currency gains of the past four years. For many, Alckmin was simply the person to direct protest votes toward, a passive foil in an election completely defined by the charismatic but controversial Lula.

"This has nothing to do with Alckmin," said Gerson Costa, 37, a graphic designer who voted for Alckmin on Sunday. "It's a clear referendum on Lula. In 2002, I voted for Lula because I thought, 'This guy will be different.' I was wrong, and now I can't stand him."

During his first term, Lula approached foreign policy pragmatically, preferring to play the role of negotiator rather than firebrand. Lula has preserved free-market economic reforms implemented by his predecessor, Fernando Henrique Cardoso, and has tried to serve as a communicator able to maintain generally friendly relations with both Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez and President Bush. On Sunday he said that he has tried to encourage regional trade alliances, citing his strong support of South America's Mercosur trading bloc as an example of his regional leadership.

Analysts said that in his second term, Lula will be pressured to enact major reforms of Brazil's large labor sector and enormous pension system, which many believe could prevent the country from reaching growth rates needed to sustain the poverty reduction measures Lula achieved during his first term.

Brazil's President Easily Wins 2nd Term (AP)

By Stan Lehman

AP, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087688

President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva brushed aside corruption allegations and won re-election in a landslide as Brazilians rewarded their first working-class leader for diminishing grinding poverty and improving the economy of Latin America's largest nation.

The leftist former union leader cruised to a runoff victory Sunday with strong support from tens of millions of poor voters, easily topping center-right rival Geraldo Alckmin, whose tepid campaign style and robotic image failed to win over ordinary Brazilians.

With 99 percent of the votes counted, Silva had 61 percent support compared to 39 percent for Alckmin, Sao Paulo state's former governor.

"We're going to do a lot better in my second term than we did in the first," Silva told cheering supporters in a Sao Paulo hotel. "The foundation is in place, and now we have to get to work."

Beaming in a white T-shirt emblazoned with "It's Brazil's Victory" in the yellow and green colors of the Brazilian flag, Silva promised to boost growth and reduce inequality to put the country on track to reach the ranks of developed nations.

Alckmin congratulated Silva in a telephone call, then told reporters he planned to stay in politics but didn't outline his next steps. He made no reference to the corruption allegations against Silva's party that he pressed during the campaign.

"Life and democracy are similar. Sometimes you win, sometimes you have hard times," Alckmin said.

Silva's win came after Alckmin made a surprisingly strong showing in a first round of voting on Oct. 1. The vote went to a second round after Silva failed to get 50 percent plus one vote required for an outright win.

But Silva had the firm support of Brazil's poor, who have benefited over the past three years as Silva increased social spending without raising taxes. Silva also overcame corruption scandals that tarnished the image of his administration.

While Alckmin was seen as more business-friendly, investors and big business from Brazil to Wall Street gave high marks to Silva's conservative economic policies that prompted slow and sustainable economic growth with rising foreign investment.

While Silva came to power four years ago by employing strong leftist rhetoric, he ended up governing as a centrist and is considered much more moderate than South American leftist leaders like Bolivia's Evo Morales and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. Analysts said Silva probably won't change much in his second term.

His Workers Party has been battered for two years by charges of vote-buying and illegal campaign financing, scandals that have cost the former labor leader and lathe operator his reputation as a bastion of political ethics.

Nearly 126 million Brazilians voted in Sunday's runoff elections for president and for governor in 10 of Brazil's 27 states.

Polls before the first round of voting had predicted Silva would win outright then, but his campaign was tripped up after the news media ran photos of $770,000 in cash that members of his Workers Party allegedly planned to spend purchasing an incriminating file about Alckmin and his allies.

Regardless, Alckmin failed to make the corruption charges stick to Silva during the second round.

Instead, Silva battered his opponent with accusations that the former governor of Brazil's richest state would privatize cherished state industries and end the popular Family Allowance program that provides monthly payouts to 11 million poor families as long as they keep their children in school and get them vaccinated.

Silva managed to funnel more money to the program because of the country's improving economy and through more aggressive tax collection, and Alckmin was forced to defend himself by saying he would maintain the program, which has helped lift millions out of poverty.

Also, Silva managed to reduce Brazil's notoriously high inflation through high interest rates, and prices of staples such as rice and beans even dropped.

Aloisio Pisco, a 36-year-old doorman, said Silva's handling of the economy earned him the right to a second term.

"Lula, he's the best; he's created jobs and prices are cheaper," Pisco said after voting in Sao Paulo.

Others said Alckmin deserved high marks for his adept administration of Sao Paulo state.

"I thought Alckmin was better prepared to become president," said Reginaldo Fernando Pittarelli, 29-year-old machinery designer. "And I would have never voted for Lula because of all the corruption surrounding his government."

Lula Wins Easy Victory In Brazil Election (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley In São Paulo

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil won a decisive victory in the country's presidential election last night.

With 99 per cent of the votes counted, Mr Lula da Silva had won 60.8 per cent compared with 39.2 per cent for his challenger, Geraldo Alckmin, of the centrist opposition PSDB.

With victory secure, Mr Lula da Silva told supporters he would follow “tough fiscal policies” in his second mandates. He added: “At the same time, I am convinced that the solution for Brazil’s problems [lies in] economic growth and income distribution,” including increases in the national minimum wage at rates ahead of the rate of inflation.

He predicted Brazil’s economy would accelerate next year because of increased investments in ports, roads and other infrastructure projects. “We have already predicted for next year an expansion of 5 per cent. I think Brazil may grow by 5 per cent or 6 per cent.” Brazil’s economy is expected to grow about 3 per cent this year.

The president was forced into a surprise second-round run-off after failing to win an outright majority in the first round on October 1, when Brazilians also voted for state governorships and state and federal legislatures.

Then, Mr Lula da Silva won 48.6 per cent of the vote against 41.6 per cent for Mr Alckmin. The vote for Mr Alckmin was bigger than predicted and appeared to have given him a chance of victory in the run-off.

Mr Lula da Silva has won solid support among the country’s poor – the majority of voters – for his income distribution initiatives and other welfare programmes. Before the first round he was expected to win an outright majority mainly on the basis of overwhelming support in the poorer north-east of the country.

But his lead evaporated before the first round when members of his Workers’ party (PT) campaign team were implicated in an attempt to smear the opposition’s candidate for the governorship of São Paulo state. The scandal served as a reminder of the string of corruption allegations that have dogged Mr Lula da Silva’s administration for much of his four-year term.

The president pulled ahead quickly in campaigning for the second round after he and his aides began branding the PSDB as a rightwing party adverse to any state involvement in the economy.

They made particular play of the former PSDB government’s record on privatisation. Large parts of the state economy were privatised in the 1990s and, although standards of public services such as telephony have improved dramatically, public service tariffs have also risen sharply and privatisation remains deeply unpopular.

The PT’s anti-liberal rhetoric during the second round has caused consternation among many economists, who see it as a sign that spending cuts, needed to release money for investment and growth, are less likely under a second Lula administration than the first.

Brazil's Lula Captures A Second Term (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Marcelo Soares

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Sao Paulo, Brazil — A chastened President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won a landslide victory Sunday, gaining a second term as leader of Latin America's largest nation.

With 99% of the ballots counted, official tallies showed the leftist incumbent with 61% of the vote, compared with 39% for his challenger, former Sao Paulo Gov. Geraldo Alckmin of the centrist Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

As the victory became clear and the chief of the electoral court declared the lead insurmountable, Alckmin called the president Sunday evening to offer congratulations.

Polls had shown the president, known as Lula, leading by more than 20 percentage points going into Sunday's vote after he failed to garner a simple majority to win the Oct. 1 general election.

Analysts said Lula's unremitting portrayal of Alckmin as a corporate lackey intent on giving away the government to private investors put the challenger on the defensive.

On the streets of this industrial city, activists wearing the red of Lula's Workers' Party started celebrating before the official results were announced.

"We in Brazil have the second opportunity to elect a working man," said Rosangela Rigo, 42, a psychologist dressed in red who was waiting in line for a movie after voting for Lula.

A smiling, relaxed Lula struck a magnanimous tone as he voted at a state school in Sao Bernardo do Campo, the industrial suburb near here where he got his start as an up-from-the-assembly-line union activist confronting corrupt bosses and the former military dictatorship.

'Magic moment'

Despite his first-round disappointment, Lula thanked God for the runoff vote, calling it a "magic moment" that galvanized his supporters.

"It was a way for the people to demand more of the candidates," Lula said of the second-round vote. "I'm happy because the Brazilian people recognized the work of the past four years and were very generous."

In brief remarks, Lula returned to trademark themes, promising to enhance education and improve income distribution in a nation of 185 million people that is widely regarded as among the world's more unequal societies.

Alckmin's candidacy was always a long shot, but corruption scandals swirling around Lula and his party sapped support and forced the runoff.

Several minor leftist candidates dismayed at Lula's economic pragmatism and his party's corruption also drew support away from the president in the Oct. 1 election. But the runoff featured two candidates, and many on the left seemed to think they had no choice but to vote for Lula.

"I voted painfully for Lula," said Cristina Figueiro, 35, a lawyer in Sao Paulo. "But when it comes to the second round, one has to choose between the dirty and the badly washed."

The president's backers said Lula would probably emerge stronger than ever after Sunday's vote. But opponents countered that Lula's poor early showing meant he would have to compromise more with the opposition on a range of economic and social challenges confronting Brazil.

Lacking a majority in Congress, Lula will be obliged to form coalitions to help push through his planned reforms.

The president has pledged to expand social service programs for the poor and working class, bolster the minimum wage, bring down interest rates and increase a desultory economic growth rate that has deeply worried many Brazilians, as has increasing crime.

Survived a scandal

Days before the Oct. 1 vote, the news media in Brazil published photographs showing stacks of cash totaling more than $700,000 that Lula backers allegedly planned to use to purchase information incriminating Alckmin's party.

Lula was forced to dismiss several advisors, and the scandal cost him votes in the first election.

Lula started off the second phase of the campaign slowly, stumbling in the first of four debates and acknowledging his poor performance. He had avoided debates altogether in the first round, apparently confident of victory.

But the charismatic incumbent eventually gained momentum and flashed the populist charm that helped propel him to office in 2002 on his fourth try at the presidency.

In the monthlong campaign, Lula, 61, painted Alckmin as a technocrat eager to slice social service programs begun during Lula's term and sell off public assets such as the national bank, postal service, the government-owned energy conglomerate Petrobras, and even the Amazon.

Alckmin denied the charges, at times donning jackets and caps emblazoned with the logos of state-owned companies. But his party's history of privatizing government assets left many poor and working-class workers wary that he might cater to his wealthy supporters at their expense.

"State ownership versus privatization became a mandatory theme in the political debate," said Helgio Trindade, a political scientist in Porto Alegre.

Some observers said Alckmin might have overplayed his image as a competent executive poised to topple Brazil's first working-class president. Lula's supporters rallied to the cry of defending the "people's president."

Alckmin "showed himself as a good manager, the manager of Brazil Co. But Brazil is not a private company, it's a country, and he was not prepared for that kind of debate," said Demetrio Magnoli, a sociologist and columnist in Sao Paulo.

Many Brazilians have commented on the need to heal wounds after an acrimonious campaign that revealed stark divisions between the poor north, where Lula ran strong, and the comparatively wealthy south, the base of Alckmin's support.

Experts have spoken of a U.S.-style red state vs. blue state rift that threatens to divide the country even more in coming years.

"You know I am a peaceful man," Lula said during one of his final campaign stops, his reelection seemingly assured. "Political parties understand that there's a time to fight and a time to vote and manage the country."

Brazilian President Lula Da Silva Wins Runoff (MCT)

By Jack Chang

McClatchy Newspapers, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - Having survived corruption scandals and desertions by longtime allies, Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won re-election Sunday in a landslide victory that promises to strengthen his weakened government.

DOJ_NMG_0087691

With 90.6 percent of polling places counted Sunday night, the 61-year-old former union leader won 60.5 percent of the vote in the runoff, while challenger Geraldo Alckmin, the former governor of the country's richest and most populous state, garnered 39.4 percent of votes. Brazilians also voted in 10 gubernatorial runoff elections.

The results confirmed public opinion polls showing the president running away with the second-round election after doing more poorly than predicted in the Oct. 1 first-round vote and falling short of the majority he would have needed for an outright win.

The victory also capped a tumultuous first term in office, during which the president weathered a revolt by the radical wing of his center-left Workers' Party and almost succumbed to a wave of corruption scandals.

Political analysts said the president's first-round chances were hurt after members of his party and campaign were caught in mid-September allegedly trying to mount a failed smear campaign against Alckmin and another rival. The president had already spent much of last year mired in a bribes-for-votes scandal involving top administration officials.

"We didn't have any new developments in this latest scandal, so that played in Lula's favor in the second round," said Alessandra Alde, a political scientist at the University Research Institute of Rio de Janeiro. "People are skeptical of their politicians and think they're all the same, so these scandals always had a limited effect."

What put the president on top were a solid, if unspectacular, economy and social programs that transferred billions of dollars in welfare aid to Brazil's poorest, voters and analysts said. The president's humble origins - he was the son of illiterate parents in the country's poor northeast - also won over many voters.

His policies apparently had its effects. Between 2003 and 2005, the number of people in extreme poverty dropped 19 percent, one study shows.

"He helped people who were never given any attention to," said Deise de Oliveira, an accountant from a working-class Rio de Janeiro neighborhood who voted for Lula. "He did good things despite the scandals. He's with the poor, while Alckmin is with the elites."

Another Lula supporter, teacher Melissa Ferreira, said the president had broken with past governments by giving federal investigators free rein to weed out corruption, which had always existed.

"Corruption is a thing that didn't just start now," Ferreira said. "It's only appearing now because Lula's government is looking into it."

Alckmin and other critics say the president used aid programs to buy the votes of poor Brazilians and say his government set a new low for scandal. They also point out that many of the government's aid programs started under former President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, who hails, along with Alckmin, from the centrist Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

"The money is helping people, but they've become hostages to it," said Rio de Janeiro public school principal Tony Menezes, who voted for Alckmin Sunday. "They receive this help, and they don't want to lose it, so they vote for Lula."

Speaking to reporters Sunday morning after voting in a suburb of Sao Paulo city, Lula was already proclaiming victory.

"The re-election is an important thing," he said. "I am happy because the Brazilian people recognized the work of these four years and were very generous."

Alckmin, deserted in the end by many of his political allies, was still betting on an upset victory as he voted in a Sao Paulo neighborhood Sunday morning.

The second-round campaign was marked by ideological debates, with the president accusing Alckmin of planning to privatize state-owned companies and cut welfare benefits to poor Brazilians.

Alckmin scurried to defuse the president's attacks while hammering the incumbent over accusations of government corruption.

Despite the rhetorical sparring, the candidates' platforms were not very different, Alde said. Both candidates pushed pro-business platforms such as running primary budget surpluses and checking inflation although Alckmin has said he would more aggressively cut government spending.

That orthodox fiscal policy cost Lula, in the first years of his presidency, the support of many longtime allies who left the Workers' Party accusing the president of betraying his radical roots.

Two party defectors, senators Cristovam Buarque and Heloisa Helena Lima de Moraes Carvalho, ran against Lula this year and between them amassed more than 9 percent of the first-round vote.

Nonetheless, Lula's party emerges from this election season as a political force, controlling the second largest group of representatives in the lower house of the federal Congress and at least four of the country's 27 governorships. Lula also will start his final four-year term with the support of at least 17 governors.

The country's top electoral official, however, has said the president could be removed from office if continuing investigations into the failed smear campaign reveal wrongdoing on his part.

Brown To Back More Emissions Trading (FT)

By Christopher Adams And Jimmy Burns

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Gordon Brown will on Monday throw his weight behind a massive expansion of carbon trading to tackle global warming, rather than raising billions of pounds in green taxes.

The chancellor, flanked by Tony Blair, will useMonday's release of a report by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist and a senior UK civil servant, to propose a sweeping overhaul of Europe's fledgling emissions trading scheme, arguing that climate change is "a global challenge that requires a global solution".

And, in an effort to push climate change up the international agenda, the chancellor will appoint Al Gore, former US vice-president and an environmental campaigner, as an adviser on green issues.

In a letter to European Union leaders, the chancellor will propose cuts in carbon dioxide emissions of 30 per cent by 2020 and of 60 per cent by 2050.

He will suggest that the scheme, under which industrial polluters have to buy credits to emit more than a set level of greenhouse gases, be extended to cover more than half of all emissions and that trading permits should be auctioned.

Mr Brown wants to link the trading scheme with similar markets in California and elsewhere.

But he will face tough questioning over a document leaked at the weekend showing that the government is considering a raft of green taxes on consumers.

The paper, prepared by David Miliband, environment secretary, and submitted to the Treasury ahead of the pre-Budget report, floats measures including: "pay as you drive" road pricing; raising air passenger duty; imposing VAT on EU flights; and levies on energy wasting appliances.

Road tax could also be increased for gas-guzzling cars, it says.

The paper is evidence of a belief in Whitehall that consumers might be prepared to accept higher taxes to tackle global warming. Labour is seeking to boost its environmental credentials amid Conservative support for a shift towards green taxation. David Cameron, Tory leader, said he would back taxing air travel and planned to install a wind turbine on the roof of Downing Street if elected.

Treasury insiders said Mr Brown would consider the Miliband proposals "in the round" and was not ruling anything in or out. "We'll make our decisions about tax at the normal time," said one.

The Stern review, which was commissioned by the government to look at the economics of climate change, warns that failure to tackle global warming will wreak an economic catastrophe.

Changes that would be "difficult or impossible to reverse" threaten to knock 10 to 20 per cent off annual global output by the end of the century.

In contrast, the review argues that acting now to reduce carbon dioxide emissions would cost just one per cent of output. Sir Nicholas also advocates a doubling in global research and development spending on energy to $20bn (£10.6bn) and much greater use of techniques such as carbon capture and storage.

Mr Brown is also expected to announce on Monday measures to boost bio-fuels and to give statutory backing to long-term emissions targets, rather than annual ones as proposed by the Conservatives.

Report To Tell Consumers To Brace For 'Green' Taxes (WT)

By George Jones

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's consumers will be told today to prepare for new "green" taxes on cars, fuel, air travel and consumer electronics to curb pollution and avert a looming global catastrophe caused by climate change.

A report drawn up by Nicholas Stern, the government's chief economist, says that ignoring global warming could lead to economic upheaval on the scale of the 1930s Depression and turn 200 million people into refugees as their homes are hit by drought or flood.

Ministers plan to use the report to pave the way for "eco-taxes" to persuade people to adopt less-polluting lifestyles. A start is likely to be made in the federal budget in the spring.

Environment Secretary David Miliband has proposed an end to cheaper gasoline, even if oil prices fall. In a leaked letter to the treasury secretary, he called for "pay-as-you drive" charges to be extended nationwide, taxes on inexpensive flights and levies on energy-wasting domestic appliances.

Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor Gordon Brown -- Mr. Blair's likely successor when he steps down next year -- were to signal their support for the potentially unpopular message by attending the formal publication of the Stern report in London today.

Mr. Brown will call for a global carbon market and promise to set targets to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions in a climate-change bill. He will announce that former U.S. Vice President Al Gore, a leading advocate of tackling climate change, has agreed to act as his adviser.

Mr. Stern, whose 700-page report was widely leaked over the weekend, has convinced the Cabinet that urgent action has to be taken now. His report states that no matter what is done, the chance to keep greenhouse gases at a level that scientists say should avoid the worst effects of climate change "is already almost out of reach."

But he says the benefits of worldwide steps to tackle climate change would greatly outweigh the costs.

Mr. Miliband, who is taking the lead in pressing for green taxes, said yesterday that tackling climate change was the "defining challenge for our generation." He acknowledged that the tax system had a part to play, although he refused to comment on the leak of the letter that he sent to the chancellor this month.

"Market-based instruments, including taxes, need to play a substantial role. As our understanding of climate change increases, it is clear that more needs to be done," Mr. Miliband said in the letter obtained by the Mail on Sunday newspaper.

He told Mr. Brown that "a substantial increase" in the tax on higher-emission vehicles should be considered, as well as charging road users for the full environmental effect of their journeys.

He said gasoline prices should be kept high at the pumps by raising fuel taxes if the oil price drops significantly. He proposed charging air passengers an extra $9 per flight and putting a value-added tax on flights to countries of the European Union.

Mr. Miliband also wants to steer consumers toward buying electrical goods that are more energy efficient.

David Cameron, the Conservative Party leader, has said he wants to raise the percentage of revenue that comes from green taxes. "That means we've got to look at things like air transport, like the gas-guzzling cars. We'll come up with those ideas closer to a general election."

He said that he did not want to stop people going on a family vacation but that the Tories would put a tax on air travel if it was thought necessary.

British Government Report Calls For Broad Effort On Climate Issues (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

A report commissioned by the British government and scheduled for release Monday calls for substantial international cooperation to combat global warming and doubling public spending on research into low-carbon technologies.

The main findings of the 16-month study, led by Sir Nicholas Stern, the chief of Britain's economic service, were described over the weekend in several British news reports. [A] news agency quoted the report's 27-page summary as saying, "The evidence gathered by the review leads to a simple conclusion: the benefits of strong, early action considerably outweigh the costs."

The report, prepared for Tony Blair, the prime minister, and Gordon Brown, the finance minister, has been heavily promoted by Britain and environmental groups as one of the most authoritative reviews of climate costs, although some economists and energy experts at anti-regulatory research groups saw it as understating the cost of an accelerated transition away from the fossil fuels that provide nearly 90 percent of the world's energy today.

The report, called the Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change, will be published online at sternreview.org.uk.

If emissions are not cut and temperatures rise as many scientists project, [a news] agency quoted the report as saying that, among various impacts, melting glaciers would threaten one sixth of the world population by raising sea levels and drying up river sources.

The Observer, a British newspaper, reported that the study cited a figure of £3.68 trillion (the equivalent of $6.98 trillion) as the cost to society of failing to start blunting global warming within a decade.

"Our actions over the coming few decades could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, later in this century and in the next, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century," the report said, according to [a news agency].

The study estimated that the cost of cutting emissions in 2050 to 60 percent to 80 percent below 1990 levels would be about 1 percent of total global economic activity by then, [a news agency] and The Observer said. If emissions cannot be cut to those levels, the cost from climatic impacts could be 5 to 20 times higher, The Observer cited the study as saying.

The study, according to the news reports, said that progress would best be accomplished by doubling global investment in research on climate-friendly energy technologies and placing a rising cost on further emissions of the greenhouse gases, led by carbon dioxide, to propel the shift toward non-polluting options.

The news reports on the study are consistent with presentations by Sir Nicholas, including a speech last January at Oxford University.

Other recent estimates of the eventual annual costs of stabilizing concentrations of greenhouse gases over the 21st century have ranged from 1 percent of global gross domestic product to 16 percent by around 2100, not counting any savings from averted damage.

By comparison, the world is currently spending just over $1 trillion a year, or about 2.5 percent of global gross global domestic product, on defense, according to a yearly survey by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute. (Military spending in the United States is about 3.7 percent of gross domestic product.)

"This confirms what we've seen for a long time," said Kert Davies, a climate-policy coordinator for Greenpeace. "The longer we take to act, the greater the costs will be."

Jerry Taylor, an expert on energy and climate policy at the Cato Institute, a libertarian research group in Washington, said the wide range of cost estimates for cutting emissions "basically tells you we're guessing."

Overall, he said, he put more faith in academic analyses than one produced at a government's request, particularly at a time when the public appears eager to see signs of action on the issue.

The release of the 700-page report, which was 16 months in the making, will come one week before the start of the latest round of talks on the Kyoto Protocol, the first international pact requiring cuts in heat-trapping emissions.

The United States has not ratified the Kyoto pact but is a party to the voluntary treaty that preceded it, which requires all signatories to seek to avoid a dangerous buildup of greenhouse gases.

The Kyoto Protocol, an addendum to the original treaty, requires three dozen participating industrialized countries to cut their combined emissions 5 percent below 1990 levels between 2008 and 2012.

At the moment, many of the three dozen industrialized countries bound by the pact are not on track to meet targets. And there are few indications of a shift toward accepting binding restrictions in the United States, the world's biggest emitter of greenhouse gases, or China and India, which are projected to be the dominant source of emissions in a couple of decades.

Belgian Role Model (WSJ)

Al Gore may have failed to carry his home state of Tennessee as a Presidential candidate, but the former Vice President is all the rage in . . . Belgium. The country has even named a tax after him.

Earlier this month, Mr. Gore spent a day in Brussels to promote his film on global warming. "Our planet has a fever, and the fever has been getting steadily higher," he said in a speech. "It is in fact a full-scale planetary emergency." Within days, Belgian politicians were rewriting their tax laws to do something about this looming calamity.

Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt invoked his American visitor in proposing a new "environmentally friendly" tax on packages that would penalize users of aluminum or plastic and provide incentives to switch to paper or cardboard, whose production releases less CO2 into the atmosphere. The details have yet to be worked out, but the idea is for milk sold in, say, a plastic bottle to cost more than milk sold in a cardboard container.

"We must take Al Gore's message seriously," Mr. Verhofstadt told parliament the other day. The measure, introduced into the draft 2007 budget, was fast dubbed "the Gore tax." Also in the works are tax breaks for car pollution filters and deductions for energy-efficient investors.

To be sure, this Belgian scheme to save the planet also raises a bundle for the politicians to spend, to the tune of roughly €600 million ($750 million) a year. A government spokesman says that the revenue will make up for what it expects to lose from planned reductions in social taxes, which are some of the highest in Europe. Evidently the government figures that dressing the new tax package in Al Gore green will make it go down easier. If the former veep decides he can't beat Hillary Clinton for the 2008 Democratic nomination, he can always try Europe.

Monitors Say Vote On Serbian Constitution Is Too Close To Call (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

LJUBLJANA, Serbia, Oct. 29 — Estimates by an independent election monitoring group showed Sunday that a vote on Serbia's new constitution was too close to call.

Official results were not expected until Monday. The monitoring group said its survey showed that 52 percent of voters had approved the document, with a margin of error of two percentage points, making the estimated victory margin statistically insignificant. The proposed constitution needed support from more than 50 percent of voters to pass.

The Center for Free Elections and Democracy, the monitoring group, came up with its figure by interviewing officials at 600 of the country's 2,000 polling places to learn their vote tallies and by extrapolating from them.

The group also watched voting at those and other polling places to check for irregularities. The Belgrade-based group, which has monitored 10 Serbian elections since 2004, has called those elections correctly.

One of the most discussed provisions of the 206-article constitution declared that the province of Kosovo is an "integral part of Serbia." The declaration was symbolic, because the fate of the province lies with the United Nations Security Council, which is likely to vote to enable Kosovo's independence.

Critics of the constitution have said the document would not move the country far enough toward full democracy.

The proposed constitution was drafted and supported by nationalists and pro-democracy reformers in Parliament. Many reformers supported the document despite its flaws because they wanted to make clear to Serbs that they were doing everything they could to hold on to the province.

Reformers feared that the United Nations vote would create a backlash that could lead to gains for the Serbian Radical Party, the leading nationalist party. They also agreed to rush through the drafting of the constitution so it could be in place before the United Nations vote.

Despite the high-profile provision on Kosovo, the document did not seem to excite the populace. Voting was so slow over the weekend that it appeared the constitution might not get the needed votes, which would be a significant embarrassment for the government.

Voting surged late Sunday after an intensive get-out-the-vote campaign in the afternoon. Senior politicians as well as members of the Serbian Orthodox Church issued statements urging people to vote.

"Citizens, get out and circle 'yes' for Serbia, 'yes' for a better life for every citizen," President Boris Tadic was quoted as saying by the state-run Tanjug news agency.

Between 2 p.m. and 8 p.m., when the polls closed, an estimated 20 percent of Serbia's electorate went to the polls. Officials of the monitoring group said they recorded an increase in reports of electoral irregularities during that time. The group did not consider the irregularities significant enough to compromise the vote.

The overall turnout was 53.5 percent, according to the group's survey.

Kosovo is regarded by many Serbs as being central to their national identity. It has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when NATO-led troops took control of the province after 78 days of bombing. NATO wrested Kosovo from the hands of Yugoslav security forces accused of committing widespread atrocities against the majority Albanian population.

Kosovo's future is the subject of United Nations-led negotiations between the Serbian government and ethnic Albanians in the province. The ethnic Albanians want independence, while the Serbian government and the province's small Serbian community demand that Kosovo remain part of Serbia.

Few Western diplomats say the groups will be able to reach agreement, leaving the decision to the United Nations Security Council, which is expected to impose a settlement in the next several months to enable Kosovo to claim independence.

While much of the constitution's contents had been heavily criticized by rights groups as contradictory in parts and giving too much power to Parliament, there was little public debate about its contents. The charter would replace one drafted by the authoritarian government of Slobodan Milosevic in 1990.

Serbia's government worked hard to help ensure the adoption of the new charter. A government-financed publicity campaign urged people to vote "yes," and voting was held over two days in an attempt to draw Serbia's election-weary voters to the polls.

Kosovo's estimated 1.3 million ethnic Albanians were also excluded from the election. Including the Albanians would have increased the number of voters and made it difficult to secure approval of more than 50 percent of the electorate.

"The government gambled," said Bratislav Grubacic, a leading political analyst and editor of the VIP news agency in Belgrade. "They hoped by putting Kosovo in the constitution, they would manage to draw out the Serbian electorate."

Serb Vote Reasserts Claim Over Kosovo (AP)

By Katarina Kratovac

AP, October 30, 2006

Serbia's top leaders said Sunday that voters approved a new constitution reasserting Serbia's claim over the U.N.-administered Kosovo province, a predominantly ethnic Albanian region whose status is the focus of international negotiations.

Election officials and an independent commission also predicted the charter's adoption, based on early returns from the weekend referendum. But official results were not expected until Monday.

Serbia's opposition Liberal Party charged there was "massive fraud" at polling stations in the final hours of voting, with people allegedly voting several times and without identification papers.

Western diplomats had already warned that only the international talks can decide the future of Kosovo, which ethnic Albanians want to be independent. But Serbian politicians hope the new charter will bolster their bargaining position. Ethnic Serbs consider Kosovo the historic and cultural heartland of their nation.

Independence-seeking ethnic Albanians form 90 percent of the population in Kosovo, which has been under U.N. administration since U.S.-led NATO air strikes halted a Serb crackdown on the separatists in 1999.

The need for a new constitution arose in June after Montenegro — Serbia's last partner from the former Yugoslav federation — declared independence and left Serbia on its own for the first time since 1918.

To win adoption, the charter needed to get "yes" votes from more than 50 percent of Serbia's 6.6 million registered voters and a majority of registered voters also had to cast ballots to make the referendum valid.

The Belgrade-based Center for Free Elections and Democracy, an independent monitoring group, said its surveys indicated both thresholds were met. It put turnout at 53.3 percent and said its sample counts at polls indicated 96 percent of ballots favored the new charter.

State referendum authorities announced similar results, saying 96 percent voted in favor of the new charter — based on just under 11 percent of ballots counted — and estimated turnout at 53.6 percent.

Those figures would produce a "yes" vote of just over 51 percent of all registered voters.

Serbia's conservative Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica and pro-Western President Boris Tadic both proclaimed victory for the constitution.

"This is a great moment for Serbia," Kostunica told Serbian state television. "This is a historic moment, a beginning of a new era."

Tadic said a "huge job is now behind us." He said the "best thing about this constitution is that we now leave behind us" the charter adopted during the regime of the late autocratic leader Slobodan Milosevic.

Kostunica said the turnout was "adequate, considering that opponents chose to boycott the vote" rather than cast "no" votes. "We have reasons to be very happy."

The referendum was strongly condemned by ethnic Albanians, who have long boycotted any ballot under Serb auspices and were not listed on the voter rolls, purportedly for that reason.

Some government opponents and nongovernment organizations also criticized the charter as hastily drafted and flawed on issues such as independence of the judiciary, equal rights for minorities and autonomy for local governments.

In Serbia's northern Vojvodina province, where turnout was very low, provincial assembly speaker Bojan Kostres accused authorities of "forcing the new constitution" on the people.

"The final voting hours were very strange, with a sudden, steep rise in turnout," Kostres said.

For many Serbs, the charter's key point was its declaration that Kosovo is an "integral part of Serbia."

Serbs in Kosovo began celebrating even before official results were announced. Hundreds gathered Sunday night in Kosovska Mitrovica, waving banners, cheering and shouting "Kosovo is the heart of Serbia" as NATO peacekeepers watched and dispatched reinforcements to the scene.

Bulgarian President Wins Re-election: Partial Results (AFP)

By Diana Simeonova

AFP, October 30, 2006

Bulgarian President Georgy Parvanov won re-election with an unassailable lead in his run-off battle against ultra-nationalist challenger Volen Siderov, the central electoral committee said based on partial results.

The electoral committee said a count of 98.11 percent of the ballots cast gave the 49-year-old incumbent 75.7 percent of the vote, while his rival scored 24.3 percent.

Turnout by 7:00 pm (1700 GMT) was 41.2 percent, it added.

"This is an unprecedented, historic result," Parvanov told a news conference late Sunday.

"The result is a recognition of the policies we followed during our first five-year term," he said, adding that he would continue to be a president with "a clear social engagement at home".

He also promised to continue what he called his "active" and "consistent" foreign policy.

"It will be oriented towards securing a dignified European Union membership, and at the same time maintaining our national identity and working in solidarity with our European partners."

Parvanov, a pro-European former leader of the Socialist Party who prided himself in being "the president of all Bulgarians," won the first ballot last weekend with a commanding lead of 64 percent against Siderov's 21.5 percent but failed to avert a run-off as voter participation was below 50 percent.

No minimum turnout was required in the second round.

Parvanov is the first Bulgarian president to be re-elected since the fall of communism in 1989, and is now all but certain to fulfill his dream of presiding over the official entry of his Balkan nation into the European Union on January 1.

Support for the youthful 49-year-old leader has surged since he first took office in 2001, making him Bulgaria's most popular and trusted politician.

Under his leadership, Bulgaria joined NATO in 2004 and earlier this year received the green light to join the EU in two months' time.

Parvanov also played a key role in the formation of the current Socialist-led government after inconclusive general elections in June last year and the ensuing political deadlock threatened to stall reforms and postpone EU accession.

Parvanov also supported the signing this year of an agreement to set up three US military facilities in Bulgaria.

At the same time, he has worked to thaw Bulgarian-Russian relations, which have deteriorated badly since the fall of communism.

A proponent of ethnic tolerance, he developed good relations with the Turkish minority Movement for Rights and Freedoms party. He was fiercely attacked as a "Turkish puppet" by runner-up Siderov, known for his hostile statements against Bulgaria's Roma and Turkish minorities, each of which comprise 10 percent of the population.

Firebrand Siderov, 50, attempted to belittle all of Parvanov's achievements during the presidential campaign.

A sharp-tongued populist speaker, he garnered support from many disillusioned Bulgarians, impoverished during the transition period from communism and apprehensive about the challenges of EU membership.

Nevertheless, by simply gaining a berth in the two-way final race, the short grey-haired former journalist changed his country's political landscape by ripping apart its traditional balance between moderate left- and right-wing parties.

"What we achieved is a feat in peacetime," Siderov told a press conference late Sunday, lashing out against "the sea of malice ... the consistent, massive, evil campaign fought against us from all sides".

"Our result marks a crucial stage in the development of Bulgarian nationalism that has now proved itself a factor in Bulgarian politics and can no longer be disregarded or played down," Siderov said.

In his latest public appearances before the vote, Siderov sought to tone down his aggressive rhetoric in order to appeal to a larger voter base, but after losing the run-off he returned to a more radical discourse against "the mafia that stops at nothing."

"Parvanov was elected with the votes of the Roma neighbourhoods and the Turks," he said.

Nicaragua's Critical Elections (WT)

By Jose Rizo

On Sunday -- just two days before the American election -- Nicaraguans will also have an election to choose a new president. With an estimated 400,000 of them living in Florida alone, and the potential of a flood of new immigrants should the Nicaraguan election herald a return to policies which failed in the past, the United States has a lot at stake. Many observers of the political situation in Central America are deeply concerned about the upcoming Nicaraguan election because former President Daniel Ortega is leading in most polls. Although Mr. Ortega and the rest of his Sandinista colleagues claim to have learned from their mistakes, many Nicaraguans are rightly convinced that if the Sandinistas win the election they would revert to their failed leftist policies of the past.

Most polls show that the election is a tight race between Mr. Ortega and myself, and any candidate only needs 35 percent of the vote to win in the first-round vote. If no one wins, there will be a second round in December. But there is a risk that Mr. Ortega could squeak by with a win in the first round since the anti-Sandinista vote is split. In 2001, I ran as vice president against Mr. Ortega and our liberal party, the Constitutional Liberal Party (or PLC), won by a landslide. If elected, I will work very closely with the United States and other allies in guaranteeing that Central America and the Western Hemisphere are prosperous and secure. I am called the "clean hands" candidate because I have served my country honorably, and, unlike other candidates, I have never been implicated in any corruption scandal.

Upon becoming president, I will promote a constitutional ban on presidential re-election in Nicaragua. My economic policy is called "Nicaragua First" and is designed to take full advantage of the trade, investment and employment opportunities that have been created by the Central American Free Trade Agreement. It is also founded on truly free, transparent and open-market strategies and institutions.

In an extraordinary turn of events, President Enrique Bolanos turned against the party that elected him and decided to promote presidential candidate Eduardo Montealegre. The Ethics and Transparency Commission of the Nicaraguan Congress recently found Mr. Montealegre responsible for the looting of Treasury funds for the benefit of his own bank while he was secretary of the treasury for Mr. Bolanos. The Sandinistas are gleeful about this split in the PLC vote and are quietly supporting it.

The most surprising development in this Nicaraguan political fight is the strong intervention of Bush administration. It has been misled by the Bolanos administration and their key cronies who are desperate to hold onto power. This confusing and troubling U.S. involvement in this election is so transparent that many prominent U.S. citizens have felt compelled to openly call for a more neutral American policy. Unfortunately, as it did with Iraq, the Bush administration is receiving its information from biased exile leaders and misguided policy experts. If the Sandinistas win the election, they will most likely enact their previous failed totalitarian policies and join the likes of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez in the anti-American crusade in Latin America. More importantly, tens of thousands of Nicaraguans will likely flee the country again and seek to relocate in the United States.

It is not too late for the Bush administration to declare its neutrality in the upcoming election and its willingness to work with any democratically elected government. Unless it does so within the next 10 days, it might actually help cause what it fears the most: the election of Daniel Ortega as president of Nicaragua.

Jose Rizo is former vice president of Nicaragua. He is running for president representing the PLC, the largest political party in Nicaragua. Mr. Rizo also studied at the London School of Economics.

Losing Nicaragua, Again (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Oliver North and his associates were leaving Managua last Tuesday on a private plane after a dramatic surprise visit when they heard news they could scarcely comprehend. The State Department had just issued a "public announcement" that, in effect, warned Americans not to travel to Nicaragua because of the prospect for "violent demonstrations" and "sporadic acts of violence" leading up to the Nov. 5 presidential election there.

The North group had seen nothing in Nicaragua to justify a travel advisory, normally issued when life and limb of visiting Americans are at risk. U.S. and Nicaraguan security officials alike are dumbfounded, and the State Department did not explain it to me. That buttresses suspicion that the U.S. government wants to keep away meddling Americans like North, who seek to influence an election that now appears likely to return Daniel Ortega and the Sandinistas to power after an absence of 16 years.

The seemingly unavoidable outcome of next Sunday's election is a Nicaraguan tragedy, losing at the ballot box what was won two decades ago by the blood of contra fighters and the risking of Ronald Reagan's presidency. Because the anti-Sandinista vote is split, Ortega figures to return his Marxist-Leninist party -- now backed by Hugo ChÃ¡vez's Venezuelan petrodollars -- to the presidential palace. Apart from the misery to be inflicted on the Nicaraguan people, this reflects the deterioration of U.S. influence in the Western Hemisphere under the Bush administration.

Nicaraguan law permits the election of a president with as little as 35 percent of the vote if he is five percentage points ahead of his nearest competitor. That now seems probable with the anti-Sandinista vote divided between two major candidates: former vice president Jose Rizo and banker Eduardo Montealegre. The former contras blame this state of affairs on the Bush administration in general and, specifically, on the U.S. ambassador in Managua, Paul Trivelli.

The looming political fiasco in Nicaragua comes as no surprise. Adolfo Calero, a Washington-based contra leader in the '80s, returned to the U.S. capital in April to issue a warning. He asserted that tacit U.S. support for Montealegre and opposition to Rizo was a horrendous political error and that the only hope to hold off the Sandinistas was to support Rizo. But official doors were closed to Calero. The occasion of Calero's visit was a reunion of contra leaders, their former CIA handlers and Ollie North, who as a Marine lieutenant colonel ran the Nicaraguan account at the Reagan White House. The festivities were marred by fear and frustration over the coming election.

North went public in his syndicated column of Oct. 6. He contended that "official U.S. policy in Nicaragua has been blind to the realities of Nicaraguan politics." He said Ambassador Trivelli "has to stop pressuring private sector leaders with potential reprisals" for backing Rizo and his Liberal Party. North called on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to visit Managua and meet with all anti-Sandinista candidates -- including Rizo.

In Washington, North was ignored. He and his colleagues paid a hastily arranged visit to Managua Monday, Oct. 23, and publicly pleaded with Nicaraguans to reject the Sandinistas. The apparent U.S. reaction was Tuesday's official U.S. government warning that implies Americans would do well to stay away from now until April 18. By urging "American residents and visitors in Nicaragua " to be "vigilant," the U.S. government was telling the old contras to keep hands off.

Dewey Claridge, the famous CIA contra handler, put it bluntly in an e-mail to associates: "Just when you think the State Department's level of stupidity has reached bedrock and can go no further, it comes up with this nonsense, probably the [work] of Trivelli and his paranoia that Oliver North's visit to Managua to receive a testimonial and lay a wreath at the tomb of the fallen . . . is the Contra War II."

State Department spokesmen would not elaborate on the basis for the travel advisory, but the department's security personnel and Nicaraguan police privately said they saw none for such a warning. The real warning should be about the return of the Sandinistas, in league with Havana and Caracas, thanks to another failure in U.S. policy.

U.S. Jobs Shape Condoms' Role In Foreign Aid (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

EUFAULA, Alabama — Here in this courtly, antebellum town, Alabama's condom production has survived an onslaught of Asian competition, thanks to the patronage of straitlaced congressmen from this Bible Belt state.

Behind the scenes, the politicians have ensured that companies in Alabama won federal contracts to make billions of condoms over the years for AIDS prevention and family planning programs overseas, though Asian factories could do the job at less than half the cost.

In recent years, the state's condom manufacturers fell hundreds of millions of condoms behind on orders, and the federal aid agency began buying them from Asia. The use of Asian-made condoms has contributed to layoffs that are coming next month.

But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, has quietly pressed to maintain the unqualified priority for American-made condoms and is likely to prevail if the past is any guide.

"What's wrong with helping the American worker at the same time we are helping people around the world?" asked the senator's spokesman, Michael Brumas.

That question goes to the heart of an intensifying debate among wealthy nations about to what degree foreign aid is about saving jobs at home or lives abroad.

Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America, and not just those that make condoms.

The wheat to feed the starving must be grown in United States and shipped to Africa, enriching agribusiness giants like Archer Daniels Midland and Cargill. The American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost.

The history of the federal government's condom purchases embodies the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style. Alabama's congressmen have long preserved several hundred factory jobs here by insisting that the United States Agency for International Development buy condoms made here, though, probably in a nod to their conservative constituencies, most have typically done so discreetly.

Those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular.

On the other hand, skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent. Blame often falls on corrupt leaders in poor countries, but aid from rich nations with restrictions requiring it to be spent in the donor country can also reduce effectiveness.

The United States government, the world's largest donor of condoms, has bought more than nine billion condoms over the past two decades. Under President Bush's global AIDS plan, which dedicates billions of dollars to fight the epidemic, a third of the money for prevention must go to promoting abstinence. But that leaves two-thirds for other programs, so the federal government's distribution of condoms has risen, to over 400 million a year.

Over the years, Usaid could have afforded even more condoms — among the most effective methods for slowing the spread of AIDS — if it had it bought them from the lowest bidders on the world market, as have the United Nations Population Fund and many other donors.

Randall L. Tobias, who heads Usaid, declined through a spokesman to be interviewed on this topic. His predecessor, Andrew Natsios, sought to weaken the hold of what he sometimes called a cartel of domestic interest groups over foreign aid. He tried, for example, to persuade Congress to allow the purchase of some African food to feed Africa's hungry. Congress killed that proposal last year and again this year.

Hilary Benn, Britain's secretary of state for international development, said in an interview that in 2001 his country untied its aid from requirements that only British firms could bid for international antipoverty work.

"If you untie aid, it's 100 percent clear you're giving aid to reduce poverty and not to benefit your own country's commercial interests," he said.

In recent years, most of the low-end condom business has moved to Asia, including Australia-based Ansell, which used to have plants in Alabama. American makers cannot compete with Asia on price — unless they have the federal contract.

The last American factory making condoms for Usaid sits anonymously in a pine-shaded industrial park here in Eufaula. Inside a modern, low-slung building owned by Alatech Healthcare, ingenious contraptions almost as long as a football field repeatedly dip 16,000 phallic-shaped bulbs into vats of latex, with the capacity to turn out a billion condoms a year.

The equation of need is never straightforward. Africa's need to forestall its slow-motion catastrophe of AIDS deaths is vast. But there is need here, too.

Most of the 260 people employed at this factory and the company's packaging plant in Slocomb are women, some the children of sharecroppers and textile factory workers, many of them struggling to support families on $7 to $8 an hour.

The most vulnerable among them — single mothers and older women with scant education — are the most fearful of foreign competition. All feel the looming threat.

"It's cheaper, yeah," said Lisa Jackson, 42, a worker in the packaging plant. "But we Americans should have first choice. We need our jobs to stay in America. We got to feed our families. I just wish it had never come to sending manufacturing jobs overseas."

From 2003 to 2005, Alatech and one other company making condoms for Usaid fell behind on their orders, agency officials said. Last year, the other company went bankrupt. So Usaid ordered condoms from Asia, the first of which were shipped last year. With only a single American company still in line for the federal contract, agency officials are wary of ruling out Asian suppliers.

At such moments in the past, Alabama's politicians have come to the rescue of the state's condom industry. This time was no exception.

Senator Richard C. Shelby, a Republican on the Appropriations Committee, had a provision tucked into the 2004 budget bill requiring that Usaid buy only American-made condoms to the extent possible, given cost and availability. His spokeswoman, Kate Boyd, said the agency did not tell him it was worried about the relative cost of American and Asian-made condoms.

Senator Sessions wrote Usaid a letter last year saying it should purchase condoms from foreign producers only after it had bought all the condoms American companies could make, noting it was "extremely important to jobs in my state."

Usaid assured the senator in writing that it "remains committed to prioritizing domestic suppliers."

On the strength of that, Alatech bought the more modern Eufaula plant from its bankrupt rival. Without the government contract, the company's president, Larry Povlacs, said, Alatech would go out of business.

In interviews, agency officials were noncommittal about whether they would halt all purchases in Asia. Condoms made there cost around 2 cents each, opposed to about 5 cents for those made here.

"At the end of the day, it's all a political process," Bob Lester, who recently retired after 31 years as a lawyer at Usaid, said of such decisions. "The foreign aid program has very few rabbis. Why make enemies when you don't have to?"

Duff Gillespie, a retired senior Usaid official who is now a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, said that over the years officials at Usaid raised the prospect of foreign competition to tamp down what he called "the greed factor" of Alabama condom manufacturers.

But whenever the staff pushed to buy in Asia, Alabama politicians pushed right back.

During the Reagan years, the offices of two Alabamans, Representative William Dickinson, a Republican, and Senator Howell Heflin, a Democrat, caught wind of one such move. Mike Houston, chief of staff to Senator Heflin, recalled being tipped off by Mr. Dickinson's chief of staff.

"He says, 'Well, A.I.D. is going to buy condoms from Korea,' " Mr. Houston recalled. " 'The reason is they can get three condoms for the price of one that they're paying us.' " Mr. Houston said he asked in amazement, "You mean we're making rubbers in Alabama?"

The congressmen's staffs threatened to introduce amendments to require that condoms be made in America. The agency backed off.

Further attempts to open up bidding proved fruitless. Representative Jim McDermott, a Democrat from Washington State, had seen the devastation of AIDS firsthand in the 1980s as a State Department medical officer in Africa. But he said he could not break what he called the "stranglehold" of Alabama congressmen on the condom rules.

In the mid-to-late 1990s, Representative Sonny Callahan, a Republican from Alabama, served as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that shaped Usaid's budget. Brian Atwood, who headed Usaid in those years, said no administrator "in his right mind" would have tried to cut Alabama out of the condom contract at a time when many Republicans were deeply hostile to foreign aid.

Then in 2001, after decades of negotiation, the United States and other wealthy donor nations reached a nonbinding agreement to open at least some foreign aid contracts to all qualified bidders. Included were those for commodities bound for the world's poorest nations.

Usaid decided the agreement did not apply to condoms since some went to more advanced developing countries. Alabama's manufacturers kept the condom business once again.

William Nicol, who heads the poverty reduction division of the Development Assistance Committee at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a group of economically advanced countries, scoffed at Usaid's interpretation. "That's rubbish," he said in a telephone interview.

The condom companies' inability in recent years to fulfill Usaid's orders accomplished what the gentleman's agreement did not: the entry of Asian competitors.

Usaid has asked Alatech to make 201 million condoms next year, less than half of this year's order, and ordered another 100 million made in Korea and China.

Come Nov. 15, Alatech will lay off more than half its work force. Those jobs fell victim to Usaid's smaller orders for condoms, foreign competition and automation.

The reactions of these workers ranged from philosophical to panicked.

One, Garry Appling, a 41-year-old single mother, has worked before as a $6-an-hour cashier at Krystal, the fast food restaurant, and another at $7.15 an hour in a chicken processing plant. She said her 10-year-old daughter, Anterria, worries that she will have to go back to the chicken plant, a place so cold and wet Ms. Appling often fell ill.

But even facing her own impending job loss, Ms. Appling took a moment to empathize with the women making condoms on the other side of the world.

"We need a job — I guess they do, too," she said, during a brief pause from feeding condoms into an intricate, rotating, whooshing machine that tested them for holes. "It's sad.

"At the same time, the United States can't just keep helping overseas. They've got to help us, too."

Chinese Shadows (WSJ)

If U.S. politicians think they can impose trade barriers without consequences for American economic interests, they should take a look at China these days. Beijing is reacting to America's talk of tariffs and limits on foreign investment by imposing new restrictions on foreign investment in that country.

Earlier this month, the Carlyle private equity fund agreed to buy half, rather than 85%, of a state-owned construction firm after Beijing bureaucrats intervened. A French firm's bid for China's dominant cookware manufacturer is under competition review. Foreign investment in the brokerage industry has been recently shuttered. And so on.

The most egregious example may be the continuing saga of Guangdong Development Bank, a bankrupt lender in which Citigroup and Societe Generale were competing to buy a majority stake. After bidding, however, they were told they'd have to settle for only 20% of the equity. The State Council in Beijing is still figuring out how to handle the bids. This is the equivalent of President Bush's Cabinet blocking a bank merger in Atlanta -- or perhaps Members of Congress objecting to a takeover of a relatively small U.S. oil company by a Chinese company. Never mind that more foreign cash and know-how are exactly what China needs if it wants to clean up its lumbering, corrupt banking industry.

Lest you think we're exaggerating the anticompetitive mood, consider China's new "Rules on the Merger with and Acquisition of Domestic Enterprises by Foreign Investors," enacted by six Chinese regulatory agencies last month. The rules provide the Communist Party with a mechanism to regulate foreign mergers and acquisitions, impose new guidelines on offshore financing of Chinese companies, and give the Ministry of Commerce the authority to squash deals it doesn't like, among other things.

Beijing's regulators aren't exactly exemplars of transparency, so it's hard to know if this is the start of a broader anti-foreign backlash, or simply an effort to duplicate regulatory language used elsewhere. To date, no major deals have been blocked under the new rules. But there's still plenty of room for worry.

Take Article 40, which gives the Ministry of Commerce room to halt foreign acquisitions of Chinese companies in "core industries," without defining, exactly, what those industries are. Some are easy to guess: Media, for one, is unlikely to be opened up anytime soon given that the Party's control rests on its stranglehold on information. But what about other state-dominated sectors -- such as steel, automobiles, retail, or China's horribly backward mobile phone industry?

Article 40 also gives Beijing the right to block acquisitions of Chinese domestic firms with a "well-known" trademark or a "traditional" Chinese brand. That's odd, given that China doesn't possess any well-known international brands -- or register many of its nascent brands with foreign patent offices. Perhaps this is simply Commerce's way of planning for the future.

We're told that the Ministry of Commerce may very well allow the French-Sino cookware merger when it hears the case in the coming weeks. But the broader reversion to economic nationalism remains a worry -- which is why American politicians shouldn't give Beijing politicians any more protectionist episodes to emulate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda: Plans For An October Surprise? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

Is Osama bin Laden going to weigh in on the midterm elections? A senior counterterrorism official, anonymous, like other officials NEWSWEEK spoke to, because the subject is sensitive, says that based on previous patterns—such as the release of a rare bin Laden tape just before the 2004 presidential vote—a message before Election Day wouldn't be surprising. Private expert Evan Kohlmann, who consults for the Feds on terror probes, says Al Qaeda has lately released tapes at a rate of two or three per month. This month, he says, they are "short by one or two," so he thinks a pre-election message is a "very good likelihood." Another U.S. official says intel experts believe Al Qaeda wants to be "relevant" to the U.S. political process. But a third counterterror official says "we don't have any indication" Osama & Co. are about to surface. Spokesmen for the FBI and Homeland Security Department said they were unaware of specific intel foreshadowing an attack on U.S. soil before the elections. Overseas, the threat is more ominous: reports of a possible attack on Saudi oil installations (which could raise U.S. gas prices). The perpetrators would probably be Saudi Qaeda affiliates; methods could include truck or boat bombs. U.S. agencies are not certain of the threat's credibility, an official said.

U.S. Tries To Cut Off Terrorists' Cash Flow (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

The U.S. military is not only trying to stop terrorists and arms from leaking into Iraq from Syria and Iran but also another just as dangerous commodity -- cash.

It's the lifeblood of the enemy -- whether they be al Qaeda terrorists, death squads or Sunnis trying to evict American forces and bring back dictator Saddam Hussein -- and U.S. raiders have seized millions of dollars in cash during the conflict.

Military officials point to Syria and its secretive banking system as the main source of Sunni walking-around money, while Iran's Revolutionary Guard funnels money to Shi'ite militias, such as cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The enemy's money began flowing into Iraq with the start of the insurgency in the summer of 2003, and the shipments are still coming in.

"There are billions coming in," said Daniel Gallington, a former aide to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "The Middle East is the center of graft and corruption in the universe. It really always has been. The fight in Iraq is about who controls what area is really all about who controls the money."

Money, of course, is just as essential to the insurgents as budget dollars are to the American armed forces. Terrorists need it to buy loyalty from local villagers, bomb-making gear, vehicles and electronics to communicate and to detonate improvised explosive devices (IEDs).

Perhaps the most important expenditure is salaries: Sunnis have enlisted thousands of disaffected youths, some enjoying their first paydays ever, by giving them cash to attack Americans, plant IEDs and run messages from one leader to another, say defense sources and officers who served in Iraq.

"The average IED is an attack form carried out by people that are really not ideologically committed," Gen. John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command, told a group of reporters. "They get paid, and they're getting paid because they don't have any money and they're getting paid because they've got people [who] are generally members of the old army that don't have work."

Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief military spokesman in Baghdad, gave a glimpse of the money trail earlier this month when describing a raid in Tikrit, Saddam's hometown. Raiders hit a number of businesses in the city, seizing millions of dollars that had come in from Syria.

"These funds, estimated to be in the millions of dollars per week, were used to finance insurgent operations, to include attacks against Iraqi civilians, as well as Iraqi and coalition security forces," Gen. Caldwell said.

Although the raid was designed to block the cash flow, defense sources say there is more where that came from.

DOJ_NMG_0087707

Retired Marine Corps Lt. Gen. Michael DeLong, the former deputy commander of U.S. Central Command, said literally tons of cash moved from Baghdad into Syria as the U.S. invasion neared in March 2003. That money is now going full circle to feed the Sunni insurgency.

"We watched caravans going into Syria," Gen. DeLong said. "They took their money; their jewels. They took everything."

But not all the cash got out.

"We found U.S. money all through the capital," Gen. DeLong said. "Saddam and the Ba'ath Party had caches of U.S. money stashed everywhere. One day, one guy found $10 million in cash."

The Ba'ath Party had built up huge cash stocks via the United Nations oil-for-food program, mostly from illicit sale of goods and oil. The U.S. military seized $926 million from the Iraq regime as of the summer of 2004, according to a report from the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

The Eye Of The Storm (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

Every weekday at 8 a.m., Kevin Brock hefts a thick white ring binder onto a sleek, oval conference table. Labeled "Read Book," the deceptively plain folder houses the "Threat Matrix," a top-secret compendium of the most troubling reports of possible terrorist activity, drawn from the nation's 16 intelligence agencies. It is thicker than usual on a recent Monday morning, packed with 66 separate items that came in over the weekend. Brock, the principal deputy director of the National Counterterrorism Center, is about to brief some of the government's most senior officials on the latest threat information.

First, though, he must sort through the reports, most of which are vague-and sometimes little more than anonymous tips. Many are false alarms. ("If we could eliminate all the jilted lovers and ex-spouses," Brock says later, cracking a smile, "we would greatly reduce the number of threats we receive on a daily basis.") But some of the nuggets-coming from CIA operatives, FBI sources, or reliable foreign spy agencies-must be taken seriously. Brock, after meeting with the leadership of the counterterrorism center, decided to present 18 of the threat reports at the 8 a.m. videoconference.

Facing a wall of secure video feeds, Brock watches top leaders from a dozen key players gather-the CIA, the FBI, the eavesdroppers at the National Security Agency, even the White House. A briefer from the center, running through the 18 items, discusses possible terrorist action in south Asia, Southeast Asia, the Middle East, even inside the United States. Brock raises the recent release of a videotape showing two of the September 11 hijackers smiling for the camera. He pays particular attention to overseas threats that have a possible domestic angle. "NCTC was created to ... ensure the handshake occurs between international intelligence collection and the FBI or others within the country to take action," says Brock, a career FBI agent. "And we're seeing that take place on almost a daily basis."

"No boundaries." Housed in an unmarked office complex in Northern Virginia, the National Counterterrorism Center has become the centerpiece of reform efforts to integrate the far-flung intelligence community. The NCTC was created in the wake of the September 11 attacks to reduce the gulf between America's spy agencies and domestic law enforcement. With more than 30 separate, highly classified government networks pumping information into NCTC headquarters, it has unfettered access to the crown jewels of the U.S. intelligence community-including raw cables from CIA spies and detailed FBI case files. One congressional staffer with knowledge of intelligence matters calls it a "miracle," only half joking. "We're the only place in the U.S. government where all that information comes together," says retired Vice Adm. Scott Redd, the center's director. "There are no boundaries in this business."

Inside and outside the intelligence world, however, people are still confused about what the two-year-old organization is supposed to do-and what it's not. U.S. News was granted unprecedented access to the senior leadership of the NCTC, which is supposed to become the primary hub for tracking and analyzing the terrorist threat. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte calls it the single biggest change during his 18 months in office. "The center is really looked to as the principal source of analysis of these kinds of developments," Negroponte tells U.S. News. The NCTC is still building up its ranks, but already it is butting up against the other agencies that work on terrorism, particularly the CIA, which has run its own CounterTerrorism Center since 1986.

Hey, Let's Play Ball (USNEWS)

By David E. Kaplan

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

At a modest office building just outside Boston last July, senior U.S. intelligence officials quietly set in motion an unusual experiment. For four weeks, a handpicked group of 20 outside experts brainstormed, argued, and chewed the fat with 20 top analysts from the CIA and eight other intelligence agencies. Their mission: to understand why people join terrorist organizations and other groups engaged in antisocial activity. The issues went to some of the most basic questions confronting Washington's intelligence mandarins: What's driving the spread of extremism around the globe, and how can it be stopped?

Dubbed the Summer Hard Problems workshop, or SHARP, the program is modeled after a highly successful project by the code-breaking National Security Agency, which for years has brought in top mathematicians to tackle cutting-edge issues in encryption. SHARP similarly threw together leading specialists, but from the social sciences: experts in anthropology, social psychology, insurgency, and Islamic thought, among other fields. But for all the esoteric talk about jihadism, group dynamics, and social networks, the SHARP participants had a second mission: to change the way U.S. intelligence agencies do their job, by opening the notoriously insular espionage community to the rest of the world.

SHARP is the brainchild of the 18-month-old Office of the Director of National Intelligence, which is charged with overseeing and reforming the nation's sprawling $44 billion intelligence community. Key to that effort is an organized attack on the kind of "groupthink" that resulted in U.S. intelligence agencies getting dead wrong, among other things, nearly every facet of Saddam Hussein's banned weapons programs. Reformers at the DNI and other agencies hope to answer critics who call the nation's spy agencies obsolete-a bunch of big bureaucracies so addicted to secrecy that they can't cope in the Internet age. "This culture of secrecy in an information-rich world is totally anachronistic," says Phil Williams, an international security expert at the University of Pittsburgh who often consults with intelligence agencies.

Wiki-spies? To help change the way the nation's espionage agencies do business, senior DNI officials are pushing an effort unlike any seen since the height of the Vietnam War, nearly 40 years ago. The SHARP workshop is but one of a wide array of outreach projects now underway, involving millions of dollars in contracts, fellowships, conferences-even wikis and blogs-directed at scholars and other outside experts. DNI officials are mindful of the past, when Vietnam War-era funding drew loud protests on campus, amid charges that the CIA had skewed academic research on Asian studies and secretly backed groups like the National Student Association. The new effort has also begun to stir controversy, but for those who respond, the rewards can be considerable, including contracts, lucrative stipends, and a chance to influence analysis at the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies. The scope is broad: A classified DNI survey this year yielded 240 pages of outreach efforts involving virtually every U.S. agency that generates intelligence information. Those interested (and invited) enter a world of exclusive conferences, workshops, studies, sabbaticals, and scholarships. Participants include not only academics but experts at think tanks, international groups, foundations, and businesses, as well as medical doctors and scientists. "The intelligence community will never be big enough, will never have enough analysts," says Thomas Fingar, the DNI's chief of analysis. "There's an absolute need to go outside."

Senator Questions Anthrax Probe (KNOXNS)

By Richard Powelson, Powelsonr@shns.com

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 30, 2006

Grassley wants info on progress, director's exit

WASHINGTON - A Senate committee chairman has complained to the Department of Justice about the apparent "little progress" in the five-year-old anthrax mailing investigation and asked for documents on why the director of the probe, Richard Lambert, was "removed" and transferred to the Knoxville FBI office.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, chairman of the Finance Committee, wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recently that the FBI's long record of not briefing key members of Congress on the investigation "may be a symptom of a larger problem at the FBI. The agency's lack of response to congressional requests ... and what appears to be little progress in the investigation leads me to question whether the culture has really changed."

A spokesman at the FBI's Washington field office did not return a call for comment.

However, Lambert, 45, in a phone interview with the News Sentinel, said he heard of the opening in the top management job at the Knoxville field office, remembered fondly the 10 years he had spent in the Nashville area as a child, and decided to try to win the Knoxville slot.

"Knoxville is considered a prime office within the FBI," Lambert said. "The work is good, the people are wonderful, the law enforcement liaison relationships are fantastic, and it's just a highly desirable and very sought-after office to be in. There's the cost of living, no state income tax, reasonable housing, and the list goes on and on and on. So Knoxville is a great place to live."

The deadly anthrax mailings began soon after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Over multiple weeks, anthrax was mailed to some in the news media and in Congress, infected part of the postal service system, killed five people and infected 18 others. Thousands of Americans were panicked into seeking the antibiotic Cipro.

It spurred major, permanent changes in the handling of federal mail that still detour, delay, screen and treat dangerous substances sent through the system.

Lambert said he could not discuss details of the anthrax investigation that he supervised during the last four years but said he is optimistic that the culprit or culprits will be identified and caught.

"I am absolutely confident that it will be solved. It does represent the worst biological attack in U.S. history," he said.

Lambert took over the anthrax case supervision a year after the crime and said that he never knew how long the anthrax case would last. So, his wife remained at their San Diego home while he headed the investigation in Washington. He was chosen to head the anthrax case, he speculated, in part because he had supervised a comprehensive probe of what two of the 9/11 hijackers had done while living in San Diego before going east to help hijack commercial airliners.

He flew back home about once a month during the past four years, he said, but did not want to test the strength of his marriage any longer.

He competed for the Knoxville job and won selection to the post, he said.

Grassley wrote to the Justice Department that he wants a detailed briefing by Nov. 21 on his long list of concerns about the anthrax investigation.

Lambert said he was working on the anthrax case through August with competent FBI officials above and below his level, so he is "confident that they are bringing some continuity to the case in light of my departure."

Who Should Insure Against Terrorism? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, October 30, 2006

NEW YORK

The threat sounded ominous: Dirty bombs would be detonated at Giants Stadium and six other stadiums across the country. It would be "America's Hiroshima," causing civil war, chaos, and global economies to "screech to a halt."

Fortunately the threat was just a hoax perpetrated by a 20-year-old grocery store clerk from Wisconsin.

But since 9/11 businesses such as Giants Stadium have had to insure themselves against possibilities once thought unimaginable. Right after the 2001 attacks, many couldn't. The cost of terrorism insurance skyrocketed, and some insurers simply refused coverage. That left businesses and the economy vulnerable to economic chaos in the event of another attack.

Congress eventually stepped in and guaranteed that losses over a certain amount would be covered if they were due to a "certified" terrorist attack and if insurance companies would make such coverage available.

But the fix - the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act (TRIA) - was temporary. And while the law has been extended once, it will expire at the end of 2007.

Now an ideologically charged debate has sparked about whether the federal government should have a permanent role in the terrorism insurance business. The debate comes down to who should provide such insurance: the private marketplace or a public-private partnership?

The debate has created some unusual political bedfellows: Big-city liberals are lining up with the corporate insurance industry against Republican conservatives and consumer advocates.

"The industry and the left want a long-term program with some subsidies, but the White House and some Republicans are afraid that it would create another bureaucracy. They want the market to handle it," says Robert Hunter, director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America. Major attack could bankrupt insurers

There are a few things all agree on. The first is that the damage caused by a terrorist attack with a weapon of mass destruction - nuclear, biological, chemical, or radiological (known together as NBCR in insurance jargon) - would be so great it would bankrupt the insurance industry, and thus such risks are uninsurable.

For instance if New York City was hit by, say, a nuclear bomb, insured losses could be as high as $778 billion, according to an analysis by the American Academy of Actuaries in Washington, D.C. - and that's not even considered a worst-case scenario.

The other point of agreement is that terrorism insurance for other types of attacks is needed to ensure economic stability and growth.

The White House and the Consumer Federation's Mr. Hunter believe that in the years since 9/11, the market has proved it is capable of covering most losses due to a conventional terrorism attack.

"The insurance industry is just rolling in money, and the taxpayers aren't. We have huge deficits," says Hunter. "Why should we be subsidizing a rich industry that's making record profits right now?"

He contends that since "the big stuff" like nuclear, biological, and chemical damages aren't covered anyway, there's no reason for taxpayers to continue picking up part of the tab for conventional attacks like airplanes or truck bombs crashing into buildings. Risk hard to model

Insurance experts acknowledge the industry did make record profits in the past year, in part because insurers hiked premiums in anticipation of another massive hurricane such as Katrina - that never materialized.

They also contend the threat of terrorism is inherently different from that of natural disasters because it presents too many uncertainties to be modeled to effectively anticipate frequency and potential levels of damage. Without TRIA they contend many companies might just exclude coverage for all terrorist incidents.

"Given where we're at in the global war on terrorism, it's absolutely impossible to really characterize the true nature of the threat environment that we're living in," says James Valverde, vice president of economics and risk management at the Insurance Information Institute, an industry think tank in New York. "It's amorphous, ambiguous, and we can't say anything about it with any specificity."

Actuaries, the people who model risk for the industry, say they can model some types of terrorist risk based on the kind of catastrophic models they use for natural disasters such as hurricane Katrina. The Defense Department also has done extensive analyses of the types of damage done by truck bombs of different sizes.

That information can be used to estimate the economic losses, which can be used to come up with estimated insurance premiums.

The only problem, actuaries say, is that it's impossible to model how often a terrorist truck bombing might occur.

"If we talk about modeling frequency, that's in its infancy," says Michael McCarter, chair of the American Academy of Actuaries Terrorism Risk Insurance Sub Group, a professional organization headquartered in Washington. "We don't think it's at a stage to be reliable enough for insurers, and it may never get there."

Opponents of federal involvement in terrorism insurance argue the TRIA program has kept the market from coming up with such solutions faster.

As a result, when TRIA was extended in 2005, Congress increased the amount that private insurers would have to pay on their own before the federal government would take over.

Insurance experts contend that that's proof the industry is taking on more of the risks associated with terrorism and working for a solution.

But they worry that if the federal backstop disappears before the market is ready to step in fully, places like Giants Stadium could again see their insurance rates skyrocket, if terrorism insurance doesn't disappear completely.

"The industry is looking in the end for a long- term solution," says Dr. Valverte. "We need to find a productive way to move forward, but we need the federal backstop for now."

Ex-air Marshal To Sue Over 'SSI' Label (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

A former federal air marshal said he will file suit against the government today to challenge use of a nonclassified label that he says allows Homeland Security officials to cover up dangerous and inept policies.

Robert MacLean, an air marshal who was fired for blowing the whistle on a cutback of flight protections in the wake of a terrorist alert, is the first federal employee to challenge the validity of the "Sensitive Security Information" (SSI) label in court.

Asked why he is challenging the bureaucratic tool, Mr. MacLean said, "Vindictive retaliation like this makes agents unwilling to report gross mismanagement."

Families of victims of the September 11 terrorist attacks and government-watchdog groups have failed to obtain records classified as SSI.

The Government Accountability Office and Congress are critical of the label and say it is overused and stamped on everything from official correspondence to general items such as going-away-party invitations.

According to a June 2005 GAO report, SSI "monitoring controls are weak" and has "led to confusion and unnecessary classification of some materials as SSI."

"Identification of SSI has often appeared to be ad-hoc, marked by confusion and disagreement, depending on the viewpoint, experience and training of the identifier," the report said.

Mr. MacLean revealed to reporters and members of Congress on July 29, 2003, that air marshals were going to protect only flights less than four hours long to reduce costs of overnight hotel stays for long-distance flights. The new order came just three days after the Homeland Security Department issued a warning that terrorists were planning more hijackings.

"Hijackers may attempt to use common items carried by travelers such as cameras modified as weapons," said the July 26, 2003, bulletin from the Department of Homeland Security. "Attack venues may include the United Kingdom, Italy, Australia or the East Coast of the United States due to the relatively high concentration of government, military and economic targets."

"I risked everything to protect national security, but they terminated me for their own dangerous and inane plans," Mr. MacLean said.

"But I have no regrets. I did the right thing," said Mr. MacLean, who still serves as vice president of the Federal Air Marshal Service unit of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association (FLEOA).

"MacLean's termination is a case study in the abuse of government secrecy," said Nick Schwellenbach, investigator for the Project on Government Oversight. Mr. MacLean was fired in April and completed the Merit Systems Protection Board hurdles earlier this month. His suit will be filed today in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and challenges SSI as a nonbinding and abused classification.

"SSI was supposed to protect lives, but it is instead used to cover up mistakes or bad decisions," Mr. MacLean said.

Conan Bruce, Federal Air Marshal Service spokesman, declined to comment. "Our standard is we don't discuss personnel matters," he said.

Unlike classifications of information as "secret" or "top secret," SSI is an administrative tool designed to protect information that might endanger air security.

Bob Haefele, a lawyer with Motley Rice LLC, which represents the September 11 families, said SSI is used to "protect weaknesses in the system from disclosure, rather than fixing the weakness."

Adam Miles, legislative director for the Government Accountability Project, said Mr. MacLean's case is on "solid ground."

"The Federal Air Marshal Service is in blatant violation of the Whistleblowers Protection Act, which protects the disclosure of unclassified information that an employee feels endangers public health and safety, and Robert certainly did that," Mr. Miles said.

Firm Tests DNA Of 9/11 Victims (WT)

By Bryce Baschuk

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Dozens of scientists are working around-the-clock in a Lorton laboratory to identify the remains of 1,100 World Trade Center victims.

In the past five years, the Bode Technology Group has been hired to use its DNA testing to identify the bone fragments from high-profile disasters such as the September 11 attacks, Hurricane Katrina and the South Asian tsunami.

Last week, engineers working at the World Trade Center (WTC) site discovered more human remains, and specialists say the bones are so well-preserved that the DNA will be usable for analysis.

Bode was one of several national companies selected to identify the remains.

"We are going to exhaust everything they send our way," said Tom Hansen, a senior scientist at Bode.

The project to identify the WTC victims was put on hold about a year ago to wait for a better technology to identify the victims, a Bode official said.

Many of the 20,730 human remains found at the site are damaged and burned beyond recognition, said a spokesman for the New York Office of the Chief Medical Examiner.

Scientists at Bode have found success with a new technique that extracts DNA information from formerly unidentifiable human remains.

When the best-preserved samples were re-analyzed with the new technique, Bode had an 80 percent success rate, said Bode Vice President Ed Huffine.

The scientists take small samples from human tissue, bones, blood, hair or saliva and extract enough DNA to create an identification profile. When identifying WTC remains, the scientists applied a chemical to dissolve minerals from the bone fragments. The remaining organic residue was extracted to identify the person's DNA.

The new method is more effective at separating DNA from the chemical solution because the process has led to less DNA contamination and a greater recovery of DNA from bone samples.

"The DNA identification community thought it would be a lot longer for this technology to come along," Mr. Hansen said. "So it gives us a sense of pride to help out and bring closure to the people affected."

For the WTC victims, Bode sends the DNA information to the New York Office of the Chief Medical Examiner for identification. Employees at the office then compare the DNA profile with a database of genetic information from the unidentified victims.

Bode has gained a strong reputation for its work with international disaster management organizations in the aftermath of wars, genocide, terrorism, crime and natural disasters.

The company also has been hired by law-enforcement agencies, crime laboratories and national and foreign governments to identify humans from samples containing DNA. Bode analyzes 800 to 1,000 sexual assault kits per month, and is often asked to analyze DNA samples from felons.

The company has grown significantly since its founding in 1995. The staff has increased 50 percent to 110 employees, and Bode recently moved into a larger building to accommodate them. During the design phase of the new facility, the scientists asked the engineers to develop a workspace that would facilitate large projects, such as the WTC identification effort.

Bode is a privately owned subsidiary of ChoicePoint Inc., an Alpharetta, Ga., company that collects, sells access to and analyzes consumers' personal information. Bode would not disclose information about its financial performance.

With no time frame for the WTC project, the Bode staff is prepared for a long haul.

"Anytime you are able to contribute to something like this, you feel humbled by it," Mr. Hansen said.

Book Provides Lessons On Managing Emergencies And Strengthening Homeland Security (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In March 1964, a great earthquake shattered homes, harbors, roads, and water and sewer systems in Alaska, destroying communities vital to the state's economic life. Without significant rebuilding before the winter freeze, officials feared, citizens would be forced to flee to the lower 48 states.

But only four months after the quake, which had registered 9.2 on the Richter scale, a remarkable recovery was underway in Alaska. The White House had set up a reconstruction commission headed by a senator and run by a senior federal career official. The unusual legislative-executive branch arrangement put speed and muscle into the disaster recovery project.

The Alaska reconstruction stands in stark contrast to the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina four decades later, of course. The account of the Alaska response, in a just-released book by the National Academy of Public Administration, reinforces widely held perceptions that the government is unable to draw on past experiences and is at risk of losing its ability to perform effectively, especially in times of crisis.

The academy is a nonprofit corporation chartered by Congress to provide advice to government agencies, and academy fellows have written "Meeting the Challenge of 9/11: Blueprints for More Effective Government" with an eye toward providing lessons for policymakers, especially officials at the Department of Homeland Security.

The department, formed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, has shown that "reorganization is not a cure of poor coordination and can make matters worse, at least during the shake-down period," Thomas H. Stanton , the book's editor, writes in an introduction.

Strengthening homeland security, the book says, will require federal officials to look beyond traditional turf boundaries and pull together state and local governments and the private sector to tackle common and complex problems.

Two other themes emerge in the 352-page book: that the government needs to focus on training and rewarding managers for operating across organizational boundaries and that it must pay more attention to the design and management of agencies and programs.

Contributors to the book are former federal officials and scholars, including Murray Comarow , Alan L. Dean , Dwight Ink and Ronald C. Moe , who write on management issues; Beryl A. Radin , on organizational performance; Dan Guttman , on holding government contractors accountable; and Cindy Williams , on overhauling the military personnel system.

Dean and Ink discuss the importance of having a senior official in large agencies focused on management issues -- such as accounting and finance, procurement, personnel, technology and property. They point to the undersecretary of management in the Department of Homeland Security as the kind of post that can help a Cabinet secretary succeed in pulling together internal operations.

As part of their review of the undersecretary's job at Homeland Security, they recommend that the department ensure the job, which will probably be held by a political appointee, has a sidekick from the career ranks who can provide continuity during presidential transitions.

Dean and Ink also contend that too many jobs in the Homeland Security undersecretary's office have been reserved for political appointees. "With respect to fighting terrorism overseas, there is recognition of the value of depending on professional career military leaders who serve under a small number of political policy leaders in Washington. Why should professional career leadership be any less critical for protecting our homeland against terrorism?" they ask.

They add, "It is essential that the management of homeland security not be politicized."

That, however, appears to be happening. Members of Congress have questioned whether the position of undersecretary is needed at Homeland Security, in part because the deputy secretary has a strong hand in day-to-day operations. Congress also has cut funding requests for the undersecretary's office, usually to reorder priorities. (Only one person has ever held the undersecretary position, and she left in May.)

Moe offers a broader perspective on government organization, contending that the president needs an office of federal management, in part to counter perceptions "that somehow he isn't managing the store."

His research, Moe writes, shows "the core departments and agencies are in many instances 'hollow,' with an over-reliance upon third parties to perform both operational and management responsibilities."

The Office of Management and Budget, which faces the annual task of producing a federal budget, "is simply not equipped to perform the [management] tasks required of it," Moe concluded. He calls on the president and Congress to take a "necessary first step" by splitting up the OMB to create "an essentially nonpartisan" office dedicated to ensuring competent federal management.

WAR NEWS:

GOP, Democratic Leaders Spar On Rumsfeld (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 30, 2006

The No. 2 leader in the House on Sunday said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is "the best thing that's happened to the Pentagon in 25 years," sparking a debate with Democrats who said the comments show why the GOP should be voted out of power.

Rumsfeld's leadership of the bloody mission in Iraq has become a divisive issue in the Nov. 7 elections. Many Democrats and a few Republicans are calling for his resignation, but President Bush repeatedly has defended him. So did House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, during an appearance Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

"I think Donald Rumsfeld is the best thing that's happened to the Pentagon in 25 years," Boehner said. "This Pentagon and our military needs a transformation. And I think Donald Rumsfeld's the only man in America who knows where the bodies are buried at the Pentagon, has enough experience to help transform that institution."

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said voters will have their chance to show if they agree with Boehner on Election Day.

"It's true President Bush may not be on the ballot, but people like Boehner and people who support Rumsfeld and Cheney and Bush, they're on the ballot," Rangel said on CNN's "Late Edition."

"And that's why we only get two years. You don't have to wait to get the president. This is a referendum on the war and the incompetency of the Bush administration."

Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, head of the Democratic effort to win control of the House, quickly e-mailed a statement to reporters objecting to Boehner's comments and including quotes from seven military leaders criticizing the defense secretary.

"Congressman Boehner's defense of Donald Rumsfeld makes it crystal clear that we need change in Washington from the rubber stamp Republican Congress and their blind adherence to President Bush and Secretary Rumsfeld's stay the course policy in Iraq," Emanuel's e-mail said.

Republican Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, appearing with Rangel on CNN, said she has confidence in Rumsfeld.

"I think it's a shame to take this complex issue of winning the international war on terror and putting it at the level of whether you like or not like Donald Rumsfeld, and whether you like or don't like President Bush's personalities and the statements that he's made," she said.

Another Republican, Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele, declined to back the Pentagon chief.

"He wouldn't be my secretary of defense," Steele said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "And ultimately, that's going to be a decision that the president of the United States makes."

U.S. Is Said To Fail In Tracking Arms For Iraqis (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

The American military has not properly tracked hundreds of thousands of weapons intended for Iraqi security forces and has failed to provide spare parts, maintenance personnel or even repair manuals for most of the weapons given to the Iraqis, a federal report released Sunday has concluded.

DOJ_NMG_0087714

The report was undertaken at the request of Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and who recently expressed an assessment far darker than the Bush administration's on the situation in Iraq.

Mr. Warner sent his request in May to a federal oversight agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. He also asked the inspector general to examine whether Iraqi security forces were developing a logistics operation capable of sustaining the hundreds of thousands of troops and police officers the American military says it has trained.

The answers came Sunday from the inspector general's office, which found major discrepancies in American military records on where thousands of 9-millimeter pistols and hundreds of assault rifles and other weapons have ended up. The American military did not even take the elementary step of recording the serial numbers of nearly half a million weapons provided to Iraqis, the inspector general found, making it impossible to track or identify any that might be in the wrong hands.

Exactly where untracked weapons could end up — and whether some have been used against American soldiers — were not examined in the report, although black-market arms dealers thrive on the streets of Baghdad, and official Iraq Army and police uniforms can easily be purchased as well, presumably because government shipments are intercepted or otherwise corrupted.

In a written response to the inspector general's findings, the American military largely conceded the shortcomings. The military said it would assist the Iraqis in determining the spare parts and maintenance requirements for the weapons. The military also said it has now instituted a "process to accurately issue weapons by quantity and serial number listing."

Because the inspector general is charged only with looking at weaponry financed directly by the American taxpayer, the total of lost weapons could end up being higher. The Government Accountability Office and the Pentagon inspector general are expected to look at weapons financed by all sources, including the Iraqi government.

The inspector general's office, led by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., also a Republican, responded to Mr. Warner's query about the Iraqi Army's logistical capabilities with another report released at the same time, concluding that Iraqi security forces still depended heavily on the Americans for the operations that sustain a modern army: deliveries of fuel and ammunition, troop transport, health care and maintenance.

Mr. Bowen found that the American military was not able to say how many Iraqi logistics personnel it had trained — in this case because, the military told the inspector general, a computer network crash erased records. Those problems have occurred even though the United States has spent $133 million on the weapons program and $666 million on Iraqi logistics capabilities.

The report said that although the United States planned to scale back its support for logistics and maintenance for Iraqi security forces in 2007, it was unclear whether the Iraqi government had any intention of compensating by allocating sufficient money to the Ministries of Interior and Defense.

Mr. Warner confirmed through his spokesman, John Ullyot, that he was reviewing the reports over the weekend in advance of a scheduled meeting with Mr. Bowen on Tuesday.

Mr. Warner "believes it is essential that Congress and the American people continue to be kept informed by the inspector general on the equipping and logistical capabilities of the Iraqi Army and security forces, since these represent an important component of overall readiness," Mr. Ullyot said.

Mr. Bowen said in an interview that he was particularly concerned about whether the Iraqi government intended to allocate enough money to support the logistics and maintenance needed for the Iraqi security forces to operate effectively.

"There's a couple of red flags," Mr. Bowen said. "Most significantly, is the Iraqi Ministry of Interior properly preparing to take over the mission and sustain it?"

"We don't know because we don't have adequate visibility into their budgeting," he said, "and to a lesser extent the same red flag is up for the Department of Defense."

Another report unrelated to Mr. Warner's request was also released by the inspector general on Sunday, on the so-called provincial reconstruction teams that the United States is creating for the next phase of rebuilding Iraq's infrastructure.

While some of the teams, intended to be scattered in each of Iraq's 18 provinces, are functioning, security problems have severely hampered work in others, the report says. As a result, the inspector general recommended, the United States should consider reassigning its personnel in six provinces — including Basra in the south and Anbar in the west — to other places where effective work can be done.

The western province of Anbar is a central focus of the Sunni insurgency, and power struggles between Shiite militias have made Basra increasingly violent. The other four provinces that the inspector general recommends essentially abandoning are also in the Shiite south.

In its assessment of Iraqi weaponry, the inspector general concluded that of the 505,093 weapons that have been given to the Ministries of Interior and Defense over the last several years, serial numbers for only 12,128 were properly recorded. The weapons include rocket-propelled grenade launchers, assault rifles, machine guns, shotguns, semiautomatic pistols and sniper rifles.

Of those weapons, 370,000 were purchased with American taxpayer money under what is called the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund, or I.R.R.F., and therefore fell within the inspector general's mandate.

Despite the potential risks from losing track of those weapons — involving 19 different contracts and 142 delivery orders — the United States recorded serial numbers for no more than a few thousand, the inspector general said.

There are standard regulations for registering military weaponry in that way, governed by the Department of Defense small-arms serialization program. The inspector general's report said that when asked why so many weapons went to Iraq with no record of serial numbers, American military officials in Baghdad replied that they did not believe the regulations applied to them.

Still, in their response to the report, military officials said they would keep track of serial numbers for weapons shipped or issued in the future, but in a database outside the small-arms serialization program. They did not present a plan for identifying or monitoring weapons that had already been issued.

The inspector general's report also found that money for spare parts was allocated for only 5 of the 12 different kinds of weapons sent to Iraq — and when the inspector general contacted units of the Defense and Interior Ministries, none actually knew how or where to requisition spare parts.

There were also significant discrepancies in the numbers of weapons purchased and those in Iraqi warehouses. While 176,866 semiautomatic pistols were purchased with American money, just 163,386 showed up in warehouses — meaning that more than 13,000 were unaccounted for. All 751 of the M1-F assault rifles sent to Iraq were missing, and nearly 100 MP-5 machine guns.

Audit Finds Missing U.S. Weapons In Iraq (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, October 30, 2006

Nearly one of every 25 weapons the military bought for Iraqi security forces is missing, a government audit said Sunday. Many others cannot be repaired because parts or technical manuals are lacking.

A second report found "significant challenges remain that put at risk" the U.S. military's goal of strengthening Iraqi security forces by transferring all logistics operations to the defense ministry by the end of 2007.

A third report concerned the Provincial Reconstruction Team program, in which U.S. government experts help Iraqis develop regional governmental institutions. "The unstable security environment in Iraq touches every aspect of the PRT program," the report said.

The Pentagon cannot account for 14,030 weapons — almost 4 percent of the semiautomatic pistols, assault rifles, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenade launchers and other weapons it began supplying to Iraq since the end of 2003, according to a report from the office of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction.

The missing weapons will not be tracked easily: The Defense Department registered the serial numbers of only about 10,000 of the 370,251 weapons it provided — less than 3 percent.

The Pentagon spent $133 million on the weapons, and "the capacity of the Iraqi government to provide national security and public order is partly contingent on arming the Iraqi security forces, under the ministries of defense and interior," the report notes. Military officials insisted the weapons either had to be new or never issued to a previous soldier.

By December, the U.S. military had planned to put those weapons in the hands of 325,500 personnel.

Missing from the Defense Department's inventory books were 13,180 semiautomatic pistols, 751 assault rifles and 99 machine guns, according to an audit requested by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The audit does not make clear at what point the weapons were lost. But it notes that "there could have been undetected losses" before weapons were ever issued to Iraqi security forces — who also lack many needed spare parts, technical repair manuals and arms maintenance personnel.

The second audit, on logistics capabilities, said there is a "significant risk" that the Iraqi interior ministry "will not be capable of assuming and sustaining logistics support for the Iraqi local and national police forces in the near term." That support includes equipment maintenance, transportation of people and gear and health resources for soldiers and police.

Army Col. Brian Baldy, chief of staff for the Defense Department operation in Baghdad training Iraqi forces, told auditors he agreed with most of the report's recommendations to improve weapons accountability. The report calls on the U.S. military to create accurate weapons inventories, fill maintenance positions and tell how to get spare parts.

But he said one recommendation for registering all the weapons' serial numbers was "unattainable" because some of them are foreign-owned. The audit said the military's inventory books also included some weapons that had been donated, captured from enemies or bought with other funds.

Maj. Gen. Thomas Moore of the Marine Corps said he agreed with the logistics audit recommendations that the U.S. military create a plan to train Iraqi police and examine how well Iraqi agencies' budgets support the supply chain and help for specialists with other training such as doctors, nurses, medics and mechanics.

The report on Provincial Reconstruction Teams said that, because of security issues, they "have varying degrees of ability to carry out their missions." Auditors reviewed nine teams and four satellite offices and found "4 were generally able, 4 were somewhat able, 3 were less able and 2 were generally unable" to accomplish their goals.

Dems Claim Momentum, GOP Mobilizes Base (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, October 30, 2006

Republicans on Sunday said a major voter turnout effort would help them stay in power after the Nov. 7 elections, while Democrats claimed momentum as they seek to tap into voter unhappiness over Iraq.

Both sides agreed that the war in Iraq was a leading, if not central, issue in the contests to decide control of the House and Senate.

"This election is becoming more and more a referendum on George Bush, his failed policies both overseas and at home with a rubber stamp Congress," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, head of the Senate Democratic campaign committee.

His Republican counterpart, Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, said Iraq and the broader fight against terrorism were important issues, but "President Bush's name is not on the ballot." Democrats, she said, were trying "to make it a national referendum."

Schumer and Dole were among the politicians and party leaders who sparred on the Sunday talk shows just nine days before the elections.

Democrats need a gain of 15 seats to win control of the 435-member House and six seats to claim the 100-member Senate.

With approval slumping for both the war and the president, recent polls show Democrats have their best chance to reclaim the House since the GOP swept them from power in 1994, and a shot at capturing the Senate as well.

As the candidates entered their final full week of campaigning, House Democrats worked to emphasize the GOP role in the Iraq war. The party's campaign committee said it would air television commercials criticizing Republicans for supporting the war in about a dozen competitive races in the coming days.

"Despite a war gone wrong and no plan for victory, politicians like (Rep.) Rob Simmons keep voting to stay the course again and again," says one commercial, airing in Connecticut.

Democrats have increased the number of races where they are advertising in recent days, a sign of confidence as the election approaches. In addition to new offensives in Kansas, Kentucky and New Hampshire, officials disclosed plans to run commercials against Republican Rep. Jim Walsh this week in the area around Syracuse, N.Y.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said polls showing a Democratic advantage, especially in the House, "don't mean anything, because what we have are 435 individual races all around the country, local candidates running on local issues."

"If we mobilize all our voters, we'll do well on Election Day," Boehner said.

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, sounded a common Republican theme — that a Democratic-led Congress would mean higher taxes. Democrats accused him of scare tactics.

Mehlman suggested "across-the-board tax increases affecting millions of Americans" if Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel became chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee. The New York lawmaker is now the panel's senior Democrat.

Last week, Vice President Dick Cheney contended Rangel wanted to undo popular tax cuts enacted during Bush's first term. Cheney's claim was based in part on Rangel's own remark that he could not think of one of Bush's tax cuts that merited renewal.

"Once again the vice president hasn't the slightest clue about what he's talking about. He's never talked with me and neither has anyone in the administration about taxes," Rangel said Sunday. Rangel said his own remarks referred to broad-based tax overhaul efforts.

"What I did say was that, if they want to have tax reform, if they want simplification, everything has to be on the table," Rangel said.

Democratic party chief Howard Dean said Democrats "have no intention of raising taxes except on the people who have got enormous tax breaks — like the oil companies — from the Republicans."

In Senate races, both national parties were focusing on a dwindling number of states, notably Tennessee, Missouri, New Jersey and Virginia.

Democrats had strong leads against Republican incumbents in Rhode Island, Montana, Pennsylvania and Ohio.

"The momentum here is outstanding on our side," said Democratic Rep. Harold Ford of Tennessee, vying for the seat now held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Ford denounced as "a piece of smut" an RNC-financed TV attack ad in which a white woman with bare shoulders says she met Ford at a "Playboy party," looks into the camera and whispers, "Harold, call me."

The ad does not mention that Ford is black. Civil rights groups complained the commercial makes an implicit appeal to a deep-seated racial fears about black men and white women.

"I don't think race had anything to do with that ad. I just think it was an uncalled-for, despicable, inappropriate ad," Ford said. He added, "The party of family values should not have run that in Tennessee or anywhere, for that matter."

Ford's GOP opponent, former Chattanooga, Tenn., mayor Bob Corker, was invited to appear with Ford but was not available, according to the Fox network.

Mehlman repeated his assertion that the RNC had no control over the independently produced ad, even though the RNC paid for it.

Also Sunday, rivals in Maryland's closely watched Senate race held a nationally televised debate in which Republican candidate Michael Steele, the lieutenant governor, said the Iraq was "a mess" and blamed the Pentagon for poor planning. Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin repeated his opposition to the war and said he hoped U.S. troops could be withdrawn by 2007; he called that a goal, not a deadline.

A poll released Sunday by The Washington Post had Cardin leading Steele by 11 percentage points.

In the New Jersey Senate race, Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez held a slight lead over Republican Tom Kean Jr., 48-42 percent in a poll published Sunday in The Record of Bergen County.

Meanwhile, the New York Times endorsed Connecticut Democrat Ned Lamont for Senate while The Hartford Courant and New Haven Register backed Sen. Joe Lieberman's independent bid for a fourth term.

"Ned Lamont has run a far less polished campaign than Mr. Lieberman, but the more we see of him, the more impressed we are by his intelligence and his growing sophistication about the issues facing the nation," the Times wrote.

Schumer, Dole and Ford were on "Fox News Sunday." Boehner appeared on ABC's "This Week," Dean and Mehlman on CBS' "Face the Nation," Steele and Cardin on NBC's "Meet the Press" and Rangel on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Democratic Majority Ready To Go To War Over Iraq (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

The Next Congress

First of five parts

Capitol Hill may soon swell from speed bump to stumbling block for an embattled President Bush, depending on which levers the voters pull in the congressional midterm elections a week from tomorrow.

Handicappers say Democrats have at least an outside chance of seizing control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in Mr. Bush's presidency, which would present him with stark new challenges in the final two years of his term.

In this series, The Washington Times will look at how such a transfer of power on Capitol Hill will affect U.S. policy and politics on a range of issues -- from taxes and immigration to health care and homeland security.

In foreign and security policy, the bloody frustrations of Iraq and the bitter partisan divide over the war on terrorism have defined House and Senate races across the country this fall.

With both Mr. Bush and the war in Iraq sagging badly in the polls, some suggest that the White House will face more resistance from Congress even if the Republicans hang on to their slim majorities.

"You're going to have much more legislative oomph, and [Congress is] going to be much more active on a whole range of issues," said Kurt Campbell, a top Pentagon and National Security Council aide in the Clinton administration and now director of international security programs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

"It won't be, 'Oh, that's fine; you go about your business in Iran and just let us know how it's going,' or, 'Tell us about North Korea when you're done with the negotiations,' " Mr. Campbell said.

Getting tough

The congressional elections come at a bad time for an administration confronting multiple overseas crises -- with Iraq, Iran and North Korea topping the list -- in addition to the long-term struggle against Islamic terrorist groups, said Richard Haass.

"I can't think of another time when an administration was being hit simultaneously with so many difficult, yet largely discrete, challenges," said the top State Department policy adviser in Mr. Bush's first term and now president of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations.

On some issues, though, the election is not expected to bring a major shift in foreign policy.

Both parties have largely supported the president's civilian nuclear pact with India, although Congress has yet to formally approve the deal. Leading Democrats also largely back the administration's strongly pro-Israel tilt, with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Tom Lantos, ranking Democrat on the House International Relations Committee, seen as particularly strong supporters of the Jewish state.

But congressional Democrats have vowed to end what they see as a rubber-stamp Congress under Republican leadership. They say Congress has barely challenged Mr. Bush on such momentous issues as the decision to invade Iraq, the campaign to contain North Korea's nuclear ambitions, new administration policies on intelligence gathering and the handling of detainees, and the overall management of the war on terrorism.

Sen. Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat in line to take over the Senate Armed Services Committee if his party wins a majority in the chamber, said major Democratic gains next week almost certainly would force the Bush administration to change tactics in Iraq and elsewhere.

Democratic control of even one chamber of Congress would have a "huge motivating force to change course," Mr. Levin said.

Iraq turnaround

Republicans warn that the elevation of anti-war liberal Democrats such as Mr. Levin and Mrs. Pelosi of California to leadership positions in Congress is exactly the wrong message to be sending in the most trying days of the global fight against terrorism. A Democratic majority, they say, could cripple the country's ability to take the fight to enemies overseas.

"I think Americans would prefer our generals to be fighting terrorists as opposed to fighting subpoenas," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said.

In addition to bigger roles for Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Levin, the congressional races could thrust a number of other Democrats into powerful foreign policy posts.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and the former Marine who has pushed for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, is in line to take over the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee -- the panel that introduces all bills to fund the Iraq war. Mr. Murtha also has said he might consider running for House majority leader if the Democrats win.

Rep. Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat and a harsh critic of the Pentagon's management of postwar Iraq, likely would be Mr. Levin's counterpart as new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee likely would be headed by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and another critic of the Iraq war who is pushing a plan for three separate federations with a central government in Baghdad.

Talking back

Mr. Campbell said a more assertive Congress controlled by the Democrats would be a particular headache for the Bush administration, which, he said, has grown used to having a free hand on foreign policy in the post-September 11 world.

"The defining vision of the executive branch has been, 'We're No. 1 and you don't matter,' " he said.

But "whoever comes to power, whether it's Republicans or Democrats, there's going to be a new sheriff in town in February and they're not going to take it from the administration and they're going to be much more aggressive about their prerogatives."

At a Council on Foreign Relations briefing earlier this month, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, acknowledged that, "obviously the temptation to some degree would be recrimination in light of how Democrats have been treated over the last number of years by the Republican majority."

Mr. Dodd added it was his "fervent hope" that Democrats could ignore the temptation "and try and forge some bipartisanship."

But political forecasters say, barring an unanticipated landslide next week, the new Congress once again will be almost evenly divided between the two major parties. Even if they take control of one or both chambers of Congress, Democrats almost certainly will not have the majorities they need to force through bills that Mr. Bush and the Republicans oppose.

And aside from not liking the administration's line on Iraq, the Middle East, North Korea and other issues, it's not clear the Democrats can unite around a single policy of their own.

The House Out of Iraq Caucus, made up of 78 Democrats, backs Mr. Murtha's call for a quick withdrawal of U.S. forces and favors using Congress' power of the purse to force the administration to act. But Mr. Levin and other influential Democrats in the Senate have criticized that idea.

DOJ_NMG_0087719

When Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin introduced an amendment in June to withdraw virtually all U.S. troops from Iraq by July 1, 2007, the Senate rejected the idea on an 86-13 vote.

Checking up

But a Democratic House or Senate could make life extremely uncomfortable for the administration in another way -- oversight.

Committee and subcommittee chairmen largely set the agenda for their panels, pick the hearing topics and have the biggest say on how to deploy staff and investigators.

The Republican-dominated Congress, Democrats complain, devoted far more time to the U.N. oil-for-food scandal in the past four years than they have to the administration's handling of the war on terrorism. Democratic lawmakers say they want to question officials on topics ranging from the North Korea nuclear negotiations to the awarding of Iraq contracts to U.S. firms such as Halliburton.

Democrats also vow to probe the administration's use of intelligence in the run-up to the invasion of Iraq in March 2003 and the strains on the U.S. military caused by the war and its aftermath.

Mr. Skelton, asked what his plans would be for the Armed Services Committee, replied succinctly: "Oversight, oversight, oversight."

In a new analysis, two congressional scholars, Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute and Thomas E. Mann of the Brookings Institution, say the Democratic charges have merit. In a lengthy study to be published in the journal Foreign Affairs, the two argue that "Congress' oversight of the executive branch on foreign and national security policy has virtually collapsed" over the past six years.

For example, in 2003 and 2004, the Senate Armed Services Committee held no hearings on the military campaign in Afghanistan, despite a resurgence of violence by fundamentalist Taliban insurgents.

Critics within

Mr. Campbell noted that even Republicans on Capitol Hill -- especially in the Senate -- have become more outspoken in their criticism of Mr. Bush in recent days, reflecting polls showing the president and the Iraq war are unpopular and the fact that Mr. Bush has only two years left in office.

Even if the Republicans retain control of Congress, Mr. Bush is unlikely to have the same kind of support from his own party that he enjoyed in past years.

Republican Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska have questioned administration claims of progress in Iraq. Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a front-runner in the race to succeed Mr. Bush, led congressional opposition to the administration's original plans on the handling of suspected terrorists in U.S. custody.

Mr. McCain is one of the few lawmakers in either party pushing the administration to send tens of thousands of new troops to Iraq to crush the insurgency.

But he admits that his is "clearly a minority view" with little chance of support in the next Congress.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, told the Associated Press in an interview last week , "We're on the verge of chaos [in Iraq], and the current plan is not working."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, recently broke with Mr. Bush by calling for direct U.S. talks with North Korea.

The White House has largely dismissed speculation on how the election could affect foreign policy as so much "chin-pulling," in the words of spokesman Tony Snow. Mr. Bush last week accused his critics of "dancing in the end zone when they haven't scored a touchdown."

But former President George Bush, who dealt with Democratic majorities in both the House and Senate throughout his four-year term, recently admitted at a Republican fundraiser in Philadelphia, 'I would hate to think what my son's life would be like" if the Democrats regained control of Congress.

The much-anticipated report being prepared by an independent commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III could alter the landscape before the 110th Congress is seated next year. Mr. Baker's panel, whose co-chairman is former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana, is reportedly ready to recommend a major course change in Iraq and the Middle East.

And Mr. Haass of the Council on Foreign Relations said Democratic gains in Congress likely will have far less effect on foreign policy than the hard facts presented by such crises as North Korea's recent nuclear test and the rising sectarian violence in Iraq.

"The administration is going to be under intense pressure to adjust its policies no matter how the vote goes," he said. "Right now, the facts on the ground are driving things far more than what's happening in Washington."

A Most Violent Month, And Many Final Farewells (NYT)

By Photographs By Doug Mills

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

Burials at Arlington National Cemetery took on a grim regularity in October, when at least 103 American troops were killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. In Iraq, the toll had reached 99 by Saturday, making October the deadliest month since January 2005.

Military officials attributed the high number of deaths to a spike in violence during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which began in late September and ended last week. They also pointed to a three-month campaign to win control of Baghdad from death squads that led to increased attacks on American troops.

But such explanations were little comfort to a 6-year-old girl weeping at the grave of her father, a mother clutching the flag from her son's coffin, or a widow walking slowly through the rain behind her husband's honor guard.

Diversity's Oppressions (WSJ)

By Thomas Sowell

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

Iraq is not the first war with ugly surprises and bloody setbacks. Even World War II, idealized in retrospect as it never was at the time -- the war of "the greatest generation" -- had a long series of disasters for Americans before victory was finally achieved.

The war began for Americans with the disaster at Pearl Harbor, followed by the tragic horror of the Bataan death march, the debacle at the Kasserine Pass and, even on the eve of victory, being caught completely by surprise by a devastating German counterattack that almost succeeded at the Battle of the Bulge.

Other wars -- our own and other nations' -- have likewise been full of nasty surprises and mistakes that led to bloodbaths. Nevertheless, the Iraq war has some special lessons for our time, lessons that both the left and the right need to acknowledge, whether or not they will. * * *

What is it that has made Iraq so hard to pacify, even after a swift and decisive military victory? In one word: diversity.

That word has become a sacred mantra, endlessly repeated for years on end, without a speck of evidence being asked for or given to verify the wonderful benefits it is assumed to produce.

Worse yet, Iraq is only the latest in a long series of catastrophes growing out of diversity. These include "ethnic cleansing" in the Balkans, genocide in Rwanda and the Sudan, the million lives destroyed in intercommunal violence when India became independent in 1947 and the even larger number of Armenians slaughtered by Turks during World War I.

Despite much gushing about how we should "celebrate diversity," America's great achievement has not been in having diversity but in taming its dangers that have run amok in many other countries. Americans have by no means escaped diversity's oppressions and violence, but we have reined them in.

Another concept whose bitter falsity has been painfully revealed in Iraq is "nation-building." People are not building blocks, however much some may flatter themselves that they can arrange their fellow human beings' lives the way you can arrange pieces on a chess board.

The biggest and most fatuous example of nation-building occurred right after World War I, when the allied victors dismembered the Habsburg Empire and the Ottoman Empire. Woodrow Wilson assigned a young Walter Lippman to sit down with maps and population statistics and start drawing lines that would define new nations.

Iraq is one of those new nations. Like other artificial creations in the Balkans, Africa and elsewhere, it has never had the cohesion of nations that evolved over the centuries out of the experiences of peoples who worked out their own modi vivendi in one way or another.

Tito's dictatorship held Yugoslavia together, as other dictatorships held together other peoples forced into becoming a nation by the decisions of outsiders who drew their boundaries on maps and in some cases -- Nigeria, for example -- even gave them their national name.

Even before 9/11, there were some neoconservatives who talked about our achieving "national greatness" by creating democratic nations in various parts of the world.

How much influence their ideas have had on the actual course of events is probably something that will not be known in our generation. But we can at least hope that the Iraq tragedy will chasten the hubris behind notions of "nation-building" and chasten also the pious dogmatism of those who hype "diversity" at every turn, in utter disregard of its actual consequences at home or abroad. Free societies have prerequisites, and history has not given all peoples those prerequisites, which took centuries to evolve in the West.

However we got into Iraq, we cannot undo history -- even recent history -- by simply pulling out and leaving events to take their course in that strife-torn country. Whether or not we "stay the course," terrorists are certainly going to stay the course in Iraq and around the world.

Political spin may say that Iraq has nothing to do with the war on terror, but the terrorists themselves quite obviously believe otherwise, as they converge on that country with lethal and suicidal resolve.

Whether we want to or not, we cannot unilaterally end the war with international terrorists. Giving the terrorists an epoch-making victory in Iraq would only shift the location where we must face them or succumb to them.

Abandoning Iraqi allies to their fate would ensure that other nations would think twice before becoming or remaining our allies. With a nuclear Iran looming on the horizon, we are going to need all the allies we can get.

More From This Issue Politics And War The President Pushes Back As A Deadly Month Adds To Voters' Anxiety (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

President Bush didn't do much homework to prepare for his news conference on Iraq last week. He spent a few minutes with advisers, who tried to predict the questions that reporters might ask (and got most of them right), but he didn't feel a need to rehearse. Aides saw this as a sign of Bush's expertise. "You have a guy who lives this issue [of Iraq]," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told U.S. News. "He really thinks about it every day."

That's the kind of confidence that delights the president's allies and unsettles his critics. And it will be on full display this week as Bush makes his final push before the midterm elections. White House advisers say Bush recognizes that it is sagging public support for the Iraq war, more than anything else, that is jeopardizing the Republican majorities in the House and Senate. Most Americans now oppose Bush's policy in Iraq, and 6 in 10 don't think the war was worth fighting in the first place. The latest USA Today/Gallup Poll found that 55 percent think the situation in Iraq is "out of control," and 58 percent say "neither side" is winning.

Rhetorical offensive. To lift his party's candidates, Bush will continue to make his familiar arguments that Iraq is a "central front" in the war on terrorism and, in a series of rallies, attack Democrats for criticizing his policies without offering a clear alternative short of pulling out. The closing theme of Bush's final week on the campaign trail, as described by his advisers: If the Democrats have a better idea, let's hear it. Bush will argue that the situation in Iraq is not nearly as bad as the news media are reporting. And Bush, along with military leaders in Iraq, will point to specific cases of success and courage shown by U.S. soldiers and marines to encourage voters to take heart.

In sum, Bush is gambling that voters will trust him one more time to do the right thing as commander in chief, as they did in 2002 and 2004. At his news conference last week, he admitted to being dissatisfied with how the Iraq venture is going. But he was much less clear about what he will do to make improvements and how much pressure he will exert on the Iraqi government to make reforms.

So far, the changes have been cosmetic. After Democrats began using Bush's catchphrase "stay the course" to portray the president as blindly wedded to a failed policy, White House strategists abandoned the slogan. Snow claimed that Bush hadn't used it much anyway (hardly accurate, since he had used the words on about 30 occasions, according to one TV network's research). This prompted considerable confusion about whether Bush was somehow trying to change the U.S. mission of building a stable, democratic, self-sustaining government in Iraq. But by week's end, the president said he wasn't altering his objective at all, and even Snow was spinning a different tune. "If you mean by 'stay the course,' be steadfast in your mission," Snow told U.S. News, "yeah, we'll stay the course." Added the press secretary: "It is not possible to do rapid, sudden shifting in a time of war. There will be no wrenching change."

The Disappeared (TIME)

It can happen in seconds.

Waddah al-Anbari's ordeal began on an afternoon in Baghdad early this year while he was out buying a new cell phone. The neighborhood seemed safe; Waddah didn't bother to lock his car door. He was about to cross a narrow alley when a car screeched up, blocking his way. Two men got out, thrust AK-47s into his ribs and pushed him into the floor behind the front seat. Climbing in the backseat, the men pinned him down with their feet and beat him in the torso with the butts of their guns. When he tried to speak, he got a sharp jab in the ribs. His captors emptied his pockets and took his cheap wristwatch and his belt and shoes. As the car sped away, one man put a hood over Waddah's head and, using a plastic tie, bound his wrists behind his back. All that happened in a few moments, and Waddah says he could only think, "This is a mistake--they think I'm somebody else." But it wasn't a mistake. He was being kidnapped.

As if the atrocities committed by terrorists and sectarian death squads in Iraq weren't bad enough, kidnapping has become one of the country's most common forms of crime since the fall of Saddam Hussein. U.S. officials say that up to 40 people are kidnapped every day, a phenomenon highlighted last week when a U.S. soldier in Baghdad went missing, an apparent abduction victim. With ransoms ranging from a few thousand dollars to more than a million and with the police often unwilling or unable to even register such cases, officials say kidnapping has become an increasingly lucrative business. It helps the kidnappers that their criminal activity is often confused with the routine hostage taking by both sides in the Shi'ite-Sunni civil war. "Kidnapping for ransom is an industry," says Dan O'Shea, former coordinator of the U.S. embassy's Hostage Working Group. "It is governed by the profit motive, not religion or race or politics."

Waddah's story provides a rare insight into the inner workings of a kidnapping ring. He spoke with TIME on the condition that his identity be concealed; we have used a pseudonym and changed other details that might give him away. He refused to be photographed for this story for fear of being recognized. One of his concerns is that being known as somebody who was ransomed once might mark him as a target for other kidnappers. O'Shea and another U.S. official who works with Iraqi authorities on kidnapping-related issues say many details of Waddah's account are consistent with what they have gleaned from their investigations.

The story Waddah tells is a window into the worst nightmare of many Iraqis, who in the absence of law and order must live with the fear that they could be taken and held captive at any time or in any place. Waddah's grin reveals two missing front teeth, the result of severe beating with the butt of an AK-47, and his face is drawn and gaunt from long captivity. If his physique--once strong and upright, now stooped and limp--recovers from the ordeal, Waddah's psyche will carry some scars forever: the terror of imprisonment, the dread of not knowing whether he would live another day, the degradation of torture and the mortification of having to grovel and plead for his life. "For five weeks, I was less than a human being," he says. "Nobody should have to go through that." The disturbing truth, however, is that many of his countrymen do.

A trained motor mechanic with calloused hands and a penchant for automotive analogies, Waddah can be forgiven for thinking that trouble has been following him around for more than three years. In the spring of 2003, when it became clear that the U.S.-led coalition would invade Iraq, he and his family--his mother Haseeba, three brothers, their wives and six children--sold his late father's house near Basra and moved to his mother's ancestral home in a quiet, dusty town west of Baghdad: Fallujah. "We were sure that there would be no fighting there. The Americans would not attack it, and the Iraqi army would not bother to defend it," he recalls, "because there's nothing important in Fallujah. It was like an old car that nobody wanted." As Sunni Muslims, the family thought they would fit right into the Sunni-majority town.

But a year later, with Fallujah turning into a stronghold of the insurgency and gun battles breaking out on their street almost every day, the family moved again--this time to Ramadi, the capital of the restive Anbar province. Ramadi soon went the way of Fallujah, its streets controlled by jihadist gangs fighting pitched battles with U.S. Marines. One day an extremist cleric visited Waddah's home and urged the four brothers to join the holy war against the Americans. When the brothers refused, the cleric threatened to let loose his fighters on the family. The only way out was to move again.

Last February the family relocated to Baghdad, moving into an unoccupied house owned by a cousin in one of the city's most upscale neighborhoods. A week after they had moved, Waddah's brothers gave him $200 to buy a cell phone and some phone cards. The family had never owned a cell phone, and he was excited about buying one. Waddah got into his cousin's brand-new midnight blue Chevrolet Lumina. It was a short drive to the neighborhood's main drag, and he parked in front of a large cell-phone store. When he couldn't find a phone to his liking, he decided to try another store just across an alley. That's when he was grabbed.

It's unclear why the kidnappers targeted Waddah. The U.S. official familiar with kidnapping gangs in Iraq speculates that the arrival of a new family in a wealthy neighborhood may have alerted local criminals. "Typically the kidnappers would do some homework, tracking the movements of the family, deciding on whom to grab and when," he says. Waddah believes it was an opportunity snatch: the kidnappers happened to be cruising the street and, when they saw him get out of a brand-new car, assumed he was rich. Later, during interrogations by his captors, the Chevrolet Lumina would come up again and again. "Whenever I said my family were too poor to pay ransom, they would hit me and say, 'Don't lie to us. We know what kind of car you drive.'"

Hooded and lying on the floor of the car, Waddah had no idea where he was being taken. He thinks his captors drove for at least an hour before stopping. He was yanked out of the car and, still hooded and bound, taken into a house and dumped on the floor. He could dimly hear a conversation in another room but could not hear what was being said. After a few minutes, he was pulled up and practically dragged outside. This time he was pushed into what he thinks was the back of a van, which smelled of engine oil and urine. The second drive was shorter than the first, no more than 30 minutes. Again he was pulled out and taken into a house. The wait was longer--perhaps two hours--before he was dumped back into the van for another half-hour drive.

Why all the stops? The U.S. official says the first switch was probably a handoff to a second group, which would hold him and claim the ransom. "It's not unusual for more than one group to be involved," says the official. "As in any organized business, there's specialization. Some gangs do the snatching and then pass on their captive, for a fee, to another gang." The money changing hands at this stage may be no more than a few hundred dollars; the muffled conversation Waddah heard at the first house may have been a quick round of bargaining.

At the third house, Waddah was taken indoors, then down a flight of stairs and through a doorway and pushed roughly to the floor. He felt several kicks to his chest and thighs, followed by rapid- fire questions: What was his name? Where did he live? Where did he work? What was his family's phone number? "They said, 'The sooner you give us a phone number to call, the sooner we contact your family, negotiate a ransom and let you go,'" Waddah says. A common persuasion technique employed by kidnappers is to call the family of the victim and let them hear him screaming during torture. That usually gets the family's attention and makes them more likely to pay a ransom quickly. It upset the captors' plans, says the U.S. official, that Waddah's family didn't own a phone. "Kidnappers tend to be simpleminded people," the official says. "They have a fixed plan, and when something unexpected happens, they don't know how to deal with it."

Waddah's interrogation lasted hours, with long breaks during which his captors would leave the room. There were at least two of them at all times, but Waddah remembers several different voices. Toward the end of the interrogation, his hood was taken off, and he was able to see his captors for the first time. They were two bearded men, one of them armed. When he saw they were not masked, Waddah's heart sank. "If they were willing to show me their faces, it meant that they weren't afraid I would identify them. In other words, they meant to kill me eventually."

The interrogators ordered him to strip to his underpants and gave him a brown dishdasha, the traditional Arabic robe, which he wore for the rest of his captivity. He was then taken down two more flights of stairs to a basement holding area that was partitioned with plywood into many small cells--at least 10, possibly more. His home for the next five weeks would be a dirty cell, 5 ft. by 4 ft., with a rough concrete floor. The plywood walls were unpainted and still bore the manufacturer's stamp in a foreign script he speculates was Korean. The walls didn't go all the way up to the ceiling, and that allowed for some air circulation. He was given a large, smelly quilt that had to serve as a mattress as well as protection from the cold. From time to time, he heard other captives being taken out of their cells and up the stairs to the interrogation room. They remained there for hours, and Waddah heard screaming and sobbing. A few times, he heard the sound of gunfire--single shots, followed by silence.

His turn in the interrogation room came every other day. The questions never varied. "They kept coming back to the phone number--why I didn't have any," he says. "They just wouldn't believe me." Every session would end with threats of more beatings and torture. He was told of other captives who had died grisly deaths and was shown stains on the floor where they had bled. The strong smell of chemicals began to make sense. They had been used to cover up the smell of vomit and dried blood. But, says the U.S. official, the threat of death was probably no more than just that. "They were already invested in this guy, having paid the people who snatched him," he says. "They would not kill him if there was even a remote chance of making some money off of him."

The captives were fed twice a day: chopped raw vegetables like tomatoes, cucumbers and onions, wrapped in flat, unleavened bread. Sometimes, a spoonful of hummus was added to the vegetables. A 2-liter plastic jug was in his cell on the first day; when it ran out, Waddah would knock on his door and ask the guard for a refill. Once a day, the captives were taken to the toilet in groups of five. Their hands bound behind them, they would queue up at a tap just outside the toilet. One by one, the captives were untied, and they filled a red plastic bucket with water and went in. The others would wait, still fettered, while a guard armed with an old AK-47 watched them carefully.

One day, Waddah overheard the guards talking about the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, one of the holiest sites for Shi'ites. They also spoke of the wave of sectarian violence that followed, with Shi'ite mobs wreaking vengeance on Sunnis. "It sounded like Sunnis were being slaughtered in the streets of Baghdad," Waddah says. "I was worried about my family. They were new to the city and had no influential relatives who could protect them." While waiting to use the toilet over the next few days, the captives whispered rumors of how their Sunni kidnappers were taking revenge by killing some of the Shi'ite captives. Waddah says at least two captives he knew to be Shi'ite disappeared abruptly. At his next session in the interrogation room, Waddah's captors told him he was lucky that he was a Sunni. Any Shi'ite whose family was unable to pay ransom within a week was being killed, they said. To reassure them of his Sunni loyalties, Waddah claimed friendship with the fanatical cleric in Ramadi who had tried to force him and his brothers to become jihadist fighters. He also spoke disparagingly about Shi'ites. "I am not proud of what I said, but it saved me from more torture," he says. His captors seemed to take him for a kindred spirit, and the beating stopped.

While Waddah languished in captivity, his family embarked on an agonizing quest to try to find him. His mother Haseeba, 65, took charge of the situation, as befits a traditional Arab matriarch. Realizing that the search for Waddah would require manpower, she dispatched two of her sons to Fallujah and Ramadi to summon as many cousins and uncles as they could muster. Her oldest son Mohammed's job was to canvass the neighborhood to identify the "sheiks"--older men, heads of important families that had lived there a long time and could be tapped for local knowledge and advice. Their first piece of advice: Stay away from the local police. The police in the neighborhood were known to be members of the Mahdi Army, the Shi'ite militia often blamed for the kidnapping and murder of Sunnis in Baghdad. "One of the sheiks--and he was a Shi'ite--said the police may themselves have been involved in taking Waddah," Haseeba says. "And even if they weren't, they would not help a Sunni family. They would only harass us for the ransom money."

Instead Haseeba recruited a distant cousin in Fallujah who was reputed to have contacts with the Sunni insurgency. His job was to inquire whether Waddah was being held by one of them. She was horrified when the cousin asked for a fee for that service: $1,000. He explained that the money was not for him but for his contacts. "I think he put most of it into his own pocket," she says. "But at that time, I could not afford to refuse." The days of waiting turned into weeks, and still there was no ransom demand. Some in the family wondered whether Waddah has been murdered rather than kidnapped. As violence in and around Baghdad escalated, even Haseeba began to lose hope, convinced that her son had become another nameless victim of Iraq's sectarian war. Sunnis were being killed all over the city. Surely there was no hope for Waddah.

Many kidnapping victims are held captive in remote farmhouses in the countryside. But after a few days in the basement prison, Waddah came to believe he was in an urban environment. Although there were no windows, he could hear city traffic and, when the power went out, the sound of several generators starting up. The bread served was often warm and fresh, indicating there was a baker nearby. If his captors had neighbors, they were probably complicit in the kidnappings; they obviously didn't report the sound of gunshots within the house to the police. During one interrogation, Waddah was told not to contemplate an escape. "They said, 'Even if you manage to get out of the house, the people in the street will bring you back to us,'" he recalls.

Waddah soon found himself the longest-held captive in the basement, and the guards grew friendly. They helped him get a sense of the scale of the kidnapping operation. By his reckoning, at least 30 captives passed through the cells during his five-week stay. The guards hinted that at least two captives had been government employees. Instead of being ransomed, they were sold to a jihadist group. And the jihadis took a cut from the ransom collections in exchange for protection. The U.S. official says that is common practice among kidnappers: "We know that the kidnapping industry helps finance the terrorists."

Waddah also learned a little bit about the "emir," or leader of the criminal gang. The guards described him as a bold and brazen criminal who masterminded the kidnapping of many high-value targets: rich businessmen, government officials, even a tribal sheik. The gang leader had been a senior official in Saddam's dreaded intelligence service, the Mukhabarat. The emir was also an expert in torture, able to extract information from the most stubborn captives. But he rarely took part in the interrogations anymore; in fact, he only occasionally visited the house. While he concentrated on other, unspecified business interests, the kidnapping organization was run day to day by his trusted lieutenants, a pair of brothers from his tribe.

In Waddah's fourth week of captivity, one of the interrogators went down to his cell to inform him they had made some progress in contacting his family. Waddah had given them names of family members in Fallujah and Ramadi, along with directions to their homes. One of the addresses in Ramadi had checked out, and the person who lived there--an old friend who Waddah believed had been a fighter in an insurgent group--had agreed to find a phone number for his family. The interrogator said "our people in Baghdad" were also looking for Waddah's home. A few days later, the kidnappers said they had made contact with Waddah's family. But Haseeba and her other sons, believing him to be dead, had already held a wake for him. Now they refused to believe that he was alive, rejecting the kidnappers' ransom demand as either a terrible prank or an opportunist's attempt to capitalize on their loss. "They are not going to pay," the interrogator told Waddah. "We're not sure what to do with you." Later that day, Waddah was taken to the interrogation room--his first visit in nearly a week. He was hooded again because, the guards told him, the emir was going to be present and they didn't want Waddah to see him.

There was very little beating, and the emir barely even spoke with him, but Waddah says it was the scariest episode of his captivity. As he sat on the floor, the emir and two assistants had a discussion about how to convince his family that he was still alive. One of them suggested that, as proof of life, they cut off a body part and send it to the family. There was a long debate about which part to cut: a finger, an ear, his nose or his penis. Finally, during a lull in the discussion, Waddah pointed out that his family members were unlikely to recognize any of his body parts. "They will just think you're sending them some dead guy's finger to scare them," he said. To his relief, the kidnappers saw the sense in this. The emir decided to wait until the man in Fallujah came up with the phone number.

A week later he was taken up to the interrogation room for what would be his last visit. There was still no phone number, so the interrogators said they would videotape Waddah and send the tape to his family. His hood was removed, and he was ordered to sit still and say nothing--to simply look at the camera. Expecting to be beaten, he was surprised that the filming ended in a few minutes and that nobody laid a hand on him. "They said, 'This is your last hope. If this doesn't convince your family, there is nothing else we can do,'" he says.

Within days, a package was tossed into the front yard of his family's home in Baghdad. It was the videotape: grainy images of a silent Waddah, staring at the camera, followed by a short speech by a masked man asking for $100,000. Haseeba was overjoyed. The ransom demand was obviously far beyond the family's means. But while they waited for the kidnappers to make contact to negotiate the sum, Haseeba began to collect the money. Once again, the family went to the cousins and uncles in Fallujah and Ramadi, this time to ask for money. Again they dug into their savings, collectively raising $25,000. Haseeba and her daughters-in-law sold all their jewelry, and Mohammed flogged a pair of old British-made hunting rifles he had inherited from his father. With the permission of the cousin who owned it, they even sold the midnight blue Chevrolet Lumina for a knocked-down price. Even so, they were able to get the collection up to only $40,000.

The next time they heard from the kidnappers, it was on Mohammed's cell phone--the contact in Fallujah had finally delivered the number. Haseeba took the call, beseeching the kidnappers to lower their price. "I said, 'I am like your mother. Have pity on me,'" she says. The caller asked to speak with Mohammed and told him, "We don't like to negotiate with old women. Don't let your mother answer the phone again." But Haseeba's pleas had worked. The next morning the kidnappers called again to say the family should have the $40,000 ready for collection. That evening a white Toyota Camry stopped at the family's front gate, and an old man entered, introducing himself as a tribal sheik from Anbar province. He said he had been asked to collect some money, adding, "I don't know what it is for, and I don't want you to tell me."

Waddah was still weak from a fever and barely able to stand when a guard relayed the good news: he was going home. He was hooded, bundled into the trunk of a car and driven around for an hour. This time there were no stops and no changing of vehicles. The hood was removed, the plastic bounds cut. "This is it," said one of the men, thrusting something into the breast pocket of his dishdasha and pulling him out of the trunk. "Thank God for your freedom." The car sped away before Waddah could get to his feet. He found himself just outside a well-known mosque, with 5,000 Iraqi dinars ($3.30) in his pocket. He was able to get a lift home from a passing commuter. The long ordeal was over. He was free.

With liberation come new uncertainties. In recent months Waddah and his brothers have struggled to find work in Baghdad and have returned to jihadi-infested Ramadi. But Waddah says his kidnapping has made him stronger and less fearful. Like so many other Iraqis, the family members cope with the violence surrounding them by clinging to one another. When Haseeba heard the car stop at the gate on the fateful day, she says her instinct told her it had to be Waddah. "A mother knows," she says. "So I told Mohammed: Go to the door--your brother has come home." Then Waddah walked in, and mother and son grabbed each other in a tight embrace that neither wanted to end. After several minutes, Haseeba's other sons asked her to let Waddah go so that they too could embrace him. "Never," she said. "I will never let him go."

A Centurion's E-mails (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Christian Caryl

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

Robert Secher had a passion for history. Until his death in Iraq on Oct. 8, the 33-year-old Marine could recount all the major battles of the Civil War. He studied the Holocaust, in which members of his father's family lost their lives. In recent e-mails home, he said he was reading about Vietnam and the Mexican civil war. But his favorite books were on ancient Rome: he was captivated by the centurions, who commanded from the front and led by example. "He talked about being a soldier since he was 6 years old," his mother, Elke Morris, told NEWSWEEK last week. "He wanted to be tested in battle." Secher signed up for the Marines when he was 17. He served on the Afghan border after the attacks of September 11 and later pressed for a transfer to the front lines in Iraq. He ended up in the insurgents' largest stronghold, Anbar province.

His job there was one of the toughest in Iraq: making raw Iraqi recruits ready and able to take over the fight against the militants. Secher found the task exasperating and often discouraging; in e-mails and letters home, he expressed doubt that the Iraqi military would ever be ready for a handover, and criticized the way the Bush administration had directed the war. "Without the U.S., this army will fail and get eaten alive by the insurgents," he told his father in an e-mail this past April. Chatting with a friend during a brief leave five months later, he spoke of suspicions that some of his trainees were loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr and would have no compunction about betraying their American instructors if the radical Shiite cleric told them to.

At other times Captain Secher's messages expressed fondness for his Iraqi trainees and respect for their courage. He was no pacifist. His parents describe him as an unswerving Republican, and his own dispatches consistently defend the invasion of Iraq even as he anguishes over its dwindling prospects of success. "Don't mistake us for Cindy Sheehan," Pierre Secher told NEWSWEEK at his Memphis home (a reference to the California woman who became an iconic opponent of the war after her son's death in Iraq). "To me, pacifism could have led to Hitler's victory. We might have all been speaking German and Japanese right now." But as President George W. Bush speaks positively of setting benchmarks for Iraqi troops to "stand up" and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld declares that their training is going well, Captain Secher's messages from the front give a more complicated picture. His e-mails have been edited for space, and some typos have been fixed for clarity, but the words and feelings are entirely his own.

Subject: Hello

First of all, make sure you save (print and save) all the emails I send you [...] I am going to keep extensive journal notes on this deployment so I can write TWO books, one when I get back and of course the one I am working on now—Every email you save can help me [...]

Our team is made up of Marines from a variety of occupational specialties: supply, logistics, infantry, intelligence, communications, artillery (me and a sergeant), and of course we have a Navy corpsman (our medic). We will be located at an Iraqi base, living, eating [...]and fighting with the Iraqis. They are apparently the 1st Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 7th Iraqi Division or 11217 Iraqis. We'll be in Hit along the Euphrates River in the Al Anbar province and part of the Sunni Triangle [...]

As you know, when Roman centurions inspected their men during morning formations, the soldier would smack his fist on his breast plate above his heart and say "Integritas," which is of course "material wholeness," referring to the soldier's upkeep of his armor and demonstrating his dedication to combat readiness. You can rest assured that my mind and my gear will always be focused and ready.

Integritas, Robert

Secher's 12-month Iraq tour officially began on his arrival in Kuwait on Jan. 24. On Feb. 18, he wrote to a good friend, Peter, in New York, from the Anbar province town of Hit, where his team was sharing a camp with some 500 Iraqi soldiers.

Peter,

I got your care package today and am humbled and extremely appreciative for it! Everything in there is exactly the type of stuff that is useful and needed! The integritas patches are awesome. I'm going to sew one on my Kevlar and one on my flak.

Our camp is about 1 km from the Euphrates, with palm groves to our east and the desert to our west. Hit is a lawless town with most of the fight in the north (the insurgents control/influence the southern part). [...] Camp Hit is a series of wooden huts surrounded by [earth-filled barricades] and a berm perimeter with triple strand concertina [wire]. [...]

My first impression of the Iraqis is that I really like them. They are warm and hospitable and the friendliest people I've met. I also feel very sorry for them. Their lives are out of their hands and they have known nothing but dictators (Saddam) and occupiers (us) for years. As we convoyed at high speeds thru the town (speed is the best defense against IEDs) you could clearly see the look on the eyes of the people: sick and tired. First a generation of Saddam, now insurgents and occupiers. Everyone makes promises and no one keeps them. [...]

I hope all is well. It is cold over here. It must be freezing in New York. Take care and I'll talk to you soon.

Your friend, Robert

On the morning of March 3, Secher and his men were driving into town when they spotted an improvised explosive device disguised as roadside litter. They blocked off the area and called in an explosives team. In an e-mail to his family, he told what happened next:

With absolutely no warning (and less than 10 minutes after we got there) the IED blew up. In one split second I saw the huge black smoke then the noise, everybody outside the vehicles dropped to the ground [...] About that time we started taking fire to the rear of the convoy. The Iraqis identified where it was coming from and immediately returned fire, but by the time they successfully translated where the fire was from it had stopped [...]

Anytime an American fires a weapon there has to be an investigation into why there was an escalation of force. That wouldn't have stopped us from firing, but it prevents us from just firing indiscriminately. We have to have positively identified targets. That is why I am now a big fan of having the Iraqis with us. They can fire at whatever the hell they want, we call it the "Iraqi Death Blossom." These guys receive one shot and the whole unit fires at everything in sight until the attached American unit gets them to control their fire. That's fine with me.

His mood had dimmed when he wrote again to his friend Peter on April 23:

Whatever "good" is happening in Iraq, isn't happening here. The bright side is there is no sectarian violence here like in Baghdad. In other words the insurgents around town don't target civilians. And there are even established warning signals so civilians know not to be around.

My 3 month informed opinion (based entirely on what I see in the Hit region) is that this war is futile. Even the Iraqi soldiers tell us that when America leaves, they'll quit. They trust us because they know Americans can take care of them, but they don't trust their government, or the Ministry of Defense, and they especially don't trust their officers [...] Funny, I feel the same way sometimes.

Anyway, the weather here is getting hotter, it's windy all the time, the flies are terrible.

Secher reacted angrily to accounts of the killings at Haditha and Hamdania. On June 22 he wrote to his father:

Of course you've heard about two different sets of Marines being charged with murder. [...]

I feel bad for those guys. Bush should be ashamed of the predicament that this nation has been put in. And anyone who calls those young Marines killers should think twice. War puts perfectly ordinary young men in situations that can't be judged by laws. They are the situations of survival. The dirty little secrets of war, no one would want to know the horrible things that the "greatest generation" did to German and Japanese soldiers and civilians. [...] If you really want to win a war you have to be brutal. You have to be Sherman and raze Georgia as you march to the sea.

Later that day, Secher had cooled off:

Hi Dad,

After reading my last email I don't want you to think that I condone the actions of the Marines, and if in fact they are guilty they should be held responsible and punished. My point is that this is the reality of what war is. This is what war does to normal young men. This is the whole tragedy of war. People are so quick to only criticize the Marines and to demonize these young men. I pity them. Their lives are ruined, ruined by their actions which are judged by men who have never been in those situations.

As the summer wore on, his frustration deepened. On July 23 he wrote to friends:

Hello everyone,

Tomorrow will be our 6 month mark, and then only 6 more months to go! Everything is fine and works in cycles. Some weeks see more activity than others based on the insurgents' cycles of regrouping and refitting [...]

The biggest lesson I have learned over 6 months here is that the Iraqi culture is incapable of maintaining a western style military. The Arabic-style military [...] is distasteful to western soldiers: officers who hit their men; officers and senior enlisted men who regularly steal from their men; using leadership to openly grant yourself more food and 'standard of living' items while your men go without [...]

Many of our [Iraqi] soldiers went AWOL; new food supplies came in yesterday from Ramadi but were grossly insufficient; new soldiers arrived but their initial military training is substandard and you can tell they are really just here for a paycheck [...]

So that's about it. Hope all is well. The weather here has cooled down. It's only 110 this morning. Take care and talk to you all later.

Robert

Still, new Iraqi officers had arrived, and Secher cheered up after seeing them in action. He wrote to his father on July 25:

In defense of the Iraqis, this new battalion commander and executive officer we have are starting out on the right foot. So far so good, see, there may just be some professionals in the IA [Iraqi Army]. Today an Iraqi soldier stole jewelry from a woman at a vehicle checkpoint. When it was discovered, the Iraqi was identified and the XO had an investigation done immediately, and the same day we transported the soldier to the jail on Camp Hit (where he is right now) and we'll take him to Al Asad in a week to be fired.

This is such a long process. Maybe 20 years from now I'll look back with pride that I helped make a difference in Iraq, but right now I'm just not into it. I just want to come home alive. [...] The war in Iraq itself, yeah, it was the right thing to do, but the way it was carried out, man, Bush, Rumsfeld, and Cheney have nothing to be proud of.

But I'm still glad to be here. At least I can say I was here, and 20 years from now that will be all that matters. I did my part (though my attitude was less than desirable). [...]

Tomorrow will be my 100th convoy and I'll get to command it again, which I enjoy. If there is one thing war has taught me, [it's] how much time we spend in life worrying about stupid s--t. I hope I don't forget that.

Love, Robert

As summer ended, Secher was leading Iraqi soldiers on house-to-house searches for insurgents. He described the process in a Sept. 30 e-mail to his father.

We went out with the IA to do cordon-and-searches, where we cordon off a city block [and] then go in small groups from house to house, initially knocking, but we had to kick in a few doors and gates. I had to shoot the lock off of one house. [...] The Iraqis I was with did a really good job. I had Mathan [an IA member] and our interpreter Joe, who are both good soldiers. We did the searches at night between 2300 and 0500, so it was a rude awakening. It caused some people to freak out, some were more calm, no one threatened us. We did take some sniper fire, but nothing sustained. I was surprised at how beautiful some Iraqi houses were on the inside. Not at all what I was expecting. [...]

The whole thing felt kind of weird. Especially when you have kick in a gate, go charging in, weapon on fire, finger on the trigger, charge to the front door start banging on it, and then some old man comes to the door [...] That was about the least enjoyable thing I have done here. As an American it really feels odd to enter peoples homes and question them, and with the authority that if they don't want to cooperate, I can detain them. This is what martial law would be like.

Dad,

How are you? I will be down in the city [...] operating out of firm base 1 until probably Nov 1 so I won't have access to email very often. I should make it back up to camp every few days to shower and do laundry, and I'll check my emails then. The clearing operations are continuing throughout the town. It'll be sleep all day and go on operations each night (searches and raids). A lot more interesting than being on the camp. Give my love to [stepmother] Lucy, I'll talk to you all soon.

Togetherness In Baghdad (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, October 29, 2006

Many months ago it became obvious to all but the most ideologically blinkered that America is losing the war launched to deal with a chimeric problem (an arsenal of WMD) and to achieve a delusory goal (a democracy that would inspire emulation, transforming the region). Last week the president retired his mantra "stay the course" because it does not do justice to the nimbleness and subtlety of U.S. tactics for winning the war.

A surreal and ultimately disgusting facet of the Iraq fiasco is the lag between when a fact becomes obvious and when the fiasco's architects acknowledge that fact. Iraq's civil war has been raging for more than a year; so has the Washington debate about whether it is what it is.

In a recent interview with Vice President Cheney, Time magazine asked, "If you had to take back any one thing you'd said about Iraq, what would it be?" Selecting from what one hopes is a very long list, Cheney replied: "I thought that the elections that we went through in '05 would have had a bigger impact on the level of violence than they have ... I thought we were over the hump in terms of violence. I think that was premature."

He thinks so? Clearly, and weirdly, he implies that the elections had some positive impact on the level of violence. Worse, in the full transcript of the interview posted online he said the big impact he expected from the elections "hasn't happened yet." "Yet"? Doggedness can be admirable, but this is clinical.

Anyway, what Cheney actually said 17 months ago was that the insurgency was in its "last throes." That was much stronger than saying we were "over the hump" regarding violence. Beware of people who misquote themselves while purporting to display candor.

The latest plan to pacify Baghdad—announced in June, declared a failure in October—was called Operation Together Forward. But U.S.-Iraqi togetherness is a sometime thing. Last April, The Washington Post's Jonathan Finer reported from Hawijah, Iraq, on a joint patrol to search for roadside bombs. The Iraqis refused to ride in armored U.S. Humvees, preferring pickup trucks because a cleric told them that anyone killed in an "occupier vehicle" would not go to heaven. Eventually, after threatening them with jail, U.S. Army Lt. Aaron Tapalman browbeat them into Humvees:

"About an hour later, the patrol came across a white bag on the roadside that Tapalman suspected might contain a bomb. When he asked some Iraqi soldiers to move it off the road, their commander balked, saying it wasn't his job. 'It is your job to protect the people,' Tapalman said, increasingly exasperated. 'I can go and move it myself, and you know what? I will, but don't you think your people should see you doing that kind of stuff? Someday we're not going to be here anymore.' The Iraqi soldier declined again, apologetically, and drove away."

A mordant joke told during the Cold War concerned asking an Italian, a Frenchman, an Englishman and a Russian to each describe his most cherished dream. The Italian said, "I want my country to produce the greatest artists." The Frenchman said, "I want my nation to produce the greatest philosophers." The Englishman said, "I want my country to produce the greatest parliamentarians." The Russian said, "I want my neighbor's cow to die."

The joke was no laughing matter because it turned on this truth: A history of brutalizing tyranny had stunted the Russians' aptitude for collective aspirations. Which brings us back to Iraq, which Patrick J. McDonnell of the Los Angeles Times covered for two years following the 2003 invasion. He recently returned. His Oct. 23 report ("Into the Abyss of Baghdad") begins:

"I keep seeing his face. He appears to be in his mid-20s, bespectacled, slightly bearded, and somehow his smile conveys a sense of prosperity to come. Perhaps he is set to marry, or enroll in graduate school, or launch a business—all these flights of ambition seem possible. In the next few images he is encased in plastic: His face is frozen in a ghoulish grimace. Blackened lesions blemish his neck. 'Drill holes,' says Col. Khaled Rasheed, an Iraqi commander who is showing me the set of photographs."

Electric drills are the death squads' preferred instruments of torture. McDonnell:

"One evening I accompanied a three-Humvee convoy of MPs through largely Shiite east Baghdad ... The objective that evening was to patrol with Iraqi police, but the Iraqi lawmen are hesitant to be seen with Americans, whom they regard as IED [improvised explosive device] magnets. The joint patrol never worked out ... The next night, an armor-piercing bomb hit the same squad, Gator 1-2. A sergeant with whom I had ridden the previous evening lost a leg; the gunner and driver suffered severe shrapnel wounds."

For what?

Bomb In Sadr City Slum Kills 31 People (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A bomb targeting poor Iraqi Shiites lining up for day jobs in Baghdad's Sadr City slum killed at least 31 people Monday and wounded more than 50 others, police said.

The bomb tore through a collection of food stalls and kiosks at about 6:15 a.m., cutting down men who gather there daily hoping to be hired as laborers. Police Maj. Hashim al-Yasiri put the casualty figure at 31 killed and 51 injured.

There were conflicting reports as to whether the blast was caused by a suicide bomber or a device concealed amid debris by the roadside. The overwhelmingly Shiite area is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia blamed for much of the sectarian violence rocking the city.

Sadr City, a sprawling neighborhood of 2.5 million people, has been the scene of repeated bomb attacks by suspected al-Qaida fighters seeking to incite Shiite revenge attacks and drag the country into full-blown civil war.

The U.S. and Iraqi military have kept a tight cordon around Sadr City since a raid there last week in search of an alleged Shiite death squad leader, who was not found.

The last major bombing in Sadr City occurred on Sept. 23, when a bomb hidden in a barrel blew up a kerosene tanker and killed at least 35 people as scores waited to buy fuel.

The area was more crowded than usual because families were stocking up on fuel in advance of the holy month of Ramadan.

23 Policemen Shot To Death In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 30, 2006

Suspected Sunni Arab gunmen killed 23 policemen Sunday, including 17 in one attack in the predominantly Shiite southern city of Basra, signaling the possible start of an intensified insurgent campaign against Iraq's predominantly Shiite Muslim security forces.

Political tension deepened in Baghdad when Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, the country's highest-ranking Sunni politician, threatened to resign if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki did not act quickly to eradicate two feared Shiite militias.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, depends heavily on the backing of the two Shiite political parties that run the militias and has resisted American pressure to eradicate the private armies — the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and the Badr Brigade, the military wing of Iraq's biggest Shiite political bloc, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Shiite gunmen, especially those of the Mahdi Army, are deeply involved in the sectarian killings that have brutalized Baghdad and central Iraq for months.

Police have been targeted throughout the insurgency in an effort to destabilize the U.S.-supported government, but the number of attacks Sunday was a sharp step-up in attacks aimed at security services.

The surge in violence also comes amid U.S. efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into a reconciliation process and a public squabble with al-Maliki over a timeline for crushing the Shiite militias and moving forward with measures to soothe the disaffected Sunni minority.

Thirty-three people in all were slain across Iraq on Sunday in a second day of rising violence that ended a five-day lull in attacks after the end Muslims' holy month of Ramadan.

Officials also found 24 bodies, some of them decapitated, the latest victims of sectarian reprisal killings that have soared since Sunni bombers destroyed a Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of the capital, Feb. 22.

Until that attack, the Sunni Arab insurgency was responsible for nearly all the violence in Iraq, both in attacks on American troops and the use of huge bombs aimed at Shiite civilians.

Since Shiite militias and roaming death squads joined the fight, thousands of Iraqis have been tortured and killed on both sides of the sectarian divide, taking Baghdad and other mixed Shiite-Sunni regions in the center of the country to the brink of civil war.

In the southern city of Basra on Sunday, gunmen dragged 15 policemen and two translators — instructors at the police academy — off a bus at the edge of town. Their bodies were found dumped throughout the city beginning about four hours later.

Fourteen of the victims were Shiite, three were Sunni. Shiites are about 80 percent of the population in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city.

Police officers also were shot down in Baghdad and in Baqouba, a city 35 miles northeast of the capital.

Anger over the destabilizing violence brought a political tremor when the top aide to al-Hashemi, the vice president, said his boss has threatened to resign unless the government quells the Shiite militias.

"Yes, the vice president is threatening to quit. Our position dictates that we send a message to the government. We cannot live with this situation indefinitely," said Mohammed Shaker.

Losing al-Hashemi, the country's top-ranked Sunni politician, would be a blow for the already shaky al-Maliki government.

The prime minister apparently was seeking to shore up support among his Shiite base by issuing a series of angry statements last week denouncing U.S. plans for a timeline to measure progress as an infringement of Iraqi sovereignty.

The eruption led to a hastily arranged video conversation between al-Maliki and President Bush on Saturday. Afterward, a top al-Maliki aide said the Iraqi leader was using American voter dissatisfaction with the war as a lever to strengthen his position with the United States.

The public spat arose after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad outlined adjustments in U.S. policy that called for al-Maliki to set timelines for progress on a series of tasks, including disbanding militias.

In an interview with CNN on Sunday, Khalilzad said the squabble was a misunderstanding.

"That was a problem in how what I said was interpreted or translated to him and how it was played by some of the media here. What he understood as it was explained to him was that I had determined what issues and by when the Iraqis had to decide," the ambassador said.

Iraqi court officials, meanwhile, said a verdict in Saddam Hussein's first trial would definitely be handed down as scheduled on Nov. 5, two days before the American elections.

Asked by CNN to address speculation that the timing of the verdict was motivated to affect voting, Khalilzad denied the Bush administration had anything to do with the trial court's operations or its verdict.

"Well, that decision was made by the Iraqi judges. The United States had nothing to do with the selection of the date," he said. "And we don't know whether the judges have come to a judgment or not."

If convicted, Saddam faces death by hanging in the case tied to the killing of 148 Shiite villagers in Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt against him. A guilty verdict would set off an automatic appeal to a higher court.

The ousted leader's lawyer warned that violence would spread in Iraq and could wreak havoc throughout the Middle East if Saddam is sentenced to hang.

Khalil al-Dulaimi also said he would attend Saddam's resumed trial Monday on separate charges of genocide against Kurds, breaking a monthlong boycott of the trial.

The lawyer told The Associated Press in Jordan that he warned of a civil war in a recent letter to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0087731

"I warned him against the death penalty and against any other decision that would inflame a civil war in Iraq and send fire throughout the region," al-Dulaimi said.

Gunmen Kill 19 Iraqis From Cop Academy (WT)

By Ammar Karim

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Gunmen killed 17 Iraqi police instructors and two translators as they traveled home from work at a British-run training school near the southern Iraqi city of Basra yesterday, a senior Iraqi officer said.

The brutal killings came as U.S. troops fought off an insurgent ambush in northern Iraq, killing 17 rebels. Six more policemen were reported slain elsewhere in Iraq. A bodyguard to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was wounded in an attack on a convoy, but Mr. al-Maliki was not present.

"There were 17 officers and two translators on their way back home after they finished work when gunmen stopped them in an area called al-Kibla," said the Iraqi officer, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified.

"They work as instructors at the police academy in Shuaiba. They were killed and their bodies were taken back to Shuaiba and scattered around the town," he said. "The two translators work with the instructors and the British army and police."

Shuaiba is a town west of Basra that houses a large British base.

British military spokesman Maj. Charlie Burbridge confirmed that "there has been an incident in which it appears that 17 Iraqi police instructors were murdered in southern Basra this afternoon."

"We are poised to support with whatever the [Iraqi Police Service] requests within our capabilities. We are taking the incident extremely seriously indeed," he said.

The killings are a setback for British efforts to pacify southern Iraq, which hinges on training Iraqi security forces to enable them to take over responsibility for an area rife with illegal militia groups.

Although the area around Basra, which is largely Shi'ite, has been spared the worst of the sectarian violence that has torn apart life in central Iraq, the region is home to well-armed political, tribal and criminal factions.

The British government is under intense domestic political pressure over its strategy, with the former head of the country's armed forces yesterday branding the attempt to fight on two fronts -- in Iraq and Afghanistan -- as "cuckoo."

Britain has 7,200 troops in southern Iraq. Reports suggest their commanders would like to start pulling them out as early as February next year, although British Prime Minister Tony Blair insists they will stay "until the job is done."

Mr. al-Maliki wants the process of taking control of his own security forces to go ahead more quickly, a desire that was welcomed by the United States after a tense week of talks.

"The prime minister is anxious to have more responsibility for the security of the country. He wants to have appropriate capabilities and command and control of forces," said Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

"We welcome his desire to have ... more capable and credible forces and for him to have command and control of Iraqi forces," he said in an interview with CNN.

Meanwhile, fighting erupted near the northern town of Balad when rebels armed with assault rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades twice ambushed a U.S. convoy en route to a raid targeting "three suspected terrorists."

In the first ambush, the U.S. soldiers launched an air strike, which left four attackers dead. As they fought off the second assault with a combination of air and ground fire, they killed 13 more, the U.S. military said. No coalition forces were wounded.

Violence also continued in Baghdad. Two police officers were fatally shot in an ambush, and a popular Iraqi state television presenter was kidnapped and killed along with her driver, Anas Qassem Najm.

Nakshin Hamid, a 31-year-old Kurd, presented broadcasts destined for Iraq's Kurdish and Christian minorities on Al-Iraqiya television. She had recently moved after receiving death threats, journalists at the network said.

"She was kidnapped this morning along with her colleague, the driver, as she came in to work. Less than 30 minutes later someone called us from her mobile and said, 'We killed her,' " assistant news editor Abbas Aboud said.

The bodies of four other civilians were found nearby in the Haifa Street area.

Twofold Operation Seals Sadr City (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 29 -- American military police backed by Iraqi troops maintained their cordon of Baghdad's Sadr City on Sunday, manning barricades and checkpoints in and around the Shiite slum in an operation to find a kidnapped U.S. soldier and to capture the man considered Iraq's most notorious death squad leader.

The soldier, an Iraqi American translator whose name has not been released, has been missing for six days. He was abducted by armed men while making an unauthorized visit to see relatives in the Karrada neighborhood of central Baghdad last Monday.

U.S. forces have effectively sealed off Sadr City and its 2.5 million residents from the rest of Baghdad, and within Sadr City, they have isolated the neighborhood around the home of alleged death squad leader Abu Deraa, according to an Iraqi Interior Ministry official who would not be named because he was not authorized to release the information.

U.S. officials have refused to comment on whether they believe that Abu Deraa is holding the missing soldier, and it was unclear whether the two goals of the U.S. operation -- finding the soldier and capturing Abu Deraa -- are related.

On Sunday, U.S. troops searched every car going in and out of Sadr City. Even donkey carts were searched; an American female MP patted a donkey as Iraqi troops sorted through the junked engine parts and cardboard piled on his back.

About a mile away, 1,000 men and women gathered inside Sadr City to protest the continuing U.S. operation. A woman cloaked in black robes declared over loudspeakers booming across a square that food and medicine were running short because of the near-blockade.

Parliament members and tribal leaders took the podium to demand that the Americans go away. Men pumped their fists but heeded appeals to remain calm.

"The Americans are trying to pull the Sadr movement into war with the U.S.," one speaker in brown robes exhorted. "Do not fall for their tricks. Keep calm, keep cool."

The Iraqi Interior Ministry official and residents of Sadr City said close lieutenants of Abu Deraa's and some of his relatives were killed in U.S. raids near his house on Wednesday and Friday. They said Abu Deraa, who is feared by Sunnis across the capital for allegedly leading a gang that has kidnapped, tortured and killed thousands of Sunnis, appeared at a funeral Friday and vowed revenge against the United States and anyone in Sadr City who cooperated in the attacks. The Interior Ministry spokesman said Abu Deraa accused Moqtada al-Sadr -- an anti-U.S. Shiite cleric with many followers in Sadr City who leads the Mahdi Army militia -- of being "a coward."

The Mahdi Army, which runs Sadr City, has been accused of killing thousands of Sunni Arabs. But many security officials believe that Sadr is losing control of extremist members of his militia and that Abu Deraa might be a rogue element.

Sadr denies knowing anything about the kidnapping of the U.S. soldier, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said last week. The soldier's brother also was abducted, but he was later freed and told police that the kidnappers were from the Mahdi Army, Maliki said.

Although the Sadr movement has previously disavowed Abu Deraa, a Sadr spokesman said Sunday that Abu Deraa was a member of the militia and that he would never speak against the cleric.

"Abu Deraa is merely a slave and a simple person in the Sadr movement, and he could not utter such words, for he is one of the dear fighters of the Mahdi Army and the Sadr movement," said Mohammed al-Kaabi, who works in Sadr's office in the city of Najaf.

[Early Monday, a bomb ripped through a Sadr City market where Iraqi Shiites were lined up for day labor jobs, killing at least 31 people and wounding more than 50, the Associated Press reported, citing police officials.]

On Sunday, the U.S. military said it launched a surprise attack on insurgents who were gathering in two places to ambush coalition forces near the city of Balad, about 50 miles north of Baghdad, killing about 17 guerrillas. Local officials and residents, who put the number of dead at 11, said the group had gathered to defend the Sunni hamlet of Duluiyah, about four miles across the Tigris River from Balad, fearing that it was going to be attacked.

The two towns were the site of intense Shiite-Sunni strife earlier this month, after Sunni insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite laborers in Duluiyah. Shiite leaders in Balad responded by asking for protection from the Mahdi Army, touching off a four-day sectarian rampage that left as many as 100 people dead. Both towns have since been bracing for reprisals.

Duluiyah police Maj. Ahmed Aziz said a group of armed men had gathered late Saturday to defend the town after receiving news that commandos from Iraq's Interior Ministry -- which has been accused of harboring Shiite death squads -- were preparing an assault. He said the men were "planning to ambush the commandos if they launched such an attack," but instead were struck by three missiles fired by U.S. jets.

Ali Kareem, a 35-year-old farmer whose brother was killed in the strike, said groups were positioned around the town to repel an expected offensive by U.S. forces and Interior Ministry commandos. He said their operations were coordinated with local police.

"We told the police that we do not need you with us in this operation, and we asked them to remain at their police station to defend the city in case the Interior commandos came and wanted to take over the city," Kareem said. "So we would be the first line of defense, and the police would be the second line of defense inside the city.

"We would not let them take us as prisoners. Either they kill us or we kill them."

The U.S. military statement said coalition forces were moving "toward their objective" early Sunday when they "encountered terrorist activity on two separate occasions along their route." The statement, which did not specify the purpose of the operation, said aircraft "engaged the targets with precision fire," killing four guerrillas in the first strike and about 13 more in subsequent attacks.

Elsewhere, 17 police trainees and translators reportedly were killed when gunmen ambushed their bus near the southern city of Basra, local authorities said. Baghdad police said 25 bodies, many bearing signs of torture, were found across the capital Sunday morning. And at least 25 more people were killed in shootings, bombings and other violence in Iraq on Sunday, according to police, security officials and wire services.

Officials at state television station al-Iraqiya said that one of the station's sports broadcasters, Naqsheen Hamma Rasheed, was killed along with her driver Sunday morning while headed to work in Baghdad. She was the second sportscaster from the station to be slain in the past five months.

Falah al-Fadhly, the station's managing editor for news, said Rasheed, a Kurd, was shot about 9:30 as she was getting out of the car at the station, which is across the street from the Justice Ministry. The gunmen fled, he said.

Iraqi Family Says Missing Army Interpreter Is Son-in-Law (NYT)

By Michael Luo And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 29 — The missing American soldier who has been the subject of an intensive manhunt here in the capital since he was kidnapped by gunmen outside the heavily protected Green Zone last week was secretly married to an Iraqi woman and had been visiting her at the time of the abduction, several people who identified themselves as his in-laws said Sunday.

These people, who provided the first vivid account of the abduction, said the kidnappers were members of the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia, who dragged the soldier into a car at gunpoint. His whereabouts and condition remain unknown.

The soldier's marriage, if confirmed, would not only be highly unusual but also a violation of American military rules, and would put the mystery of the missing soldier in an entirely new light. The American military command has been circumspect in the details of the missing soldier, saying he was an Iraqi-American interpreter who had left the Green Zone without permission to visit unidentified relatives in Baghdad. Search squads have shown local residents the missing soldier's picture, but the military has not even released his name.

The new details of his family connections were disclosed as a spate of attacks reported elsewhere in Iraq left at least 33 people dead. These included an ambush on a police academy bus in southern Iraq that killed 17.

The people who said they were the missing soldier's in-laws identified him as Ahmed Qusai al-Taei, 41. They showed visitors to their Baghdad apartment an enlarged wedding photo of him and the bride, whom they identified as Israa Abdul-Satar, 26, a college student. They also showed the visitors glossy snapshots of the smiling couple in Egypt for their honeymoon. The couple had married three months ago, they said. The precise dates of the wedding and honeymoon, and whether the soldier had been on active duty at the time, were not clear.

The people also described how members of the Mahdi Army, led by a local commander known as Abu Rami, came to the wife's home in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karada last Monday, on the Muslim holiday Id al-Fitr, and took Mr. Taei.

"They were saying, 'He's an American journalist,' " said a woman who identified herself as his mother-in-law and asked that she be identified only by her nickname, Um Omar, because of fear of reprisals. "We were saying, 'No, he's an Iraqi.' "

Um Omar and the others in the home said they had not learned until after the man's kidnapping that he was an American soldier.

Military officials would not comment when asked Sunday about these new details, and it was impossible to independently corroborate the account given by the people who said they were Mr. Taei's in-laws.

The military's fraternization policies prohibit active duty personnel from marrying local civilians, said Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman. But she said privacy rules barred her from providing any details about the missing soldier.

In 2003, a pair of Florida national guardsmen married Iraqi doctors they met in Baghdad soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein's government in a joint ceremony. One of the soldiers' marriages dissolved soon afterward, but the one whose marriage lasted was confined to his base and eventually discharged from the military.

The people who said they were the missing soldier's in-laws said he and his immediate family, Sunnis from the capital's Adhamiya neighborhood, had fled to the United States before the fall of Saddam Hussein. They explained how he came to marry Ms. Abdul-Satar, also a Sunni.

Mr. Taei had friends in Karada, a mostly upscale commercial district that sits outside the Green Zone, Um Omar said. As she described it, he spotted her daughter one day as she was en route to classes at Mutsamsirya University in central Baghdad, where she is enrolled in the science college.

Through friends, he arranged to speak with her parents, Um Omar said, and after some discussion, Ms. Abdul-Satar agreed to marry Mr. Taei, whom her mother described as a "gentleman."

After the couple married, Um Omar said, Ms. Abdul-Satar moved out of her mother's cramped apartment, on the third floor of a dreary complex on a side street in Karada near the National Theater, and settled into a cousin's one-story home down the block.

Mr. Taei came to visit every few days, said a neighbor who lives across the street from the cousin's home, where the kidnapping took place.

"We thought he was a businessman," said the neighbor, who asked to be identified only by his last name, Nadhir.

Last Monday, Mr. Taei came about 4 p.m. on a motorcycle. Soon after, a car full of gunmen came and demanded that Mr. Taei go with them, Mr. Nadhir said. He said he witnessed the entire episode from across the street but was helpless to stop it.

Abu Rami, said to be the lead kidnapper, had been living in the abandoned Ministry of Defense building just up the street that is now inhabited by squatters, residents said. Members of the Mahdi Army, a force that answers to the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, are known to patrol that building as well as a squalid former air force base across the street that has also become a large encampment for the homeless.

Just a few days before the kidnapping, Abu Rami and his men had beaten several teenage boys in the neighborhood with cables for wearing shorts, residents said.

But when the men tried to drag Mr. Taei into their car at gunpoint, he and members of Ms. Abdul-Satar's family resisted, Mr. Nadhir said. Three additional cars full of gunmen soon arrived to help.

One of Um Omar's nephews came running to her apartment to tell her what was happening, she said. She rushed over with other family members.

"I saw one of the kidnappers putting a gun to his head," she said.

The women in the house were screaming and crying, begging and arguing with the gunmen to stop, said Ahmed Abdul-Satar, one of Ms. Abdul-Satar's brothers, who said he tried to send them inside while the men sorted out the matter. His sister, in hysterics, fainted, he said.

Eventually, the gunmen wrestled Mr. Taei into the car, but another of Ms. Abdul-Satar's brothers, Omar, who knew Abu Rami from the neighborhood, insisted on going with them, other relatives said.

They were on their way to the vast Shiite slum of Sadr City, the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, relatives said, when Abu Rami ordered Mr. Abdul-Satar out of the car and left him at the side of the road. If he did not get out, he was told, they would kidnap him as well.

Ms. Abdul-Satar and her brother are now staying in the Green Zone for their safety and to answer additional questions from the military, their mother said. She has heard from her daughter a few times, but there has been no news of Mr. Taei.

American troops, along with their Iraqi counterparts, have cordoned off much of eastern Baghdad, including Sadr City, in their search for the missing soldier.

On Friday, they rolled in force into the district, searching a mosque and a school but did not find him.

Just two days before that, Iraqi and American troops had clashed over several hours with militiamen after they entered Sadr City at dawn. They raided the home of a notorious Shiite guerrilla leader in search of suspects in the kidnapping, the military said. In total, 10 militiamen were killed in the fighting.

On Sunday, thousands of residents, along with politicians from Mr. Sadr's political bloc, gathered in Sadr City to protest peacefully against the security cordon around the neighborhood.

The most serious of the attacks elsewhere across Iraq on Sunday was an ambush of a police academy minibus in the southern city of Basra. Fifteen officers and two interpreters were killed, said Gen. Abdul Khidir al-Taher of the Iraqi police. In addition, the police found at least 31 bodies across the capital on Sunday, many of them shot at close range and bearing signs of torture, an Interior Ministry official said.

For Um Omar, the last week has been filled with waiting and worrying. If she had known that Mr. Taei had been in the United States Army, she said, she would have forbidden him to visit.

"I'm praying," she said. "I'm calling on Allah for his safety."

Spokesman: Iraq Insurgents Rejected U.S. (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, October 30, 2006

A man claiming to speak for a major Iraqi insurgent group said Sunday that the United States had tried unsuccessfully to establish contact with his group.

Speaking on Al-Jazeera television, the purported spokesman for the 1920 Revolution Brigades said the U.S. bid to contact his group failed because "intermediaries" used by the Americans were deemed unworthy.

"We don't believe the Americans are serious," added the spokesman, identified as Sheik Abdullah Suleiman al-Amri, who appeared in traditional Arab dress but with his face concealed.

Alberto Fernandez, a senior State Department official, told Al-Jazeera on Oct. 21 that Washington was ready to talk with any Iraqi group — excluding al-Qaida in Iraq — to help reconcile Iraq's factions and end the violence wracking the country.

Outlining a blueprint of policies for bringing security to Iraq, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad spoke last week of the need to persuade Sunni insurgents to lay down their arms and engage in national reconciliation.

He said Sunni-ruled Arab states like Saudi Arabia and Jordan had agreed to encourage the groups to end violence and work for a united and independent Iraq.

Al-Amri did not identify the intermediaries his group rejected, but earlier in the interview he sharply criticized Sunni Arab politicians who joined Iraq's Shiite-dominated, U.S.-sponsored political process.

"Their participation was wrong and they did not make good on any of the promises they made to voters," he said.

Al-Amri said his group had no ties to Saddam Hussein loyalists fighting in the resistance or the Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential group known to maintain ties with some insurgents.

But like a man who claimed to speak for Saddam's outlawed Baath Party in an interview with Al-Jazeera earlier this month, al-Amri set near impossible conditions for talks, including a full withdrawal of U.S. forces and recognition of the insurgency as the main representative of Iraqis.

That was a hardening of previous conditions. His group was one of 11 Sunni insurgent groups that offered in June to halt attacks if the Iraqi government and President Bush announced a two-year timetable for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Iraq.

The 11 did not include the powerful Islamic Army in Iraq, Muhammad Army or the Mujahedeen Shura Council, the umbrella label for eight militant groups that include al-Qaida in Iraq.

The 1920 Revolution Brigades is particularly active in the Sunni-dominated provinces of Diyala, Salahuddin and Anbar. The group is known to have a large number of former members of Saddam's Republican Guard and Mukhabarat, the former dictator's most feared security agency.

In World Bank Role, Wolfowitz Keeps Up Battle To Reshape Iraq (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Paul Wolfowitz continues fighting to shape Iraq's future, but his battle has shifted to the World Bank.

The former U.S. deputy defense secretary, an architect of the Bush administration's Iraq policy who now heads the development agency, is pumping up its physical and financial presence in Iraq.

The higher profile is a departure from longstanding World Bank practice of steering clear of countries engulfed in heavy violence. Coming on top of a White House-endorsed campaign at the bank to fight corruption in developing nations, his Iraq policy is prompting criticism that Mr. Wolfowitz is turning the bank into a vehicle for Bush-style nation-building while slighting other deserving countries.

"The tight association between Wolfowitz and the Bush administration is quite problematic," says Manish Bapna, executive director of the Bank Information Center, a liberal watchdog group. For critics such as Mr. Bapna, the Wolfowitz agenda is putting at risk the independence that allows the World Bank to operate in difficult environments despite geopolitical tensions.

Mr. Wolfowitz says he is charting an independent course -- on Iraq and corruption. "I don't know why people go off on this, that it is a U.S. agenda," he says. Iraq can benefit from lending and advice on how to manage public finances, scale back economic subsidies and create a social safety net for impoverished Iraqis. "What they really need now is policy advice," he adds.

Some delegates on the bank's board have challenged Mr. Wolfowitz's policies, too. Germany's Eckhard Deutscher has argued that Mr. Wolfowitz's plan to facilitate business in Iraq by moving World Bank offices into Baghdad, rather than maintaining headquarters next door in Jordan, will expose staffers to new risks without guaranteeing they can accomplish anything more, according to bank officials.

France's Pierre Duquesne thinks other conflict-torn countries should get similar levels of attention, especially former French colonies such as Ivory Coast and the Central African Republic, current and former officials say. "We want the same for others," Mr. Duquesne said at a bank meeting earlier this year, these officials say.

While hobbled by political factionalism and widespread violence, Iraq's government ministries are nonetheless functioning, and the World Bank views them as partners in the nation's reconstruction. Aside from the U.S., Japan and a handful of Arab and European countries have donated money to the effort.

Mr. Wolfowitz is also betting the bank can operate more effectively at rebuilding Iraq than the U.S. can because the World Bank is viewed as a neutral player, not an occupying power.

But the scope of corruption in Iraq -- a recent U.S. report estimated $4 billion a year is lost there -- may put Mr. Wolfowitz in a bind between his competing priorities. For now, however, Iraq is exempt from the anticorruption drive under exceptions extended to countries torn by violence.

Since the 62-year-old Mr. Wolfowitz took office in June 2005, he has worked hard to show his commitment to the bank's mission of fighting poverty, boosting aid to Africa and providing debt relief to poor countries. He has also broken with the U.S. occasionally, urging the White House to accept deep cuts in farm supports in global trade talks to help poor agrarian nations. "I didn't take this job because I needed a job. I took this job because I believe in what the institution is trying to do," he says.

At the same time, Mr. Wolfowitz created a circle of top aides drawn from the Bush political establishment, including Robin Cleveland, a blunt Bush administration budget specialist who says "people don't leave meetings [with me] thinking I'm Christmas"; Karl Jackson, an Asia hand who, like Mr. Wolfowitz, worked in the administration of the first President Bush; and Kevin Kellems, a former Pentagon and White House public-relations specialist.

The Wolfowitz team quickly clashed with the bank's 24-member board over public corruption. As a former ambassador to Indonesia during the kleptocratic Suharto years, Mr. Wolfowitz says he learned that corruption undermines countries' ability to rise out of poverty. The Bush administration also considers the anticorruption agenda critical.

On one of his first days on the job, Mr. Wolfowitz used a board debate on a routine grant to Cambodia to voice concern about corruption. Later, he directed the World Bank to cancel, suspend or delay road contracts in Bangladesh, health-service funding to India and development loans to Kenya because of suspicions of government corruption.

Mr. Wolfowitz also proposed special conditions on the Republic of Congo's participation in a debt-relief program, citing concerns about financial dealings in that country's state-run oil sector. But the United Kingdom, France and others on the board complained he was grabbing power and unfairly penalizing a country working to meet debt-relief standards. After 22 members raised objections at a nine-hour meeting -- only the U.S. and Japan offered support -- Mr. Wolfowitz agreed to less stringent conditions. Both sides later declared victory.

Like Robert McNamara, the Vietnam-era defense secretary who went on to lead the World Bank, Mr. Wolfowitz is best known for his former job at the Pentagon. As deputy secretary of defense, he was a driving force for taking on Saddam Hussein even before the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. He argued that the U.S. policy of containing the Iraqi leader, in place since the 1991 Persian Gulf War, was a dangerous failure. Even before President Bush took office, Mr. Wolfowitz, an intellectual leader among neoconservatives, argued for a more muscular approach to foreign policy, including toward Iraq.

After the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, Mr. Wolfowitz urged that military commanders be given greater responsibility and more money for reconstruction, given their up-close knowledge of the situation. He largely lost that argument, but got a second chance to shape the reconstruction at the World Bank, which was founded after World War II to rebuild Western Europe and now makes development loans globally. Nor is Iraq just a policy issue for Mr. Wolfowitz; he still meets regularly with wounded U.S. soldiers convalescing in the Washington area.

As a rule, the World Bank gets involved in war-torn nations when the fighting is over, or at least contained. In Afghanistan, bank officials have operated in relative safety since the toppling of the Taliban by steering clear of provinces roiled by insurrection. But Iraq continues to be wracked by sectarian strife and battles between insurgents and U.S.-led coalition forces, and international aid workers and other noncombatants remain targets.

Typically, the World Bank looks for a "reasonable expectation" of stability in a nation among a handful of factors considered before it makes a major commitment of loans and staff, according to the institution's operational manual. In practice, that usually means bank personnel follow peacekeepers or other security forces after they have calmed tensions, as occurred in East Timor in 1999 when the bank moved in after British and Australian troops restored order. The bank has been recently ramping up operations in Liberia and Sierra Leone, after peacekeeping missions helped end violence there.

The World Bank became involved in Iraq in June 2003, three months after the U.S. toppled Mr. Hussein, joining the United Nations and International Monetary Fund on a mission to assess reconstruction needs. But work slowed after a bomb tore through a U.N. building that August and killed two dozen people, including a bank staffer.

The bank and IMF then pulled operations back to Amman, Jordan, where staffers would meet with Iraqi representatives or host video conferences. Unlike the bank, the IMF has no immediate plans to return to Baghdad.

Managing from afar slowed decision-making and made it harder to oversee details of programs or work deals with donor nations represented in Baghdad. A World Bank line of credit for Iraq went untapped, and a separate $400 million reconstruction trust fund, overseen by the bank, dispensed funds slowly.

Other programs suffered, too. From September 2004 to January 2005, the World Bank's private-sector arm, the International Finance Corp., held conferences in Amman to train Iraqis to become bankers. But with Iraq steadily deteriorating, some participants refused to return home, forfeiting a $5,000 bond they had posted to leave the country.

Shortly after taking office in June 2005, Mr. Wolfowitz learned the Iraq program was flailing when British development minister Hilary Benn raised concerns and threatened to withdraw money from the reconstruction fund unless the situation improved. Mr. Wolfowitz called in the World Bank's two top managers for Iraq, who explained the bank was hampered by chaos in the country. But Mr. Wolfowitz wasn't "in a mood to hear it," says a participant in the session.

Within weeks, one of the managers, Joseph Saba, was on his way to Baghdad, where he made tentative arrangements for a bank office in the heavily fortified Green Zone, home to some senior Iraqi offices and the U.S. military and diplomatic headquarters. The bank also put together a new blueprint for operations in Iraq -- a "strategy note," in bank parlance -- to cover the following two years. The bank's "overarching objective" would be to build up the basic "institutions" of government and society, the strategy note said, including improving access to health care and building roads and bridges vital to commerce.

Mr. Wolfowitz says he was simply following staff advice "for a modest, incremental upgrading of our presence" in Iraq and that the plans have board approval, but current and former officials say he and his top staff were the driving force for change. With Mr. Wolfowitz engaged, the flow of money began to increase. In November 2005, a few weeks after Iraqis voted to ratify a new constitution, the bank approved a $100 million loan for school construction and a $19.5 million grant to the Ministry of Health to help disabled Iraqis.

A request by Iraq's deputy prime minister for more World Bank help bolstered Mr. Wolfowitz's case for action, but the constant pressure applied by the Wolfowitz team strained relations with some staffers, especially Christiaan "Chrik" Poortman, a gruff 30-year bank veteran with a walrus mustache who oversaw Middle East affairs.

Mr. Poortman, a Danish career bureaucrat with a deep commitment to the institution, strove to avoid public differences with the new president. But privately, he worried Iraq remained too chaotic for staffers to operate safely, and was uncertain about what could be accomplished in going back into Baghdad, current and former bank officials say. Mr. Poortman declined to comment. Mr. Wolfowitz says, "The safety of our staff and development partners is always at the top of the list of priorities."

In March 2006, Ms. Cleveland, acting as a trouble-shooter for Mr. Wolfowitz, visited Baghdad to assess the situation. Two months later, convinced it was safe enough to operate, the bank decided to open a Baghdad office staffed by a country director and three others, in a space used by Iraq's ministries of finance and planning. The bank is now recruiting staff.

World Bank lending there has picked up too. A second $135 million loan for road construction was approved at the end of June, and two more loans of $150 million -- to boost electric generation -- are being negotiated.

In his most recent move, Mr. Wolfowitz has remade his Iraq team, pressuring Mr. Poortman to accept reassignment as a country director in Central Asia, officials said. After Mr. Poortman refused and retired, Mr. Wolfowitz filled the Middle East slot with Daniela Gressani, an Italian staffer who had handled Mr. Wolfowitz's transition to bank president. "It's very important to have chemistry," Mr. Wolfowitz says.

British Consulate In Basra To Evacuate: Report (AFP)

AFP, October 30, 2006

Most of the staff at the British consulate in the southern Iraqi city of Basra will be evacuated through the course of Monday due to concerns over the safety of its staff, The Daily Telegraph reported.

The newspaper said that a private security assessment had recommended the measure after the consulate was hit by regular mortar attacks over the past two months.

According to the paper, there are about 200 staff at the heavily-fortified consulate building, including bodyguards and Gurkhas. Some 12 of them are full-time staff.

Some have already been evacuated by helicopter, and more are expected to go this week. They will either be moved to Basra air station, eight miles ((13 kilometers) outside the city, or back to Britain, while a small staff will continue to run the consulate's operations until it is deemed safe enough for more to return.

A spokesman for the British foreign ministry, while insisting its officials were "not bailing out" told the newspaper: "This is a temporary measure as a response to increased mortar attacks ... Core staff will remain at Basra Palace and the consulate will continue to maintain a full range of activities."

Most of Britain's 7,000-strong force in Iraq is based predominantly in the south of the country.

British Charity Warns On Iraq Mercenaries (AFP)

AFP, October 30, 2006

The British government should introduce legislation to regulate people working for private military and security companies (PMSCs) in Iraq to prevent potential human rights abuses, a British non-governmental organisation said.

International development charity War On Want says that it is often difficult to hold people who work for PMSCs, which increasingly operate alongside United States and British troops, to account for their actions.

It wants the UK government to legislate to ban the involvement of PMSCs in direct combat or combat support.

"The government has failed to enact laws to punish their human rights abuses, including firing on Iraqi civilians," said campaigns director John Hilary.

"How can (British Prime Minister) Tony Blair hope to restore peace and security in Iraq while allowing mercenary armies to operate completely outside the law?"

Specifically the charity wants the British government to ban the involvement of PMSCs -- which increasingly operate alongside British and US troops -- in direct combat or combat support.

The report says that there is often "no perceptible difference" between soldiers and private support workers in combat situations.

"The potential for human rights abuses in such situations is an ever-present threat and it is nearly impossible to hold PMSC employees to account for their actions," it adds.

There are now some 48,000 PMSC staff in Iraq, many of whom work for British companies. That figure is six times the number of British troops in the troubled country.

War On Want says that the number of contracts being handed out in Iraq pushed the amount being spent on PMSCs up from 320 million pounds (477 million euros, 607 million dollars) in 2003 to more than 1.8 billion pounds the following year.

Britain's Foreign Office published a discussion paper on regulating PMSCs four years ago but the government has not acted on it.

Activists Want Mercenaries Regulated (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, October 30, 2006

A humanitarian group called Monday for government regulation of private security companies in combat zones, saying "mercenaries" often operate with impunity in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The London-based War on Want delivered a list of recommended regulations for the private security industry to Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett, calling for increased scrutiny of allegations of human rights abuses by private security staff.

The demand comes as a conference of British defense firms working in Iraq and Afghanistan was set to open Monday in London.

Both the British government and private security companies agree that regulation is needed. But the companies say an independent ombudsman — rather than government regulation — would be more effective.

In a report, War on Want called for details of government contracts with defense companies to be made public and proposed restrictions on lawmakers and civil servants taking jobs within the sector after leaving office.

"We want the revolving door between government and the private defense industry to slam shut," War on Want spokesman Paul Collins said.

Andy Bearpark, director general of the British Association of Private Security Companies, an industry-funded lobby group, said government regulation was unworkable.

He said his members would instead urge Beckett to appoint an independent ombudsman to oversee their operations.

"The way we work is across international boundaries, so regulation or prosecutions through national laws would be complex," Bearpark told The Associated Press in an interview.

He said security companies "support 100 percent" moves to regulate the industry.

Britain's Foreign Office said a review of options for regulating the industry had begun, but there was no timetable for putting proposals to parliament.

"There is an agreement that there should be some form of regulation," said a Foreign Office spokesman on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Bearpark, former director of operations and infrastructure for the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, said British security contractors earned about $1.88 billion a year.

DOJ_NMG_0087739

War on Want claims the total value of the industry worldwide topped $100 billion in 2004 and has estimated there are 48,000 private security contractors working in Iraq.

The U.S.-led coalition and private Western groups operating in Iraq have come to rely on contractors for many security duties, including guarding facilities and some highways.

At least 300 contractors are reported to have been killed in Iraq. Some Iraqis have complained that the private security workers have used excessive force.

Collins said his group recognized the need for private security, but believed the industry urgently required tighter regulation.

"What we want to see is the proper investigation and prosecution of human rights abuses being perpetrated by mercenaries," Collins said.

The War on Want report claims civilian contractors — including men named in U.S. military reports as having carried out abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison — have repeatedly escaped prosecution for crimes.

Two workers employed by private defense companies CACI International Inc. and Titan Corp. were "either directly or indirectly responsible for the abuses at Abu Ghraib," a 2004 report by U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Antonio Taguba stated.

Saddam's Lawyer Warns Against Execution (AP)

By Jamal Halaby

AP, October 30, 2006

Saddam Hussein's chief lawyer warned Sunday of worsening violence in Iraq and chaos across the Mideast if the ex-president is sentenced to death at his trial for a crackdown on a Shiite Muslim village in the 1980s.

Khalil al-Dulaimi also said he would break a monthlong boycott and attend proceedings Monday when Saddam's second trial resumes on separate charges of genocide against the Kurds.

A verdict in Saddam's first trial is expected Nov. 5. He and seven others are charged with crimes against humanity in connection with the killing of 148 Shiites from Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt against him.

Conviction carries a maximum penalty of death by hanging, but can be appealed to a higher court.

Meanwhile, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, denied speculation that the timing of the verdict was set to coincide with midterm elections in the United States.

"That decision was made by the Iraqi judges," he told CNN on Sunday when asked about the verdict being scheduled two days ahead of the elections.

The United States assists the court with logistics and security, Khalilzad said. "But we don't determine the date for holding the meetings or the trial or the date for making the decision or announcing the decision with regard to Saddam Hussein."

Al-Dulaimi told The Associated Press in Jordan that he warned of a civil war in Iraq in a letter sent recently to President Bush.

"I warned him against the death penalty and against any other decision that would inflame a civil war in Iraq and send fire throughout the region," al-Dulaimi said in a telephone interview from Baghdad. He did not say when he sent the letter to Bush.

"Any foolish American decision will further complicate things and will pose a serious threat to U.S. interests in the region," al-Dulaimi said.

He also claimed the offices of Saddam's defense team in the U.S.-controlled Green Zone of Baghdad were ransacked over a week ago and said more than 1,400 pages of trial documents were damaged.

He said the defense team was reviewing the documents, which were provided by the Iraqi court trying Saddam and his co-defendants in the current trial stemming from the 1987-88 Operation Anfal offensive against separatist Kurds in northern Iraq.

"Some 1,450 pages were blackened and we believe that the prosecution was behind this," al-Dulaimi said. He said he would lodge a complaint against the prosecution and demand an investigation into the incident.

He could not explain how the documents were blackened or damaged.

Badee Izzat Aref, a lawyer for one of Saddam's co-defendants, also said the lawyers' offices had been ransacked. He said there was no sign of a break-in.

Chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Mousawi said al-Dulaimi's claims were "baseless and show the inability of the defense team in defending their clients."

Al-Mousawi said the defense team's offices are at an American military camp inside the Green Zone and insisted "no one can do such things."

"They want to offend the court by this, but they are only offending their clients," al-Mousawi said.

Prosecutors in the Operation Anfal trial allege that 180,000 people were killed during the campaign against Kurds.

Al-Dulaimi said he would return to those proceedings when they reopen Monday in Baghdad to present the chief judge with defense requests, including allowing non-Iraqi lawyers to attend the hearings without prior permission from the court.

"Depending on the response from the chief judge, the defense team will decide whether to attend the hearings or continue its boycott," he said.

The defense team began boycotting the trial Sept. 24 after the dismissal of the chief judge, who had been criticized as being too soft on Saddam.

The lawyers said later they also were protesting the five-judge court's refusal to give them more time to review some 10,000 documents in the Anfal trial.

On Dangerous Footing In Iraq, Where Dancing Is A Courageous Act (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 29 — The members of the national dance troupe of Iraq are performers without an audience. They rehearse daily, but hardly ever put on a show.

Yet each turn of the hip and dip at the waist in their choreographed pieces has become weighted with a dangerous new reality, even as they wait for the chaos around them to subside so they can perform again. In today's Iraq, with conservative religious parties and radical militias exerting growing influence over every aspect of life, even dancing is an act of bravery.

"Society is overwhelmed by these religious ideologies," said Tariq Ibrahim, a male dancer in the Baghdad troupe, the Iraqi National Folklore Group. "Now a woman on the street without a head scarf attracts attention. What about a woman onstage dancing?"

Together they are a band of 10 women and 15 men from varied religious backgrounds. Once they toured the world together. Today they are simply trying to survive, hoping one day to thrive again as a troupe. But the religiosity sweeping Iraq does not bode well for their future.

Female participation in folk dancing is considered haram, or forbidden, in Islam. Ayatollah al-Sistani, the leading Shiite cleric in Iraq, has issued strict guidelines against dancing in various situations. The country's Shiite-led government, the dancers said, is naturally trying to marginalize them.

"Religion in its essence does not match with art," said Fouad Thanoon, the group's director and lead choreographer. "So when religion and government come together, that will affect art very much."

The group has more immediate worries about extremists. Recently one of its members, Bushra Yousif, 21, a petite woman with delicate features who has been with the group for six years, received a note at home warning her to leave within 48 hours. A bullet was included in the envelope.

She was probably singled out because of her profession, she said, but she will continue to attend rehearsals every day. She loves dancing too much, she said describing it as the highest form of art to "deliver a message through your body."

"Dying for this group would be like being martyred," she said, adding that it is a risk she accepts.

The group, which began in 1971, is dedicated to preserving the folk-dancing heritage of Iraq, performing traditional dances drawn from across that country's history and geography. The troupe's first two decades were golden years, when dancers trained with master instructors from overseas and frequently went on international tours. In 1980 the dancers performed at the United Nations in New York and visited Paris. They have gone to Italy, Japan and China — 60 countries in all — and won numerous prizes along the way.

The economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations in the early 1990s brought most of that to a halt. But just a year before the American-led invasion in 2003, the group enjoyed a rebirth with a burst of freedom under Saddam Hussein's government, performing almost every week here.

"The audiences were huge," Mr. Thanoon, the group's director said. "The theaters were overbooked."

But the group has been in suspended animation since the invasion began. It has performed just four times in Iraq and made two brief trips to Jordan and Dubai since 2003. The violence that surrounds it makes holding performances impossible.

"It is absurd," Mr. Ibrahim said. "It is not logical to have a performance group that only practices."

Maysoun al-Damalouji, an outspoken secular member of Parliament who was the Iraqi government's senior deputy minister of culture until March, said she had worried about being able to protect the dancers, as well as others involved in artistic endeavors that were objectionable to certain religious groups.

"The dancers were not the only ones," she said. "We were worried about having fashion shows because we had to protect the models. We found we couldn't really do that. The best way of protecting them was not to have them shown in public."

The dance troupe had mainly supported itself with ticket sales before the fall of Mr. Hussein's government, but when performances ended that became impossible. The current government has not compensated for that loss, the dancers said. They receive tiny stipends, amounting to about $140 a month, but even that is not guaranteed. The money often does not come and is usually barely enough to cover each dancer's rent. Because the dancers rehearse every day from 9:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m., it is almost impossible for them to get second jobs.

The present government, controlled by conservative religious parties, cares little for the arts, Ms. al-Damalouji said, so it is not inclined to support groups like the dance troupe.

"Iraq is without a doubt an Islamic society, but Islam is not our only culture," she said. "All the other cultures are being denied by this government. There is an attempt to change Iraqi culture in general."

In this climate the dancers said they must censor themselves. The group recently played a small role in a theatrical production in support of the country's national reconciliation plan, put on for some employees of the Ministry of Culture, but Mr. Thanoon advised his dancers, for their own sake, to minimize any shaking of their hips or shoulders. The result was a rigid routine that seemed more martial than elegant.

"It should be like this," Liqaa Shukr said, demonstrating with plenty of gyrating flourish. "Instead it is like this," she said, switching to the languid movements they wound up performing.

Certain folk dances have been eliminated completely from the group's repertory for performances inside Iraq because they might be considered too provocative.

"We need to match what's going on now, not stand out," said Najwa Subhi, another female dancer.

Most of the women in the group go to elaborate lengths to hide their occupation from their neighbors, even though some of their faces are well known in Iraq from their performances on television under the old government.

Ms. Subhi, who lives in a mostly Shiite neighborhood dominated by militiamen, said she told her neighbors that she had quit her dancing and was working as a receptionist. She told them that even Hannah Abdullah, one of the group's founders and Iraq's best-known dancer, had retired.

"I spread this idea that we are no longer dancing," she said.

On a recent trip to Jordan for a cultural festival, she had her husband load her luggage in the car in the middle of the night. Even her husband's family did not know that she was going to perform. She told them she was visiting her brother in Kirkuk.

Rana Anwar, who successfully auditioned for a spot in the troupe three months ago, has let her neighbors and friends continue to believe that she is still a student at a tourism institute in Baghdad.

"It is very hard with what's going on to become a dancer," she said. "But my main goal is to show Iraq is not a backward country. Iraqi people like to dance, they like to sing."

So the dancers continue to practice daily in front of empty seats at the National Theater in central Baghdad. The dilapidated hall has become their sanctuary from the country's tumult.

Dumoaa Jamal was with the group for 10 years, but her uncle forced her to quit after the invasion because he deemed it too dangerous. But she returned three months ago, and tries to allay his fears by making sure she comes to rehearsals dressed in inconspicuous clothing and a head scarf hiding her long flowing hair.

"I wish it could be 24 hours a day," she said about the group's rehearsals. "When I enter the theater, it is as if everything from outside is gone. It is as if I have entered a different world."

She feels like a bird on stage, she said. Later, when she has donned her head scarf, scrubbed the makeup from her face and stepped outside, reality returns. There is no more dancing, only walking as invisibly as possible.

Al Qaeda-Linked Facility Destroyed Near Pakistan-Afghan Border Associated Press (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

KHAR, Pakistan -- Pakistani troops backed by missile-firing helicopters destroyed an al Qaeda-linked training facility in a northwestern tribal area near the Afghan border Monday, killing "many" militants, officials said.

The pre-dawn attack targeted a madrassa compound holding "70-80" militants in a village near the town of Khar, the main town in the Bajur tribal district, said army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

Maj. Gen. Sultan said the facility was destroyed but that it wasn't immediately clear how many people had been killed.

The attack came two days after 5,000 pro-Taliban tribesmen held an anti-American rally in the Bajur area near Damadola, a village close to the site of an alleged U.S. missile attack that killed several al Qaeda members and civilians in January.

"We received confirmed intelligence reports that 70-80 militants were hiding in a madrassa used as a terrorist-training facility, which was destroyed by an army strike, led by helicopters," Maj. Gen. Sultan said.

Soldiers on the ground were tallying the number of dead, Maj. Gen. Sultan said. He was unable to provide a preliminary estimate of the casualty count, but said that "many" militants had been killed.

Helicopters fired four to five rockets into the madrassa, which was run by Liaquat Hussain, a local Islamic cleric who is believed to have been sheltering al Qaeda militants, Maj. Gen. Sultan said.

DOJ_NMG_0087742

A senior intelligence official in Bajur also said that a local al Qaeda leader, Faqir Mohammed, who led Saturday's rally was also believed to have been inside the madrassa that was targeted.

It was unclear if Mr. Mohammed was among those killed, said the official, who declined to be identified further because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media.

70 Taliban Killed In Night Battle, NATO Force Says (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 29 — A battle overnight Saturday in which NATO and Afghan forces engaged suspected Taliban insurgents in the southern Afghan province of Uruzgan might have killed as many as 70 insurgents, NATO officials said Sunday.

In a separate incident, NATO said one of its soldiers had been killed and eight more wounded, along with three local Afghan civilians, when their convoy was hit by a roadside bomb.

A statement from NATO said that its troops and Afghan National Army forces had come under fire from between 100 and 150 insurgents near a NATO operating base in the Chora Valley, north of Trinkot, in Uruzgan Province.

The statement said its troops had been backed up by attack helicopters and close air support during a firefight that lasted several hours.

NATO said last week that it had begun a widespread operation with the Afghan Army to try to overwhelm suspected Taliban fighters, especially in volatile regions where the insurgency had been on the rise since the beginning of the year.

A spokesman for the NATO operation, Maj. Luke Knittig, said the troops had been operating with Afghan Army forces north of Trinkot because the insurgents had been treating the area as a safe haven.

The roadside bomb that hit the NATO convoy exploded in an area where Dutch and Australian forces are based. The nationality of the soldier who was killed has not been announced.

Since NATO took over responsibility for the region from American troops at the beginning of August, 52 soldiers have been killed fighting the insurgency.

There also have been civilian casualties in the operation, including dozens of Afghan civilians killed last week in Kandahar Province during an airstrike by NATO planes.

At a news conference on Friday, President Hamid Karzai called for better coordination between Afghan and NATO forces during military operations to avoid civilian deaths.

US Urges Nato Allies To Help South Afghanistan Mission (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler In London And Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

The US is pushing its Nato allies to send more troops and support to help in Afghanistan ahead of a showpiece summit next month.

Officials say Washington is putting pressure on Spain, France, Italy and Germany, all of which have soldiers elsewhere in the country, to free up their troops to move into the south, where the most bitter fighting in Afghanistan is taking place.

"Wouldn't it be better if Germany and France . . . could be willing to have those troops sent sometimes on a periodic, temporary basis to help the Dutch, British, US and Canadians that are undertaking the major share of the fighting?" Nicholas Burns, US undersecretary of state, asked last week.

But the four countries say they are sorely stretched because of commitments across the world. Madrid and Rome both argue that they are hard pushed to meet their mission in the west of the country, where there are a total of 1,800 Nato troops compared with 9,800 in the south.

"We've already seen that the crackdown in the south has pushed some Taliban into the west," said one official. "This is an area that is insecure too so it would be irresponsible to take soldiers away."

However, the US and the traditionally Atlanticist countries that dominate the Nato forces in the south, such as the UK, Canada and the Netherlands, would like many more of Nato's 26 member states to rally round by the time the alliance holds a summit in Riga, Latvia, on November 28-29.

Last Friday, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato secretary-general, briefed US President George W. Bush at a meeting in Washington on his plans for the Riga summit.

Poland has already accelerated plans to deploy a 1,000-strong battalion, which will be based in the centre of the country but could be sent to the south.

But other commitments have been much smaller – the Czech Republic and Denmark are sending 20-30 extra personnel apiece. Last week, Norway's centre-left government decided not to send troops to the south.

Meanwhile, a call by Gen James Jones, Nato's top military commander, for more air support has largely gone unanswered. However, the UK has promised more helicopters for its Nato troops by the time of the next rotation in spring.

Lord Drayson, UK defence procurement minister, told the FT this month that he was looking at leasing capacity to help meet the need.

Nato is also trying to step up its co-operation with international development organisations.

This week, Nato ambassadors will hold an unprecedented meeting with representatives of the European Commission, European Union governments, the United Nations and the World Bank.

However, non-governmental organisations in Afghanistan itself have begun to withdraw from much of the south because of fears about security. Most aid agencies in the south and the east of the country are confined to Kandahar city centre.

Send More Nato Troops To Afghanistan (FT)

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

The omens look bad for Nato's mission in Afghanistan. The alliance's recent offensive in that graveyard of empires has been bloody and, if reports of dozens of civilian casualties are to be believed, potentially counterproductive. But this is not a reason for Nato to pull out. Quite the opposite.

On September 11 2001, the world paid the price for neglecting Afghanistan. Despite quickly unseating the Taliban, an Iraq-obsessed Bush administration and its equally distracted allies then failed to make sufficient political, military and financial commitments.

Today, an insurgency is unsettling Afghanistan's south. There is precious little in the way of institutions and development work in parts of the country has been non-existent.

This matters. Afghanistan is at the heart of a sensitive and important part of the world - not least because of its long and porous border with Pakistan, an unstable and nuclear-armed state.

Nonetheless, there are signs of hope. More than Iraq, Afghanistan is tired of war - almost three decades of conflict have seen to that. The local population is not dead-set against the foreign soldiers. But it does need reassurance that their commitment is lasting and will lead to a better quality of life.

As Nato leaders prepare for a summit in Riga next month, they must recognise the importance of the mission and provide the means for its success.

That means sending thousands more troops to the south, where chronicinsecurity has meant that development has barely begun. A bigger military presence is needed if the region's wrecked infrastructure is to be rebuilt.

Germany, which has thousands of soldiers in the more peaceful north of the country, could make a valuable commitment by making some troops available for the south. Sir Richard Dannatt, the head of the British army, has already hinted at his desire to redeploy forces from Iraq to Afghanistan. Other countries - including the US - will have to think hard about sending fresh troops.

Strategy must also be rethought. During recent weeks Nato has focused on the number of Taliban fighters it has killed in the south. But insurgencies are overcome by winning hearts and minds, not stacking up corpses. Nato should keep focused on working where it can most make a difference, rather than being sucked into side conflicts, as British troops have been.

A winning strategy also requires much more from the world at large. There are some encouraging signs that the European Union is stepping up its efforts to help create an effective police force. But the United Nations, international donors and neighbouring Pakistan all have to work much more closely with Nato to prevent Afghanistan from slipping out of control.

Defeat would be a strategic calamity. Success, while extremely difficult, is still possible. Every effort is necessary: Afghanistan is still to play for.

Backsliding In Afghanistan (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Bit by bit, the U.S. is losing control in the country because of a resurgent Taliban, drought and inadequate aid.

WITH WINTER approaching, all the indicators for Afghanistan have headed south. We are on the brink of losing Afghanistan to the resurgent Taliban and to the poverty and despair in which U.S. forces found it five years ago.

Among the many signs that the almost $12 billion the U.S. has poured into Afghanistan since 2003 for reconstruction has been neither sufficient nor well spent: Afghans will go hungry again this winter unless they receive massive food aid. Fierce fighting between NATO and Taliban forces in a wide swath of the south has conspired with drought to destroy farmers' crops.

Both the drought and the renewed warfare were predicted. The Bush administration's failure to prevent either disaster stems from its stubborn view that Afghanistan can be fixed on the cheap.

Drought is an old enemy in Afghanistan, yet spending on water projects has lagged, as has all infrastructure work in a nation where 70% of the people are poor farmers. Without wells, ditches and modern irrigation techniques, the cycle of poverty that leaves families no choice but to grow poppies or starve will never be broken.

But in 2004, the administration invested only $23 million in water projects; it allocated $243 million to counter-narcotics and police training. Both sums, of course, are grossly inadequate. But the imbalance is telling. The administration has never matched its belated rhetorical commitment to "nation building" in Afghanistan with the troops and money that might have made that possible.

As the security situation has deteriorated, instead of redoubling its efforts to boost the Afghan standard of living as a bulwark against drug lords and Taliban radicals, the U.S. slashed aid to Afghanistan by 29% in fiscal 2006.

Without enough Western troops to suppress them, and without a central government strong enough to project power to its territories, the Taliban was bound to fill the vacuum. The United States has done little diplomatically in the last five years to establish a meaningful border between Afghanistan, which does not recognize the international border known as the Durand Line, and Pakistan, which has abandoned any effort to control the tribal areas on its side of the border.

NATO forces, which now command most of the 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, have taken over the daunting task of fighting the insurgency — but they cannot chase the Taliban into Pakistan, reducing the effort to a cynical, though deadly, farce. Taliban forces attack, then retreat across the border into the Pakistani tribal areas to rest, rearm and treat their wounded. They return to kill more U.S. and NATO soldiers.

The continuing attacks on aid workers, contactors and government officials make it impossible to improve the standard of living in Taliban-infested provinces.

Reconstruction is stalled. The U.S. needs to renew its commitment to Afghanistan. A good first step would be to restore this year's 29% funding cut and target the bulk of the funds to Afghanistan's rural poor.

Army Focuses On Better Relations With Next Of Kin (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, October 30, 2006

Even as U.S. forces struggle to adjust battlefield tactics in Iraq, the Army is grappling with better ways to cope with the war's carnage here at home.

The aim is to improve how families are notified about a combat death, a duty that the Army says is one of its most difficult.

A new training film shows the difficulties that await the soldiers who have to make the fateful knock on the door to inform families of a military death. The film intersperses professional actors with documentary-like interviews of soldiers who have performed casualty notification.

At one point, an actress portraying the wife of a fictional soldier based at Fort Campbell in Kentucky sits on a living room couch clutching a pillow and shaking her head violently at news of his death.

“No! No! That's impossible,” she says through tears. “He just e-mailed me the other day and said everything was fine!”

The film later cuts to an interview where Army Chaplain Ed Grimenstein of Fort Bragg in North Carolina, warns of what soldiers might expect during notification.

“Some spouses literally will go hysterical. Some spouses might be violent, meaning yelling at the casualty notification officer and chaplain,” he says. “The sky's the limit as far as reactions that they may encounter going in. There have been spouses who literally just fall down on the ground. There have been spouses who just calmly accept and say, ‘Yes, OK, thank you very much.' ”

In a version of the film USA TODAY was allowed to view, the background music was Breathe Me by Sia featured on the HBO series Six Feet Under. The film — still in production — and a host of other policy changes came with demands for improvement from Army Secretary Francis Harvey this year after family complaints were received and mistakes made in death notification cases.

“Some people I know have wonderful casualty officers,” says Peggy Buryj of Canton, Ohio, who was given wrong information about the death of her son, Army Spc. Jesse Buryj, 21, in 2004. “Mine was useless.”

Lt. Col. Bob Amico, a supervisor in the film's production, says the Army is seeking to improve and standardize training for soldiers assigned as casualty notification officers, as well as for casualty assistance officers, who help families over periods of months with funeral and benefit arrangements. In some Army installations, soldiers were receiving as little as two hours of training for those jobs.

The new program requires at least four hours of training for notification and 16 hours for casualty assistance. New material includes the psychological stages of grief.

Col. Patrick Gawkins, head of the Army's casualty and mortuary affairs center, concedes that these changes come late after three years of war in Iraq. “It's hard to answer back why it wasn't done this way before,” he says. “We learn from our experience.”

When a soldier killed in battle is identified, the Army tries to inform next of kin within four hours. A two-page sheet of circumstances is sent to casualty headquarters in Alexandria, Va., and from there to one of 27 Army casualty assistance offices in the USA or six overseas.

Those offices then dispatch soldiers who have previously been assigned notification duty. Families are generally contacted only between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m. This year, Harvey ordered that chaplains take a greater role in the process.

Amico says the training film depicts the process as true to life as possible.

“We have a shot in our video with a chaplain and ever so slightly you see a slight tear coming down from his eyes,” Amico says. “Not a lot of emotion. But you can see that he's feeling it and that it's OK to have emotion. We want them (notification soldiers) to feel comfortable with being able to do that.”

This is a key element in training, Amico says. “We don't want (notification) to turn into such a military assignment that they go in there rigid and not feel any kind of compassion for the families.”

Actual soldiers who have made notifications weigh in with their own candid experiences in the film.

“The chaplain actually stopped and we said a prayer before we went in,” says Sgt. 1st Class William Powers of Fort Bragg. “It's pretty rough to go in there and do that, knowing that as soon as they see someone getting out of the car with that type of uniform on, they'd know what's happening.”

Master Sgt. Dane Snyder of Fort Myer in Virginia remembers a mother who was unloading groceries from her car when he arrived.

“She saw us and it reminded me of the scene from Saving Private Ryan when the mom just started to go down: ‘Oh no, Oh no, Oh no.' ”

Capt. Chris Van Horn, also of Fort Myer, recalls a mother who did not immediately realize why he was there. “I couldn't believe she really had no idea,” he says. “As soon as I said, ‘killed,' she lost it.”

The training film touches on the uncertainty of what happens after delivering the news.

“You focus so much on — at least, I did — on what you're going to say, that once you get that part done, my mind kind of went blank a little bit,” says Van Horn. “I was like, wow, I didn't think about what I was going to say after this.”

The film's narrator reminds students of the underlying goal: “Keep in mind that your performance … is likely to shape the family's lasting impression of our Army as an institution that cares for its own.”

When The War Comes Home (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio

Alone and in clusters, collars up to block the rain, thousands of people lined the streets on a gray October day in 2005 to welcome their warriors home. For 13 miles, they rose to wave, a few to salute, as the buses rolled slowly past. More than one tough Marine, homeward bound after a brutal tour in Iraq, shed a tear.

When they reached solid ground, still wearing their desert camouflage, the Marines embraced their families and embarked on the most jarring of transitions. They would discover in the following year that seven months in Iraq had changed them more than they could have imagined, guiding and afflicting them in ways they are still struggling to understand.

Marines who expected duty so light that boredom seemed probable instead saw almost daily combat and 23 men killed in action, more casualties than any U.S. company in Iraq. When it was over, they traded an edgy, exhausting regimen of forced alertness and sudden brutality for sheer ordinariness. Nothing at home felt as urgent or as meaningful, as thrilling or as awful.

The 160 survivors returned to work or college, to wives or girlfriends, sometimes to childhood bedrooms grown suddenly small. Many suffered flashbacks, drank hard, quarreled with their women and sought refuge in one another, laboring to replace the rugged discipline, power and purpose they had left behind in Iraq. Some turned to counselors, some to God, others to the solidarity and beery narcotic of the VFW hall.

"It seems like everything you see reminds you of it. You drive through town and you see someone with a 'Support the Troops' sticker and it just starts going through your head again," said Sgt. Travis Brill. "Drink three, four, five beers. I find it easier to sleep when you don't have silly-ass things going through your head."

They fought as a unit and then scattered. In a series of conversations over the past year, more than a dozen Marines of Lima Company shared their experiences of Iraq and their reentry into the United States. Pieced together, scenes from their recent lives sketch a world of in-between, a landscape inhabited not only by them but also by countless others among the roughly 1 million military personnel who have returned from Iraq or soon will.

The survivors made it home from the war, but they brought the war with them.Fall 2005: Columbus, Ohio

Staff Sgt. Guy Zierk broke up with his girlfriend on his fourth day back. He started drinking, ordering so many top-shelf vodkas and steaks that he churned through $5,000 in restaurant and bar tabs. He found himself "trying to find out the importance of things here," he said. "You think about car payments and bills and arguments in the family and who's going where for the holidays. And you try to compare that with the importance of who's shooting a rifle at you."

In some ways, Zierk, 31, had hated to leave Iraq, where he knew some streets better than he knew Columbus. He considered extending his tour. Then came the patrol when, exhausted and angry after watching so many good Marines die, he burst into an Iraqi house. He expected to find insurgents and make them pay.

Instead, he discovered two Iraqi women and a boy, maybe 16 years old. The scared teenager made no hasty moves, but it took every rational fiber in Zierk's body to keep from shooting him dead.

"The whole reason I didn't stay in Iraq was I would've killed people that didn't deserve to die," Zierk said, "and it wouldn't have served any greater good."

On Nov. 12, Zierk donned his dress blues -- white belt gleaming, black shoes shining, white hat crisp and snug -- for the annual Marine Corps Ball. Nearly 1,000 people packed a downtown hotel. His buddies were there, and so were parents and widows of the dead. The combination of clinking glasses and raw memories was too much.

He slipped away and walked through the streets of Columbus, alone.A City's Embrace

At McDonald's, customers thanked them. At nightclubs, people bought them drinks. Someone invited a group to the Super Bowl. A film crew produced a powerful documentary titled "Combat Diary." The mayor of Columbus, father of a Lima Marine, called them "true heroes."

The fact is, no one expected Lima Company to see so much combat, to become so decorated or so wounded, and certainly not to be adopted so strongly by the city. Lima was a reserve unit, an amalgam of students and workers, almost all from Ohio, who mustered every month to train for duty that might never come.

When it came, the citizen-soldiers found themselves posted at a Soviet-built dam on the Euphrates River in western Anbar province, home to some of the most violently contested territory in Iraq.

Between Feb. 28 and Sept. 30, 2005, the company launched patrols and fought joint operations amid 1,700 square miles of mostly Sunni areas from Hit and Haditha to the Syrian border, targeting anti-American insurgents and their supporters. In addition to the 23 dead, 31 Lima Marines were wounded, 17 of them badly enough to be sent home.

After the headlines and the public worrying, many well-meaning Columbus residents honored Lima's men and felt they knew them. The Marines were grateful but dubious, especially of the questions: "What was it like over there? How many Iraqis did you kill?"A Dissatisfied Warrior

In central Ohio, 80 miles from Columbus, Travis Brill, 30, returned to work at a steel mill.

"I was leading combat troops in Iraq, and now I'm picking up scrap metal," he said one desolate day. "They even have rules for walking through the parking lot."

Trained as a warrior, he had prayed for combat, and months after returning from battle, his brain was still tuned to his Iraq soundtrack. He remembered Pantera's "Walk" blaring through military loudspeakers as he knocked off enemy fighters with his booming .50-caliber machine gun.

"If you know you're on the verge of being blown up any second," he said, "you're feeling alive."

Brill said he and maybe 15 other Marines had a bet of $100 each on who would get the first Iraqi kill, who would be the first Marine to be wounded, who the first to die. The "winner's" sum would go to his survivors. Once the war became a grind, the bet no longer seemed so clever and they dropped it.

"I was pretty optimistic at first. I went there with the right mind-set that I wanted to help these people, and they changed it pretty quickly. They don't give a damn, and all they want to do is blow you up when you're not looking. It sucks when you lose so many of your buddies for no good reason."

Even as he cursed the war's slow progress, he felt grateful to be part of a fight bigger than himself. As he left, he felt certain he was leaving business unfinished. Now, in the house Brill rents from his mother-in-law, he wakes up every night with Iraq on his mind. His baby daughter -- named Cami, for Marine camouflage uniforms -- cannot share her parents' bed. Brill is afraid of throwing a punch in his troubled sleep.

Open about how Iraq has changed him, Brill commented while playing poker at an Elks club that the challenge of killing enemy fighters took the fun out of hunting deer. "I'd rather kill a person," he said. "I love the hunt."

Fellow Marines have told him he needs counseling. He does not feel the need.'You Come Back and . . . You're Lost'

George Wentworth, a Navy Reserve medic known universally as "Doc," is the person Lima's Marines call when the walls are closing in. At 11 at night, at 3 in the morning, in the darkness just before dawn, they dial his number. Once when he tried to squeeze in a long weekend with his wife, he felt he never got off the telephone.

Within days of Lima's return, he abandoned his early goals of seeing no divorces and no domestic violence. He was not surprised: "You come back and, literally, you're lost."

Col. Charles W. Hoge, chief psychiatrist at the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research, recently told Congress that 10 to 15 percent of soldiers returning from Iraq have post-traumatic stress disorder and a similar number have symptoms of PTSD, depression or anxiety. The rates are higher for reservists, a distinction that appears to emerge months after troops return home.

Wentworth, who has taken calls from panicked wives and distraught Marines, said: "There's no timeline for anybody to get over this. You look at Vietnam vets -- some of these guys didn't have problems until they retired from their civilian careers. And all of a sudden 20, 30 years later, it all came back to haunt them."Spring: Washington, D.C.

One night at Shelly's Back Room in Washington, half a dozen lobbyists and Capitol Hill staffers pressed Cpl. Jason Dominguez to tell war stories over Scotch and cigars. Instead, Dominguez, a legislative aide to a Republican congressman, offered a parable.

He recalled a political fundraiser three days after he returned from Iraq. As he studied contributors laughing and digging into the main course, he saw in his mind's eye a young American in uniform patrolling an Iraqi street, about to be blown to pieces. To the Ohio crowd, the dead Marine would be a news blip, barely noticed, quickly forgotten.

With a tongue sharper than usual, Dominguez, 26, wanted his new Washington friends to see what he saw, the American cause for which 23 of his fellow volunteers gave their lives.

"When I see things on the Hill, I think, 'This is all some big joke?' " he lectured. " 'This is a party?' This is not a party. It's a commitment. The men and women who died treated it that way. You need to treat it that way, too. If not, get out of our house, get out of our Congress."

They listened. He wonders whether they heard.

"There are times when I'm walking the halls of Congress and it would feel so good to strap on my body armor and be back in the fight," Dominguez said. "When I was there, I knew: This matters. We were able to bring them one step closer to what it means to not live under tyranny."

About day-to-day political life, he is less sure.

"Is this what my friends died for?" he finds himself asking on days when he feels alone in a crowd. "It's amazing how oblivious we are as Americans to how much all of this costs," he said.March: Drill Weekend

Lima Company mustered March 24 for its first drill weekend since its return. Radio bulletins reported that 26 Iraqis were killed that day in Baghdad. President Bush, speaking at a Republican fundraiser in Indiana, declared the United States could be beaten only if it lost its will.

"Democracy," he said, "is on the march in Iraq."

Inside headquarters, Marines traded high-fives and hugs. One walked with a wooden cane. Another had a special boot to hold his ankle in place. A third had a noticeable limp. Roughly half the company had mustered out or moved on, their places filled by fresh reserves who needed to be trained.

The next morning, Maj. Gen. Douglas O'Dell, commander of the 4th Marine Division, addressed the company and awarded medals to the families of the fallen. At 58, he keeps his gray hair short and his handshake firm, but tears ran down his cheeks as he faced the young widows, the parents and the children too young to understand.

Speaking later, O'Dell said that consoling those grieving a loss from Iraq was his toughest duty in his 38 years as a Marine. "Every one of them I have felt very personally. They're like my kid brothers," said O'Dell, a father of five whose own brother died at 17.

O'Dell believes Lima Company performed admirably, with guts and restraint, but was asked to do too much. That is as far as he will go. "These are not decisions I agreed with," he said, "so I will not be on the record until I retire."

Before he left the drill deck, the general announced that Lima Company probably will be deployed again next year, to Chad.Beyond the Casualties

To a man, Lima Marines wish outsiders would recognize them for their commitment and their successes, not for their casualties. They point to weapons confiscated and insurgents killed. They talk about holding ground where Iraqis voted in large numbers and delivering soccer balls to children.

The Marines say they were not inclined, by instinct or training, to question the mission.

"It was just like, 'Hey, we're going.' There was never any discussion of the whys," said Sgt. Andrew Taylor, who studies Arabic in hopes of becoming a U.S. agent overseas. "We didn't join up to argue about the right or wrong. I don't think anybody cared."

"If it fails," Taylor said of the Iraq campaign, "that doesn't change the fact that we were trying, we were making an effort. It's kind of a bad analogy, but it's kind of like Christmas: You give someone a present they don't like, but at least you gave it to them and made the effort."

What now, as Iraq struggles and a majority of Americans oppose the war?

"If we pull out of Iraq too soon, every single American who died over there will have died in vain," said Gunnery Sgt. Larry Bowman, 36, an Ohio state trooper who blames his recent divorce largely on friction over his Marine devotion. "I'm a big believer that fires you don't put out are going to burn bigger."April: Arlington National Cemetery

The dogwoods and azaleas stood in glorious bloom at Arlington National Cemetery on April 27 when half a dozen Marines arrived from Columbus. With the Pentagon visible through the trees and the Washington Monument rising in the distance, they made their way to Section 60, where names of the Iraq war dead were newly chiseled into white headstones and the seams still showed on fresh sod.

Finding familiar names, they crouched close in silent conversation. There lay Navy Petty Officer 3rd Class Travis Youngblood, a husband and father attached to Lima as a medic. Nearby were Staff Sgt. Anthony Goodwin and Lance Cpl. Christopher Dyer.

One of the visitors, John Dyer, had been to his son's grave before.

"You walk up," he said, "and you hope it's not there."

Dyer found himself replaying his final telephone conversation with his son.

"Are you getting enough sleep?"

"Dad, when I get home, I'm going to sleep for a week."

A few days later, a roadside bomb exploded and 19-year-old Chris Dyer was gone.

"To a certain extent, you reconcile yourself to never being comfortable," Dyer said, motioning toward the surviving Marines. "You just fake it, which is what I do."Pride and Pain

Staff Sgt. Steve Hooper tells of Marines swerving suddenly on suburban Ohio roads after spotting what in Iraq would be likely hiding places for bombs, and of Marines on an Indiana training mission refusing beef jerky because it reminded them of seared flesh.

When he is with his girlfriend, he does not discuss combat.

"I don't tell her a thing. I don't want her knowing a lot of things I did over there," said Hooper, a quiet Bronze Star winner who talks often with fellow Marines. "Some people are proud of it. Some people wonder if God will forgive them for what they did."

Hooper's sharpest pain is the death of Cpl. Andre Williams, 23, his second-in-command and closest friend. Williams died while hunting insurgents not long after videotaping a message for his daughter's sixth birthday. Hooper keeps reaching, asking himself if he could have done something, anything, to keep him alive.

Late one June night, as Hooper was driving to a bar after finishing his shift as a prison guard, the radio began playing the melancholy Green Day song "Wake Me Up When September Ends," adopted as a theme by some Lima Marines as they counted the days until their tour ended on Sept. 30. Later, it was the soundtrack of a memorial video for Williams.

"Ring out the bells again, like we did when spring began," the song goes. "Wake me up when September ends."

Here comes the rain again,
Falling from the stars.
Drenched in my pain again,
Becoming who we are,
As my memory rests
But never forgets what I lost .

As the song came on the radio, tears filled Hooper's eyes. He switched stations.The War-Peace Switch

A skilled assassin in Iraq, Staff Sgt. Brian Taylor is a healer back home.

"Lift your heels up, girlie. Like this. You've got to help me out," he gently and playfully coached a frail woman with a brain dysfunction and a broken hip. "Can you catch a ball? We're going to play ball. Here. Catch the ball."

Taylor, 34, feels as though he came equipped with a war-peace switch. In Iraq, he spent endless hours silently studying insurgents through the scope of his powerful sniper's rifle, feeding on the tension of deciding "whether they take their next breath."

"Most of the time, you've got to go with a gut feeling," he said. "More than likely, you're right."

DOJ_NMG_0087749

A good day, he said, was "when we got a bunch of bad guys and we had no casualties."

But the insurgents' successes, particularly their killing of six Ohio-based snipers ambushed while supporting Lima, left Taylor begging for more missions.

"I don't feel we were defeated," he said, "but I wish I could've killed a lot more. They got a lot of us."

Back home, he focused on moving forward, even as his war experience sometimes colored his days; a ringing car alarm in his quiet cul-de-sac left him "huffing, puffing, trying to get out of bed. I felt like an idiot." He proposed to his girlfriend on an Irish vacation. She gave birth to a baby boy in August. He returned to his physical therapy practice, flipping the switch, even as he continued to train for the next deployment and to remember his dead friends.

"Thinking about that stuff sucks," Taylor said. "Really, it's a crapshoot. Some end up winners and some end up losers."August: Louisville

The day the Marines returned to Columbus, when legions of Ohioans embraced them, Jason Dominguez drove to the grave of a friend, Andre Williams. To his surprise and dismay, he felt nothing.

"I was so frustrated. One of my buddies from my squad was lying there, and I couldn't feel a thing," Dominguez said. "I went to Arlington and five of our guys are there. Same thing."

Dominguez never looked at the clippings that friends had saved for him. He chose not to open the trunk holding his Iraq gear, still dusted with desert sand and flecked with blood. He threw himself into his Capitol Hill job and later campaign work, in part to avoid remembering.

For months, through intense stretches, Dominguez held things together. Some nights, he would stare at the ceiling, only to fall asleep and struggle to wake up. On the worst nights, when he felt a powerful urge to be drunk, he willed himself to stay sober.

The last weekend in August, he drove south by himself to Louisville to see Sgt. David N. Wimberg's grave.

"I'm there to pay my respects, but man, something happened to me. I just dropped to my knees, wrapped my arms around his headstone and started bawling like a baby."

"It was bad," Dominguez said, "but it was good."Summer: Reconnected

When Guy Zierk was in Iraq, a former girlfriend began sending e-mails. Her name was Kelly Koby, and when they were together, long before the Iraq deployment, she was not ready for a long-term romance. But she wrote to Zierk in Iraq, and he sent war soundings.

"I thought things were going to get easier as we come closer to our return date . . . but they haven't," Zierk wrote. "We've taken a few losses . . . and it's messing with me a bit. I just need to get my head in the game and things here are just making it difficult for me."

Zierk was dating another woman when he left for the war, but he ended that relationship soon after his return. Still, Koby did not hear from him. She held back, saying later, "I knew he needed to come to me on his own terms."

Seven weeks later, the telephone rang one night at Koby's apartment. Zierk wanted to pull his life together. To be, in Marine-speak, good to go.

Within four days, he told Koby he wanted to marry her.

Koby, a 27-year-old elementary school teacher, remembers glimpses of the world Zierk had not wanted her to see. He struggled in his sleep. A wine bottle crashed to the floor and he jumped. He sometimes seemed distant.

"Those guys are always with him, who didn't come back," Koby said. "It's not just a job to him, it's a sense of being. It is who he is. He is a war fighter."

Sometimes, back in school at Ohio State, Zierk is hungry to return to Iraq, to finish the battle and to lead Marines who understand and care. He is considering a new round of Officer Candidates School but has also taken the Columbus firefighting exam, thinking it may be time to stay close to home.

For days, he ignores his ringing cellphone and withdraws into solitary projects, most recently woodworking and an Iraq video montage. He falls into conversation with Marine friends about Iraq and life. The nightmares that shook him awake are ebbing. He feels more at ease than the Marine who nearly lost his cool and shot an Iraqi teenager.

One mellow evening in Gallipolis, Guy Zierk and Kelly Koby were married on a green lawn near the fast-flowing Ohio River. He wore his Marine uniform, and she wore a grand white dress. Together they passed beneath the raised swords of 10 Lima Company Marines, warriors home from Iraq.

They entertained their guests beneath a white tent, setting aside an empty chair and a black-shrouded table for the fallen. On the table was a lemon, for the bitter memory of loss. Salt, for dried tears. An overturned wine glass, for toasts no longer shared. And a rose, for love.

More than anything or anyone, it was Koby who helped Zierk get back on track.

"It's having her with me when I'm having a bad night," he said. "She's good to go."

DOJ_NMG_0087750

While guests danced and friends told tales as they worked their way through the 32 cases of beer on ice, Zierk thought about being home, far from the war being fought on the Euphrates. He could hardly complain on this, of all nights.

"Yeah," he said, "but I still wish I were there."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dodging Taxes Is A New Wrinkle In The Stock Options Game (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

In the latest twist in the stock options game, some executives may have changed the so-called exercise date — the date options can be converted to stock — to avoid paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in income tax, federal investigators say.

That appears to be what happened at Symbol Technologies and Mercury Interactive, and federal securities regulators are now sifting through options data at other companies for evidence of similar tax-avoidance schemes.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's stock options inquiry has so far focused on the practice of pushing back the grant date on stock options, which can guarantee profits when the grants are exercised. Its interest in exercise dates may signal an emerging front in its widening investigation into stock option abuses at more than 100 companies, from Silicon Valley start-ups to well-known giants like Apple Computer and UnitedHealth Group. The Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service are separately examining dozens of companies.

As those cases have progressed, at least 46 executives and directors have been ousted from their positions. Companies have taken charges totaling $5.3 billion to account for the impact of improper grants, according to Glass Lewis & Company, a research firm that advises big investors on shareholder issues.

And further investigations, indictments and restatements are expected. Securities regulators are now focusing on several cases where it appears the exercise dates of the options were backdated, according to a senior S.E.C. enforcement official, who asked not to be identified because of the agency's policy of not commenting on active cases. Besides raising disclosure and accounting problems, backdating an exercise date can result in tax fraud.

"Tax avoidance is a big issue," said Marc A. Siegel, research director of the Center for Financial Research and Analysis, an independent forensic accounting advisory firm in Rockville, Md. "There is no real excuse for intentionally trying to misreport an exercise date."

An option grant gives the holder the right to buy shares of stock in the future at a predetermined "exercise" price. If the current market price is higher than the price at which the option was granted, the option holder captures the gain. Profits from options are subject to income tax when the options are exercised.

Backdating an exercise date can reduce that tax burden. By reporting an exercise date with a lower price than the date on which the options were acquired, executives may understate their gains and lower their income tax. It may also cause their companies to take improper tax deductions, leading to reporting problems down the road.

In other cases, executives can benefit by reporting an exercise date with a higher price than the one on which the options were acquired. Instead of acquiring their new shares with cash, executives sometimes use stock to pay the cost of converting their options, including the taxes on the profits. A higher market price means that the executive needs fewer shares to pay those costs.

As with backdated grants, improper adjustments of exercise dates are most likely to have taken place during the dot-com boom of the 1990s and to have subsided in 2002, when more stringent reporting requirements were introduced. And, as with the backdating inquiry, it appears that federal investigators are combing through data to identify patterns, where executives consistently exercised their stock options at a favorable price, like a monthly or quarterly low. In suspicious cases, investigators may follow up by requesting brokerage firm records and other transaction documents from companies to see if the actual and reported exercise dates match up.

Because backdating exercise prices involves false financial reporting and improper accounting, the cases fall under the S.E.C.'s oversight. But in similar investigations, S.E.C officials have alerted the Internal Revenue Service of possible tax issues in the securities cases they were examining.

The practice of backdating exercise prices first emerged in two of the first investigations into improper options practices. Both Christopher Cox, the S.E.C. chairman, and Linda Chatman Thomsen, the agency's enforcement director, cited the abuse in their testimony before Congress last month.

In 2004, as part of a broader case of accounting fraud, the Justice Department and the S.E.C. accused several former executives at Symbol Technologies, a producer of bar code equipment, of manipulating their option exercise dates.

Federal prosecutors and regulators accused Leonard Goldner, Symbol's former general counsel, of devising a plan that let him and a handful of other senior executives push back the option exercise dates on the filings used to report stock acquisitions, without the knowledge of the company's board or shareholders.

Rather than report the actual exercise dates, they could choose the most advantageous date from among the preceding 30 days to come up with a lower exercise price, according to court filings. This so-called look-back practice allowed Symbol's senior executives to avoiding paying hundreds of thousands in income taxes, court filings claim.

Consider the case of Kenneth V. Jaeggi, Symbol's former chief financial officer. On June 9, 2000, Mr. Jaeggi signed a securities filing stating that he had exercised 101,250 stock options in late May, at the second-lowest price for Symbol shares in the preceding 30 days. In fact, government prosecutors testified in court that that the options were never actually exercised until they were paid for on June 30.

Instead of Mr. Jaeggi's actual gain of $4.48 million, the gain reported to the I.R.S. was $3.02 million — a difference of $1.46 million, according to Frank Stamm, an I.R.S agent who testified as a government witness. The result was that Mr. Jaeggi avoided paying more than $596,000 in taxes in 2000, according Mr. Stamm's testimony.

Mr. Goldner, the Symbol general counsel, pleaded guilty to conspiring to obstruct the I.R.S. from collecting income tax in June 2004 and forfeited $2 million; he also settled the civil charges with the S.E.C. Mr. Jaeggi pleaded not guilty to the fraud charges, and his lawyer, Steven F. Molo, denied that his client had acted improperly. "He didn't look back. He didn't do anything wrong," Mr. Molo said. "The government failed to prove any illegality because there was none."

The jury could not reach a verdict in the initial trial earlier this year, and Mr. Jaeggi, along with several other Symbol executives, is awaiting a second court trial next spring. Symbol, which Motorola agreed to acquire last month, paid a $37 million penalty in 2004 to resolve a number of civil accounting fraud charges.

More recently, Mercury Interactive, a software testing company based in Mountain View, Calif., acknowledged that backdated exercises were among a variety of stock option abuses identified in an internal investigation, which led to the removal of several of the company's top officers.

Mercury investigators found at least three occasions when it appeared that Amnon Landan, the company's former chief executive, and several other former top managers reported "a date that differed from the date at which the exercise actually happened," according to an update in the company's annual report. That difference "reduced the executives' taxable income significantly and exposed the company to possible penalties for failure to pay withholding taxes."

A Mercury spokesman declined to comment, as did Jonathan M. Cohen, a lawyer for Mr. Landan. In September, Mercury proposed paying $35 million to resolve the S.E.C.'s charges related to its stock options practices. And in regulatory filings this month, the company said that it was discussing settlement terms with the I.R.S. and cooperating with the Justice Department. Mercury agreed to sell itself this summer to Hewlett-Packard in a $4.5 billion deal with that has faced several delays.

Some lawyers who have been hired by companies as outside investigators said they did not currently expect backdated exercises to become a widespread issue.

Reviewing exercise dates for past option grants, however, is not currently a standard part of the internal investigations that at least 153 companies have acknowledged so far. And new accounting guidelines released in July do not direct auditors to give greater scrutiny to exercise dates. "I know the investigators are aware of this gambit," said William D. Sherman, a partner at Morrison & Foerster in Palo Alto, Calif., which is involved in several investigations. "But by and large," he added, "we not finding much of it."

But Mr. Siegel of the Center for Financial Research and Analysis said that it would not surprise him if investigations into the backdating of exercise dates became a bigger deal. "The whole thing about backdating was that you were in the world of the Internet bubble," he said. "You had inadequate internal controls, a high incentive to make the options package lucrative, war for talent and low regulatory presence. It wouldn't surprise me if both the grants and exercise dates got misreported."

Treasury Trading Draws Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating whether UBS AG was involved in improper manipulation of Treasury-securities prices. And a Credit Suisse Group bond trader has left the firm amid broad regulatory scrutiny of the $4 trillion Treasury market, people familiar with the matters say.

The developments mark potentially important steps in a government inquiry into trading in the Treasury market that has been quietly unfolding for several weeks.

The Treasury Department is especially sensitive to trading in the huge market for its bonds, notes and bills. It depends on selling these securities to raise cash to finance the budget deficit, and the Federal Reserve uses Treasury securities to conduct monetary policy. The market is generally seen as among the most efficient in the world. But if it becomes viewed as unruly or tilted against any group of investors, it could drive away investors.

Last month, in a speech to the Bond Market Association, a Treasury official expressed concern that Treasury-securities prices were possibly being manipulated. The activity involved traders' controlling the supply of certain Treasury issues, making it hard for others to obtain them, and then profiting by lending those securities out at favorable interest rates. James Clouse, deputy assistant secretary for federal finance, said he was concerned about trading in the bonds and notes themselves, in futures markets and in other corners of the market.

Any improper activity doesn't seem to have had a big impact on interest rates, which remain quite low. And many dealers counter that the practices under question often occur as part of normal trading activity. But regulators aren't taking it lightly.

Mr. Clouse said the matter had been referred to the SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Nov. 6, officials from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York will meet with 22 big bond dealers to discuss these concerns.

Regulators have occasionally cracked down on Treasury-market misdeeds. In the early 1990s, Salomon Brothers was caught skirting rules at Treasury-bond auctions, and its top executives -- some of Wall Street's most prominent figures -- were forced to step down. A Goldman Sachs Group Inc. economist was jailed for relaying an insider tip about Treasury bonds in October 2001 that allowed Goldman to earn millions of dollars in trading profits.

It isn't clear whether the current probe will lead to such serious fallout. "UBS is cooperating in the government's investigation," a spokesman for the firm said.

The Credit Suisse trader, Thomas Brown, born in 1962, couldn't be reached. Credit Suisse's trading is being scrutinized by regulators, according to a person familiar with the matter, but it isn't clear which federal agency is conducting that scrutiny. A Credit Suisse spokeswoman declined to comment.

The investigation of UBS involves trading activity that took place in February of this year, people familiar with the matter say. It isn't clear which Treasury issues are being probed by the SEC. But one possibility is a five-year Treasury note due in January 2011, with a coupon that pays annual interest of 4.25%. It was in especially short supply that month.

When Treasury notes are in short supply, holders of the securities can profit by using them as collateral for loans in a market called the repurchase, or repo, market. In the repo business, bond dealers and investors effectively swap Treasurys for cash. Traders who hold highly sought-after Treasury issues can profit by getting the cash at a very low interest rate. Regulators are concerned that traders might be intentionally squeezing supply to profit this way.

In the case of the January 2011 note, the security was in such high demand in mid-February that its holders could use it as collateral on cash loans and pay interest of just 0.25% in return, according to data from a GovPX, a unit of interbroker dealer ICAP PLC. The going rate at the time was more than 4%

Credit Suisse's Mr. Brown left the firm Sept. 29, according to a filing with regulators. He was part of the bank's repo team, according to another filing. Mr. Brown's activities, Credit Suisse told regulators, related to trading in two-year notes. The firm added in its filing that he was allowed to resign because of matters related to that trading.

Credit Suisse declined to provide details on the trading. It also declined to provide contact details for Mr. Brown, or to say whether Mr. Brown had a lawyer who could be contacted.

It is unclear whether the trader was trying to generate a profit for Credit Suisse or for a client of the firm. It is also unclear whether any other Credit Suisse traders were involved in the trading that led to his departure, how large the positions were or whether any issues besides two-year notes were involved.

In recent weeks, after the Treasury discussed the potential problems in the market, traders say there has been a decline in the number of securities in short supply. That has eased pressures on the market and raised questions about whether the extra scrutiny forced some traders to clean up their activities.

One senior bond trader familiar with the concerns of regulators says officials also have been worried about whether hedge funds or other investors were asking brokers to take certain securities off the market, to make certain positions more valuable.

"The games haven't changed in 15 years," says Michael Basham, who oversaw the Treasury's debt-management activities during the Salomon affair.

Bond traders say there could be many legitimate explanations for the bond shortages' driving price movements. Some bond issues become very popular in the normal course of business. Moreover, some foreign investors buy and hold large amounts of Treasury securities, reducing the supply. Others traders complain of the lack of clear rules to delineate what traders can do.

Is The U.S. Losing Ground? By R. GLENN HUBBARD And JOHN L. THORNTON (WSJ)

Corporate scandals over the past five years have fittingly brought the integrity of U.S. capital markets under scrutiny, provoking a significant legislative and regulatory response. The response was intended to strengthen protections for investors and to improve the traditional advantages of the U.S. market-transparency and accuracy in accounting and financial reporting, as well as laws and regulations that provide the proper incentives for good corporate governance. The events and the responses to them are as great as those underlying our bedrock securities laws of the 1930s.

Among other benefits from the regulatory changes of recent years are improved transparency and accuracy in accounting and financial reporting -- traditional advantages of the U.S. market. Yet many participants in the capital markets have raised important questions. What is the effect of regulation on the efficiency of our capital markets? Do changes to the legal underpinnings of capital markets always incorporate evaluation of benefits and costs? Are we taking actions that unintentionally make our capital markets less competitive in the global economy? * * *

The efficiency and competitiveness of our public capital markets as well as the safeguards for investors in these markets are essential to the vibrancy and resiliency of the U.S. economy. Issuers gain access to a lower cost of capital for growth. Investors benefit from liquidity and efficiency in pricing of securities. And well-developed capital markets are directly related to growth in productivity and greater employment opportunities across the whole of our economic spectrum. It is a virtuous cycle that attracts more capital to the U.S. public capital markets.

Since the 1930s, emphasis on rigorous financial disclosures and robust enforcement has protected investors and promoted confidence that is critical to the efficient functioning of our capital markets. U.S. and many foreign companies have generally concluded that the costs of access to our markets have been offset by the tangible benefits.

Corporate scandals early in this decade, such as Enron and WorldCom, which involved fraud and accounting irregularities, weakened investors' trust in the integrity of U.S. capital markets. Investors responded with lower valuations of securities as these risks were factored in to the cost of capital. There was also a legislative response. In particular, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 was the most substantial securities legislation since the Securities Acts of 1933 and 1934. The act created the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) to oversee the audit profession; it required corporate leaders to personally certify the firm's financial statements; and it required that auditors certify the firm's internal controls (the statute's now famous Section 404).

Sarbanes-Oxley offers enhanced benefits of transparency, accountability and investor protection, and thus strengthens our capital markets. But many have asked whether Sarbanes-Oxley reflects an evaluation of benefits and costs. Some critics believe that certain aspects of the legislation may have the unintended effect of making our markets less efficient venues for raising capital.

And questions remain as to whether the conflict-of-interest issues emphasized by Sarbanes-Oxley Section 404 got at the bigger problems from an economic perspective. There is a need to consider more seriously the role played by takeover mechanisms -- and the market -- in matters of corporate control and shareholder rights.

Since the new regulatory mechanisms have been put in place, developments in the U.S. capital market have not been positive. In 2000, 90% of the funds raised by foreign companies through new stock offerings were raised in the U.S. The "90% rule" held in 2005, too, but in reverse -- 90% of the funds raised by foreign firms through new listings occurred in Europe and other non-U.S. markets. Last year, only two of the world's 25 largest initial public offerings listed in the U.S.

In the universe of global IPOs, the fraction of non-U.S. IPOs listed in the U.S. has fallen to under 10% so far in 2006 from 37% in 2000. And these figures are not likely to be simply capturing a current shift in the global economic center of gravity toward Asia. If one removes IPOs from China and Russia, for example, the declines in foreign firms' U.S. listings by number and value are similar. Concerns about listing in the U.S. relate to domestic firms too, as U.S. firms contemplate "going private" or do not "go public" for regulatory and legal reasons.

While global economic growth and a welcome trend toward financial reform have put wind in the sails of overseas financial centers, could U.S. capital market regulation also be a factor in their increased competitiveness? There is historical evidence that suggests it could be. In the 1960s, U.S. banks went to London and helped spur the growth of the Eurobond market because of interest-rate ceilings and reserve requirements at home. U.S. regulators subsequently allowed international banking facilities with lower reserve requirements and abolished Regulation Q ceilings on interest rates, but the London market had already taken off. The Eurobond market also drew sustenance from U.S. tax policy in the form of the interest equalization tax. Subsequent tax changes did not slow down that market's development once started. Are we seeing similar market shifts with diminished interest in U.S. listings, the NYSE's overtures to Europe and Nasdaq's interest in London?

In addition to regulation and accounting standards, the liability system can also affect the competitiveness of U.S. markets. Firms are sometimes confronted with circumstances in litigation, including securities class-action suits, where even a small probability of loss, given the size of claims, could result in bankruptcy. Consequently, companies often must agree to large settlements that result in reduced value for shareholders rather than pursuing a successful outcome on the merits of its case. Further, public companies are exposed to criminal prosecution which can lead to the collapse of the firm, as witnessed in the case of Arthur Andersen. Such a system rightly punishes the managers who have violated the rules. But it may also punish innocent parties -- employees, shareholders and the many firms who had conducted legitimate and profitable business relations with the now defunct enterprise. Do these dynamics have an effect on companies' willingness to issue securities in U.S. capital markets? * * *

We announced on Sept. 12 the formation of a Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, an independent and nonpartisan group of academic, business, financial and corporate governance leaders. Our committee, working through task forces that will include additional academic and business leaders, is conducting a study of the competitiveness of U.S. public capital market, taking into account questions of investor confidence, liquidity, cost of capital and costs of regulation borne by shareholders directly or the economy as a whole. Our goal is to provide carefully considered recommendations for adjustments to the current regulatory and liability framework. On Nov. 30, we will issue our first report to policy makers.

The work of our committee is proceeding along three paths. First, the committee is synthesizing research by economists and legal scholars on a range of regulatory and liability issues affecting the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. Second, the committee is integrating research on the measurement of benefits and costs of regulatory interventions. And third, the committee is evaluating alternative recommendations for applying cost-benefit analysis in assessing financial regulation and its benefits and costs for the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. The committee will also evaluate principle- and risk-based alternatives to the present "rules-based" regulatory approach in order to understand how such mechanisms might affect the way managers incorporate the spirit and intent of financial regulations, as well as following the technical rules.

Rolling back the Sarbanes-Oxley law wholesale is not the answer. But subjecting regulation to rigorous cost-benefit analysis is surely right. Though much of the regulatory scrutiny will lie with the SEC and the PCAOB, we can also harness the expertise within other departments and agencies represented in the President's Working Group on Financial Markets, which includes the Department of Treasury, Federal Reserve and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Input from such institutions that have primary responsibility for investor protection will be necessary to prudently address broad tradeoffs between regulation and possible consequences of lost competitiveness.

America's capital markets have been an enviable model for job creation and increasing national wealth. But the efficiency and competitiveness of our markets cannot be taken for granted. Cost-benefit analysis of regulatory change may provide insights that could enhance the efficiency of our markets and strengthen investor protection at the same time. We should explore ideas that can help assure that new regulation does not inadvertently diminish the benefits of our markets by not accounting for regulatory costs.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jemal Jumps Right Back In (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

For seven weeks, Douglas Jemal showed up in federal court in a conservative suit, white dress shirt, tie and polished black shoes.

On Friday, the 63-year-old maverick builder returned to running his business full time, a day after his acquittal on bribery and conspiracy charges. Settled into his funky office in the heart of Chinatown -- with two parrots, three aquariums, a wall-mounted moose head and a full bar -- he was back in his usual jeans, a collarless oatmeal-colored shirt and black cowboy boots.

"It's nice to have a public vindication," he said between calls of congratulation. "I'm very happy to be back at work. I'm very happy that I'm not sitting in a courtroom in a suit. And I'm very happy to be myself again."

Jemal was found guilty of one of the charges against him, wire fraud. His son, Norman, was acquitted of all charges, and a top lieutenant, Blake Esherick, was found guilty on one count of wire fraud and two counts of tax evasion.

Jemal "is making it seem like he got off, but in fact he got convicted of a felony," said Jeffrey A. Taylor, U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia. "Our view is this was a significant victory in a tough, hard-fought case."

The wire fraud charge, Taylor said, was "the most serious of the charges . . . because it has the highest statutory maximum of prison time" -- 20 years. Under federal sentencing guidelines, Jemal's sentence could be much lighter, possibly nothing more than probation. But Taylor said "it is certainly conceivable he will receive prison time." Sentencing is scheduled for April 16.

Jemal declined to say how he would run his business if he has to go to prison.

The developer's lawyers say they will try to get the conviction overturned. Jemal said of the wire fraud verdict: "It's like stepping on a splinter. It's a little pinch."

A high school dropout from Brooklyn who became one of Washington's premier developers, Jemal is known for closing deals with handshakes and making major buys quickly. In 40 years, he has built a regional real estate portfolio that includes 10 million square feet of office, residential, retail and commercial properties in 185 buildings. He helped revitalize much of the city's East End, turning rundown storefronts into condominiums and shops.

Jemal's reputation wasn't the only thing at stake when he was charged with bribing District official Michael Lorusso in exchange for sweetheart deals. The future of Jemal's Douglas Development Corp. was also in question. Some in the real estate community worried that a conviction on bribery charges would damage his ambitious and wide-ranging projects. Jemal, they say, is the key to his company.

"Douglas Development is Douglas," said Leonard A. Greenberg of Greenhill Capital Corp. in Bethesda, who has done business with Jemal. "He's an entrepreneur extraordinaire."

Jemal has plans to remake a tired-looking block along New York Avenue NW, near the Washington Convention Center, into a vibrant mixed-use development. London architect Norman Foster is working on plans for the Uline Arena near Union Station, which Jemal owns. He envisions turning an area where old oil tanks sit along the Anacostia River into something like Baltimore's Inner Harbor. Jemal says he has at least a dozen more projects in the pipeline.

During the trial, people like Gerry Widdicombe, director of economic development for the Downtown Business Improvement District, worried that those projects might be in danger. "It's important to the city that he's been a venture capitalist, going to places others haven't gone," Widdicombe said. "That would be a risk-taker that would be lost."

Jemal said he didn't stop running his business during his trial, although he had to pass on a few deals. "I had too much on my plate," he said. He says he has no plans to slow down and doesn't expect businesspeople to shun him.

"Morgan Stanley and others said they'd still do business with me because we're not crooks," he said. "You can't build a company if you're crooks. You can't go back to that well that many times."

He pointed to a line of credit he got from Cardinal Bank after he was charged that allowed him to close a few days into his trial on a $15 million deal on F Street NW. He got two loans totaling $188 million from New York-based Gramercy Capital Corp. this year.

"We've had no problem getting financing and getting loans," Jemal said. "It's a large testament to us."

Despite the wire fraud conviction, the feeling at City Hall was that Jemal had beaten the rap.

"It was a major wrongdoing," said D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), who spearheaded the public investigation into Jemal's dealings with Lorusso.

But Graham did not take issue with the result of the trial. "I'm not happy or unhappy with the jury decision," he said. "It's fact. He's entitled to a trial by a jury of his peers. I hope that he's able to reconstruct his life and continue to serve all the interests he works for. He's done a lot of good things for the city."

Council member Carol Schwartz (R-At Large), who was also involved in the investigation of Jemal and his ties to Lorusso, said, "I just hope in the future that all people who are going to do business with our government and those who work for the government are on notice to make sure they act properly, or they will be prosecuted. "

As for Jemal, he's still got five suits, 12 dress shirts, six ties and 12 pairs of dark socks that he bought from Brooks Brothers for the trial.

"Maybe I'll have a raffle or give them away," he said.

GOP Leader Says He Would've Canned Foley (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin

AP, October 30, 2006

House Majority Leader John Boehner says he might have taken matters into his own hands if he or any GOP leader had known about ex-Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit instant messages to former pages.

"Foley's conduct was reprehensible, abhorrent. And if any one of us would have known about this, we would have dragged him out of there by his tie," said Boehner, the current No. 2 leader in the House.

Boehner, R-Ohio, maintains he told Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., last spring about Foley's too-friendly e-mails to pages and was informed the matter was being handled.

"I believe strongly that the speaker — neither the speaker, myself or anyone knew of the sexually explicit instant messages," Boehner said. "All I was told was that there had been contact between Foley and the former page. ... I believe that I talked to the speaker about this. I believe that he told me it had been taken care of."

There has been no indication that Republican leaders knew of the sexually explicit instant messages to former male pages until the scandal became public and Foley, R-Fla., resigned at the end of the September.

Boehner and a second GOP House leader, campaign chairman Tom Reynolds of New York, have said that before then they were aware only of Foley's e-mails to a former Louisiana page. Those messages asked about the 16-year-old's birthday and requested a picture.

Boehner, interviewed Sunday on ABC's "This Week," said the Foley matter was one of hundreds he dealt with daily in the House, and he was hopeful an internal House probe will be resolved soon.

"I'm on the House floor as a majority leader, I'm having hundreds of conversations every day with Democrats and Republicans, trying to run the House," Boehner said. "The House ethics committee is doing a very good investigation in a bipartisan way. I was happy to meet with them, and I believe that they'll have a report coming soon."

The committee has interviewed 21 witnesses behind closed doors since Oct. 11, but there is no indication anything can be resolved before the Nov. 7 elections.

Prisons Eye Ways To Control Gangs (WT/AP)

By Brian Witte

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

BALTIMORE -- With gang violence increasing and prison safety harder to maintain, Maryland corrections officials are searching for better ways to manage incarcerated gang members, including confining members of the same gang in a separate prison unit.

John A. Rowley, acting commissioner of the state's Division of Correction, recently sent corrections officials to Connecticut, which has a nationally recognized program for managing gangs in prison.

Mr. Rowley has scheduled a meeting this week to discuss the program, but said the agency has yet to commit to a plan.

Mr. Rowley said he sent the officials because Connecticut's corrections department created a gang-management program in 1994, after realizing just how dangerous and difficult gang members had become inside the state's prisons.

In Maryland, officials have implemented a new measure to reduce prison gang violence at the medium-security Maryland Correctional Training Center, near Hagerstown. The facility started confining inmates together "a few months ago," after they were identified as members of the same gang, Mr. Rowley said.

"What they're attempting to do is to simply, to the best of their ability, house them together to see if that improves or reduces the violence," he said.

Officials are only trying out the policy, Mr. Rowley said, and there is no plan yet to incorporate it statewide.

Maryland does not send all incarcerated members of a particular gang to the same prison, a technique that has been tried in other states.

Mr. Rowley said he also wants to increase training for corrections officers so they can recognize gang activity.

Maryland's correctional institutions have been using intelligence officers in roughly the past 18 months to track gang activity in prisons. Mr. Rowley said the practice has been effective and that he wants to add more staff.

The changes come as Maryland prisons experienced increased violence, including the deaths this year of two corrections officers who were killed by inmates.

A hit list that surfaced in 2004 was addressed to members of the Bloods gang inside the Eastern Correctional Institution. It offered inmates tens of thousands of dollars for killing a former warden and nine corrections officers.

Officer David McGuinn apparently was killed by two inmates inside the Maryland House of Correction in July. Mr. Rowley declined to comment on whether Officer McGuinn was on a hit list.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican running for re-election, said in August one theory is that the slaying was connected to gang violence.

The rate of assaults on corrections officers in the state's maximum-security prisons nearly doubled from about 3.4 per 100 inmates in 2004 to 6.6 in 2005, according to the state's nonpartisan Department of Legislative Services.

Maj. Priscilla Doggett, a Maryland Division of Correction spokeswoman, said it's unclear how many bona fide gang members are incarcerated in Maryland prisons.

Report Says Crime Makes St. Louis Most Dangerous U.S. City (AP)

By Christopher Leonard

AP, October 30, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Just days after the St. Louis Cardinals won the top honor in Major League Baseball, their hometown jumped to first place on a list no one wants to lead: the most dangerous cities in the United States.

This Midwestern city has long been in the upper tiers of the annual ranking of the nation's safest and most dangerous cities, compiled by Morgan Quitno Press. Violent crime surged nearly 20 percent there from 2004 to last year, when the rate of such crimes rose much faster in the Midwest than in the rest of nation, according to FBI figures released in June.

"It's just sad the way this city is," resident Sam Dawson said. "On the news you hear killings, someone's been shot."

The ranking, being released Monday, came as the city was still celebrating Friday's World Series victory at the new Busch Stadium. St. Louis has been spending millions of dollars on urban renewal even as the crime rate climbs.

Mayor Francis Slay did not return calls to his office seeking comment Sunday.

Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno Press, a private research and publishing company specializing in state and city reference books, said he was not surprised to see St. Louis top the list, since it has been among the 10 most dangerous cities for years.

Morgan said the study looks at crime only within St. Louis city limits, with a population of about 330,000. It doesn't take into account the suburbs in St. Louis County, which has roughly 980,000 residents.

The safest city in 2005 was Brick, N.J., population about 78,000, followed by Amherst, N.Y., and Mission Viejo, Calif. The second most dangerous city was Detroit, followed by Flint, Mich., and Compton, Calif.

Cities are ranked based on more than just their crime rate, Morgan said. Individual crimes such as rape or burglary are measured separately, compared with national averages and then compiled to give a city its ranking. Crimes are weighted based on their danger to people.

The national FBI figures released in June showed the murder rate in St. Louis jumped 16 percent from 2004 to 2005, compared with 4.8 percent nationally. The overall violent crime rate increased nearly 20 percent, compared with 2.5 percent nationally.

While crime increased in all regions last year, the 5.7 percent rise in the 12 Midwestern states was at least three times higher than any other region, according to the FBI.

Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest.

Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods.

This year's ranking was good news for Camden, N.J., which in 2005 was named the most dangerous city for the second year in a row.

Camden Mayor Gwendolyn Faison said Sunday she was thrilled to learn that her city no longer topped the most-dangerous list.

"You made my day!" said Faison, who has served since 2000. "There's a new hope and a new spirit."

Four More Sentenced In Mortgage Scheme (RRS)

Rockford (IL) Register Star, October 30, 2006

ROCKFORD — The last four people to be brought before a U.S. district judge on charges of defrauding the federal government out of more than $1 million in connection with the Federal Housing Authority's mortgage-insurance program were sentenced Thursday and Friday.

According to a news release from the U.S. Justice Department, the charges the defendants pled guilty to were part of a 61-count indictment charging the people with conspiring to defraud the government, making material false statements to HUD, and making false statements to cause HUD to insure mortgage loans.

According to the indictment, the leaders of the scheme profited by selling homes in Freeport at inflated prices.

The indictment states that the defendants falsified many documents to get FHA insured loans for unqualified homebuyers. By causing these unqualified buyers to receive FHA insured loans, the indictment says the defendants bilked the federal government out of more than $1 million.

Sentenced were:

Philip R. Miskimon, 50, of Winslow, 7½ years in federal prison without parole, and three years of supervised release. The court also ordered Miskimon to pay $2,658,135.32 in restitution.

Douglas L. Hastings, 41, of Lena, seven months in federal prison without parole, followed by three months of house arrest with electronic monitoring and three years of supervised release. He has been ordered by the court to pay $109,576.63 in restitution.

Price V. Brooks, 51, of Freeport, 13 months in federal prison without parole, to be followed by three years of supervised release. Brooks has been ordered to pay $89,710.04 in restitution.

Julie A. Smith, 48, of Lena, 2½ years of house arrest and three years' probation. Smith has been ordered to pay $368,527.84 in restitution.

The other people arrested and sentenced:

Edward J. Martins, 41, of Lena; Shawn M. Fleming, 22, of Freeport; Akia A. Sanders, 24, of Freeport;

Dale L. Nelson, 50, of Freeport; Todd P. Ernst, 46, of Freeport; Chad J. Nicks, 31, of Freeport; Tasha M. Thompson, also known as Tasha M. Barnes, 26, Freeport; Jeffrey L. Meyer, 52, of Winslow; Alexandrea M. Ellis, 23, of Freeport; Brian A. Fox, 36, of Freeport; and Adam L. Ernst, 22, of Freeport.

D.C. Paid For Training Schools Say Didn't Occur (WP)

By V. Dion Haynes

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

In September 2005, Equal Access in Education billed the city $76,250 to train math and reading teachers in techniques to boost student performance at five D.C. public charter schools that failed to meet academic targets.

But principals at four of the schools (the fifth one has closed) say that they never heard of Equal Access and that their teachers never received training from the company.

"It boggles my mind that this could have happened," said Norman Johnson, executive director of Integrated Design & Electronics Academy Public Charter School (IDEA) in Northeast Washington. "We certainly needed those services."

Federal authorities are investigating whether Equal Access was connected to Brenda L. Belton, the former executive director of the Board of Education's charter schools office. The company submitted invoices requesting that payments be sent to 26 Underwood Pl. NW, the address of a duplex formerly owned by Belton and currently owned by her daughter Lindsay Holmes. In May, the FBI raided Belton's office and home as well as the Underwood Place property as part of its investigation into the possible misuse of public funds by the board's charter school oversight office.

Documents obtained by The Washington Post through the Freedom of Information Act show that Equal Access charged the city at least $395,000 between 2002 and 2006 to monitor charter schools to ensure they were meeting financial and academic targets and to provide teacher training. One Equal Access invoice indicated that in addition to the IDEA charter school, four other charter schools -- Booker T. Washington in Northwest, Elsie Whitlow Stokes in Northwest, Options in Northeast and the now-closed Jos-Arz Therapeutic in Northeast -- had received training services. But officials at the three open schools said Equal Access was not one of their vendors.

In some of the documents requesting payments, Equal Access did not specify which schools were supposed to have received the services.

"I think everybody associated with this mess should pass 'Go' and go straight to jail," school board President Peggy Cooper Cafritz said when told about the five schools that did not receive services detailed in invoices from Equal Access.

Next month, Cafritz said, the school board will consider hiring a university or a nonprofit group to manage the 18 charter schools it currently oversees.

According to school and city officials who are seeking answers about the charter funds, Belton, who was fired this month, had worked without many of the checks and balances imposed on other agency executives.

The school board gave Belton, who at times supervised five employees, broad authority to issue hundreds of thousands of dollars in contracts to consultants to monitor the schools under the school board's charge and to help those failing to meet academic targets. For many of those contracts, Belton used a special school system fund that allowed her to bypass city regulations that require agencies seeking contract work to put potential vendors through an extensive vetting and bidding process.

For a vendor to be paid, agencies must submit an invoice and a form verifying that the service or merchandise was satisfactorily provided.

"There are no excuses for apparently misappropriating funds or giving funds to consultants without a work product," said D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3), who chairs the education committee and first alerted the school board to a potential problem with Belton. "The board had a responsibility to supervise that office, and the board failed to do so."

Although her office was on the ninth floor of the school system's central administration building, Belton was not part of the system's staff. The 1996 charter school law created a firewall between the independently operated and publicly funded schools and the D.C. school superintendent.

Belton answered only to school board members, part-time supervisors who were rarely around to monitor the office's activities.

DOJ_NMG_0087759

To pay Equal Access and other vendors, Belton used the school system's Central Investment Fund, which accepts donations from individuals and organizations requesting that the money be used for specific purposes, such as purchasing library books and supplies for needy children.

Belton had deposited $200,000, collected from the charter schools to run the board's charter office, into the investment fund. Some of that money was used to pay vendors.

Equal Access received $32,614 from the investment fund in February and $108,759 from the fund between April and July of last year, according to documents from the office of the chief financial officer.

To withdraw the funds, Belton submitted invoices but no documentation from charter school officials confirming that they had received the services, according to Pamela D. Graham, the school system's interim chief financial officer, whose staff administered the fund.

Graham said the investment fund is designed to streamline the payment process so schools can "quickly get access to the money." If the money was in a general fund, she added, "we'd have to have a purchase order, an invoice and a receiving report" verifying that the service or merchandise was provided.

Cafritz said the board allowed Belton to deposit the $200,000 in charter school funds in the investment account to let the office carry over funds from year to year, a privilege not permitted in general accounts.

Natwar M. Gandhi, the city's chief financial officer, cut off the charter school office's access to the investment fund in the spring after learning of the federal investigation.

Patterson said the independent structure under which Belton operated would have worked had the school board properly supervised her.

Cafritz said she and Russell Smith, who until recently was the school board's executive director, tried a few years ago to get Belton to report to Smith. But Belton and the school board resisted, she said.

Last year, two independent studies, including one by the U.S. Government Accountability Office, found that many charter schools were floundering because of improper oversight. The board closed one of those schools, Jos-Arz Therapeutic, a special education facility in which the city invested more than $15 million. The board then established an ad hoc committee to oversee the charter office.

School board member JoAnne Ginsberg, who chairs that committee, said she became fed up with Belton for not showing up for work and for turning in reports that were late and sloppy. She said that she sought to have Belton fired but that Cafritz and the three other members of the committee opposed that.

A few months later, in June, the FBI and other federal officials raided Belton's office, confiscating computers and records. Belton was on paid administrative leave until two weeks ago, when the board voted to fire her.

Cerritos Coach To Pay For Cheating (LBPT CA)

By Wendy Thomas Russell

Long Beach Press-Telegram (CA), October 28, 2006

Courts: Callahan gets 90 days for financial aid fraud; school severs ties with him.

BELLFLOWER - Cerritos College faculty member Patrick Callahan, a man credited with helping numerous minority football players enroll and finish college, bid farewell to his coaching career Friday - the day he was formally sentenced to 90 days in jail in connection with Pell Grant fraud.

Callahan, 58, pleaded guilty to falsifying government documents so that 13 of his football players could receive more than $91,000 in federal aid to which they were not entitled.

Trading in his team colors for a black suit, Callahan was formally sentenced Friday before Bellflower Superior Court's Leland Tipton, who suspended a two-year prison term under a number of conditions. One of the conditions was agreeing to give up his position as coordinator of student activities for Cerritos College.

"Has he terminated his employment?" Tipton asked.

"As of today," Callahan answered.

Callahan served as an assistant coach at Cerritos College in Norwalk for 16 seasons, most recently acting as defensive coordinator, before being charged in August 2005 with 26 felony counts of grand theft and conspiracy to commit grand theft. At the time of his arrest, the college suspended Callahan from coaching and made him coordinator of student activities.

Reached on Friday, a college spokeswoman declined to answer questions about Callahan, nor would she say why the school had chosen to keep him on the faculty following his guilty plea last month.

"We make no comments on personnel issues," Kristen Habbestad said.

Callahan, of Artesia, is accused of placing himself at the center of a scheme to cheat the government out of thousands of dollars so that some of his players could attend college at little or no cost.

Under Pell Grant regulations, students whose parents make more than $20,000 a year and contribute to their child's education receive less money, while students with little or no financial support receive more. Some students who are estranged from their parents, however, can obtain "dependency overrides," which allow them to apply for Pell Grants without providing their parents' financial status.

According to prosecutors, Callahan wrote and encouraged others to write fraudulent letters supporting dependency overrides for his students beginning in 1999. The students were otherwise ineligible because they already had financial support from their parents.

Callahan also recruited players from out of state - a violation of the California Community College Commission on Athletics - and obtained in-state tuition for some out-of-state players, according to court documents.

Callahan's jail term will begin on Nov. 30.

He must pay $70,758 to the U.S. Department of Education, which reflects the amount awarded as a result of fraudulent dependency overrides. And he must pay Cerritos College $20,799, the amount the college lost by charging in-state tuition to out-of-state players.

Fred Falcone, who identified himself as a former Cerritos College student and football player, said Callahan should be provided amnesty for making "a lifetime career of helping disadvantaged students become successful in college."

"He is someone that minority students could go to when they had a problem," Falcone wrote in an e-mail to the Press-Telegram, "and he would help."

Feds Nail Kiddie Porno Cybersleaze (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge

Boston Herald, October 28, 2006

Former Hub student could get life

A former Hub college student once probed for running kiddie porn sites out of a Somerville apartment faces a possible life sentence after being convicted on federal charges of taking sex videos of underage boys - including one from Cape Cod.

Former Bunker Hill Community College student Tim Richards was found guilty on 11 of 22 child pornography charges Thursday in a federal court in Tennessee, one of which stemmed from sex tapes he made with a 14-year-old Bay State boy in Sydney, Australia. The boy, now in his 20s, was the star witness in the two-week trial and testified that he was pressured into making sex tapes with Richards for four years.

“A society can have no greater priority than promoting the safety of its most vulnerable members, especially its children,” said Nashville U.S. Attorney Craig S. Morford. “That is why this case and this verdict is so significant.”

Four of the convictions carry possible life sentences, and another carries a minimum mandatory sentence of 15 years in prison. Richards will be sentenced Jan. 26. He still faces more federal charges while his alleged cohort, former Boston University student Aaron Brown, is awaiting trial on similar charges in Virginia.

Richards, 25, was first investigated by the Massachusetts Attorney General after a 2000 Herald report found that Richards' former company, Nimenet.com, was hosting several kiddie porn sites out of a Somerville apartment. No state charges were ever filed.

The FBI’s Innocent Images anti-child pornography unit got involved in the case in 2005 when a California teen named Justin Berry told authorities Richards posted underage sex pictures of him online. Berry, who did not testify at Richards' trial, became a national symbol of child exploitation after he went public with his sordid tale in The New York Times.

When FBI agents arrested Richards last year, they recovered an extensive cache of kiddie porn and found him living with a 13-year-old boy. He had reportedly been leading a jet-setting lifestyle and is believed to have pulled in as much as $500,000 through the elaborate cyberporn ring.

Kent Kobliska, a former Nimenet employee who testified at Richards' trial, called his former boss' conviction “deserved.”

“It took awhile but justice finally was done,” Kobliska said.

Difficult Sermon As F.B.I. Investigates A Church’s Ex-Music Director (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

GREENWICH, Conn., Oct. 29 — Addressing parishioners the week after they learned that federal agents had searched their church this month for evidence of child pornography on a music director’s computer, the rector of Christ Church here, the Rev. Jeffrey H. Walker, told worshipers on Sunday that “these are hard days, and for some of us, sleepless nights.”

DOJ_NMG_0087761

He pleaded with the Episcopal congregation, which traces its roots back 300 years and counts some of Greenwich's most prominent families among its members, to respond with "patience, trust and kindness." He also apologized for having to be less than forthcoming about certain matters that were part of the pending criminal investigation and the "world of legalities rather than the world of grace."

On Tuesday night, news organizations began reporting that Robert F. Tate, the church's longtime music director and impresario behind its highly-respected choirs, had resigned abruptly after church officials became aware that he might have had child pornography on a computer he used. Church officials would say only that he had resigned.

Mr. Tate, who had an apartment on church grounds but is no longer living there, has not commented publicly. His lawyer, Francis O'Reilly, issued a statement on Wednesday noting: "Mr. Tate adamantly denies these allegations. The facts are that the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been investigating this matter for some time now, and Mr. Tate has not been charged with any offense."

Tim Egan, the head of the F.B.I.'s cybercrimes squad in New Haven, confirmed to The New York Times on Tuesday that his agency was heading an investigation, but he declined further comment, as did the United States attorney's office.

The church has referred all requests for comment to its lawyer, Eugene J. Riccio, who was present on Sunday as Mr. Walker addressed worshipers at the 9 a.m. service. Mr. Riccio declined to discuss anything about the investigation, which is before a grand jury.

Paying homage to Garrison Keillor, Mr. Walker, who himself has appeared before the grand jury, said he would loved to have been able to greet parishioners with a crisp, "Well, it's been a quiet week at Lake Wobegon."

"It just hasn't been," he added. "Not at Christ Church."

He drew parallels between the church's discovery of a problem in its midst some weeks ago and Sunday's Gospel reading, in which a blind beggar of deep faith had his sight restored.

"What happens when we've simply failed to see someone we've loved has been in pain and we just didn't notice?" Mr. Walker said.

"When all of that comes to glaring light," he continued, "all we can say is, 'How could I have been so blind?' "

Old Cattle Crime Rears Its Head Again (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 30, 2006

Some of the nation's largest beef-producing states are fighting a resurgence in a centuries-old crime: cattle rustling.

The thefts, including one high-profile case involving the ranch of baseball legend Nolan Ryan, are directly related to the rising cost of beef, said Larry Gray, enforcement chief with the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers Association (TSCRA).

The TSCRA, which draws its members from Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico, reported $6.2 million in livestock thefts — mostly cattle — in 2005, up from $4 million in 2004.

In the past three to four years, John McBride, a spokesman for the Livestock Marketing Association, said cattle prices have approached all-time highs. "As the cattle industry has escalated, so have the number of thefts," said Joyce English, vice president of the association's Livestock Board of Trade. "Everything follows the money."

Last fall, a flurry of calls from more than a dozen victims, including the foreman of Ryan's Texas ranch, reported 17 cows and 14 calves were missing. A couple of weeks later, an additional 16 calves were stolen from Ryan's spread.

The reports led two investigators with the TSCRA to charge a 27-year-old suspect with running an old-time rustling enterprise valued at more than $250,000 after being in operation a little less than a year. Gray said the suspect allegedly used the livestock, most of which was branded, to bolster his own herd and sold off the calves as they were born. The break in the case came, Gray said, when one of the stolen animals was brought for sale.

Thefts have been a problem in other beef-producing states:

·In Missouri, second only to Texas in cattle production, Gov. Matt Blunt created a special rustling unit in response to a surge in thefts in the southwestern part of the state. Since its creation in February, the unit — aided by a new cattle-theft hotline — has recovered livestock valued at more than $400,000, said Missouri Highway Patrol Sgt. Jason Clark.

Suspects routinely steal trailer loads from one county and deposit them in another — sometimes two or three counties away. A routine loss of 15 to 20 cows valued at up to $20,000 can be "devastating to some ranchers," Clark said.

·In Kansas, the Kansas Cattlemen's Association has been "overwhelmed" with theft reports in the past year, said association spokeswoman Lynae Beam. The organization has fielded more than two dozen calls from ranchers.

Fifteen of the reports are classified as "very serious" rustling cases, involving more than five animals valued at up to $1,300 per animal, Beam said.

"About 10 to 20 years ago, we thought this type of thing was fading away," Beam said. "Now, it sure is coming back."

Justices To Take Up Autism-Case Dispute (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 (AP) — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to consider an appeal by an autistic child and his parents, who want to sue over his school accommodations without hiring a lawyer.

The parents, Jeff and Sandee Winkelman, say they cannot afford a lawyer to argue their court case against the school district of Parma, Ohio, near Cleveland, over the education of their son, Jacob.

The federal appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Winkelmans, suing under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, had to find a lawyer to represent Jacob, although other federal courts have ruled differently in cases involving that law.

The Bush administration then urged the justices to take the case, saying that in adopting the measure, Congress clearly intended that parents be able to represent their children in such court proceedings.

The Winkelmans' suit contested Parma's plan to educate Jacob at a public school. They wanted the district to pay his yearly tuition of $56,000 at a private school that specializes in educating autistic children.

Whether Jacob should have private schooling at public expense is not before the justices, only the question of his parents' right to go into federal court without a lawyer.

The justices also agreed Friday to hear the case of a sheriff's deputy in Georgia who purposely bumped his car into a vehicle he was pursuing at high speed, causing an accident that left the suspect a quadriplegic.

The Sheriff's Office of Coweta County, Ga., had asked the court to consider whether an officer violates a fleeing suspect's constitutional rights by using deadly force to terminate a high-speed chase.

Two lower federal courts ruled against the deputy, finding that his action was out of proportion to the risk that the suspect had posed to other drivers and pedestrians.

'Partial-birth' Cases Test Abortion Rights' Limits (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 30, 2006

NEW YORK — It was just after Mother's Day in May 2003 when Ilene Jaroslaw, about four months pregnant, learned that the fetus she was carrying had a fatal spinal cord and brain defect.

Jaroslaw, then a mother of two, says she was devastated but decided immediately to have an abortion. Because she wanted to have another child — and because she had had two previous cesarean-section deliveries and an unrelated surgery on her uterus — she agreed with her doctor's recommendation to undergo a procedure that would do as little damage as possible to the uterus.

"There was absolutely no hope at all," says Jaroslaw, a 43-year-old lawyer in New York City who talked with USA TODAY about her experience. "This baby was not going to survive long."

For Jaroslaw, having what Congress and critics of the procedure call a "partial-birth" abortion was an intensely personal health decision that led to a happier ending: In 2004, she got pregnant again and delivered a healthy baby girl.

The episode also made Jaroslaw a symbol of the ongoing debate over whether Congress' effort to ban "partial-birth" abortion violates a woman's right to end a pregnancy — a question that goes before the Supreme Court on Nov. 8. Under a federal law passed by Congress in October 2003 and tied up in the courts ever since, Jaroslaw could not legally have undergone the procedure because her life was not in danger.

Jaroslaw's reasons for having the procedure — to preserve her ability to have more children by avoiding the hemorrhaging and perforation of the uterus that can occur with other abortion methods — would not have cleared the legal hurdle set by Congress.

That's partly why the pair of cases that come before the Supreme Court next week are widely viewed as a major test of efforts to restrict abortion. The issue is not the fundamental question of whether abortion should be legal, first established by the court's ruling in Roe v. Wade in 1973. Instead, the cases test the Republican-led Congress' power to limit the reach of that ruling by restricting medical options for women.

The law is called the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003. Lawyers for the two challengers now before the Supreme Court, Eve Gartner of Planned Parenthood and Priscilla Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights, note that there is no medical procedure known by that name and contend that the phrase is needlessly offensive and misleading.

On a more technical level, the cases put on exhibit dueling medical opinions over whether certain second-trimester abortion procedures are ever necessary.

For the court, the cases — Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America and Gonzales v. Carhart — represent the first significant test of whether abortion rights in America will change now that moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a key vote in favor of such rights, has retired.

Six years ago, when the justices struck down state bans on "partial-birth" abortions because the laws did not include exceptions for when a woman's health was at risk, O'Connor cast the decisive fifth vote on the ideologically divided, nine-member court. Last term, she was replaced by Samuel Alito, a more conservative judge who, as a member of a lower court, voted for abortion restrictions that O'Connor later rejected.

The federal ban — which is similar to the state laws voided by the high court six years ago — has been rejected by three sets of U.S. district courts and appeals courts. The lower courts said Congress' ban violates women's rights to abortion because it lacks a health exception and is too vaguely written.

The lower court judgments conflict with Congress' assertion that "partial-birth" procedures are never the best option to preserve a woman's health.

"This is an excellent case to test the direction of the court on abortion rights," Georgetown University law professor Randy Barnett says.

Abortion rights groups such as Planned Parenthood say Jaroslaw and thousands of women like her personify the need to preserve the second-trimester procedures known in the medical community as "intact dilation and evacuation" (or intact D&E) and "dilation and extraction" (D&X).

The methods involve dilating a woman's cervix to allow most of the fetus to emerge into the vagina intact, rather than dismembering the fetus in the uterus by using forceps and other instruments. In the intact method, a doctor then suctions out the fetus' brain to collapse the head and allow delivery.

The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists has reported that such methods increasingly are viewed as the safest abortion procedures for the second trimester of pregnancy, roughly the 13th to 26th weeks of gestation.

Second-trimester procedures account for about 11% of the estimated 1.3 million abortions performed in the USA each year, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a research group that supports abortion rights. It's unclear, however, how many of those abortions are done with the intact D&E or D&X methods because no one keeps a precise count.

The Bush administration, in defending the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, has argued in court papers that Congress had solid grounds to believe that any procedure in which a doctor "partially delivers a (living) fetus intact … and then kills the fetus" is never medically necessary.

The government is appealing a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, in a case begun by Planned Parenthood, and a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit, in a case started by Nebraska physician LeRoy Carhart.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement has told the justices that the "gruesome" procedure "resembles infanticide."

Clement has said Congress' ban is not unconstitutional because there are alternative methods of second-trimester abortions that would remain legal. Those include a standard D&E procedure in which a doctor dismembers the fetus in the uterus, and another method known as "induction," in which a woman is given drugs that cause her to go into labor and deliver the fetus.

Groups filing briefs in support of the administration include the American Association of Pro Life Obstetricians and Gynecologists. The association argues that such alternative methods are medically appropriate even for women such as Jaroslaw with uterine scarring from a prior cesarean section or other uterine surgery.

Elizabeth Shadigian, a physician affiliated with the University of Michigan's medical school who is president of the pro-life group, says there is little evidence to suggest that "partial-birth" methods are better in preserving a woman's health.

"There is almost no data on it," Shadigian says. "It's not good enough that someone believes it's better. You have to prove it's better." She said women should wait until studies are done on "the long-term effects of the procedure."

In court filings, Planned Parenthood counsel Gartner says that if Congress' ban is allowed to take effect, doctors would not be able to give their patients the best medical care.

Physicians would be "chilled from continuing to provide these procedures, … (and) women's liberty will be infringed and their right to choose abortion unduly burdened," Gartner says.

She also notes that the records from the cases now before the Supreme Court show several instances in which women suffering from serious medical conditions or carrying fetuses with severe anomalies would benefit from the intact D&E procedure.

"Even for women whose health condition is not compromised, intact D&E is a significantly safer method of abortion," Gartner says.

Clement acknowledges in his filings that physicians disagree over the necessity for the intact D&E and D&X methods. However, he insists that the justices must defer to Congress' finding that "there is substantial evidence … that partial-birth abortion is never" medically necessary.

Jaroslaw, a graduate of Harvard College and of Georgetown Law School, says she came forward to speak about her abortion because "the issues aren't as simple as people think. Nobody in advance of a diagnosis says, 'I want that procedure.' What people want is proper medical care."

Jaroslaw, a native of Flushing, N.Y., married a fellow lawyer, David, in 1992. She gave birth to a boy in 1997 and a girl in 1999. She says the children were delivered by cesarean section because she previously had uterine fibroids and other gynecological problems.

Jaroslaw says that when she became pregnant in 2003, everything looked good in early tests. "So we tell our families I'm pregnant. We tell friends. A few weeks after that, I tell people at work. I wasn't worried."

About 17 weeks into the pregnancy, however, a sonogram showed that part of her fetus' brain was missing. The diagnosis was anencephaly, which is fatal.

Jaroslaw says she and her husband considered abortion the only option. She says she did not want to wait a full nine months to deliver a child that would not survive.

"The idea of being pregnant for so many more months and having people ask about the baby, it would have been a nightmare," Jaroslaw says. She was also concerned that her children would be traumatized by having their sibling be born and die. She says she talked with her rabbi, and he supported her choice.

Jaroslaw says her desire for a third child led her doctor to recommend that she have the fetus removed intact, to avoid trauma to her uterus. "When you've had so many cuts in the uterus, you want as little instrumentation and probing around as possible."

Coincidentally, she underwent the abortion as Congress was debating its ban on "partial-birth" abortion. "I asked my doctor whether, if the bill passed, the procedure I was about to have would be illegal," Jaroslaw says. "He said yes."

Bush signed the bill into law in November 2003.

"I'm a family person," Jaroslaw says. "I don't think I'm unique in my situation, except that I will talk about it. When I went back to work, people opened up to me with their own stories."

So how might the Supreme Court — with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts, who replaced the late William Rehnquist last year — view the most recent attempt to restrict abortion?

The "partial-birth" cases arrive at the court at a time when few Americans — 15% in a Gallup Poll in May — believe abortion should be banned in all circumstances. That poll, typical of nationwide surveys, found that most Americans (53%) believe that abortion should be legal but with restrictions.

The high court generally has reflected that sentiment since Roe v. Wade, upholding abortion rights while opening the door to limits. The current cases could provide a hint of whether greater restrictions might be imposed with the new justices on the bench. However, a veteran justice — Reagan appointee Anthony Kennedy — is more likely to be the key player.

In 2000, when the court voted 5-4 to strike down state bans on "partial-birth" abortion that lacked an exception for cases in which a woman's health was at risk, the bench was deeply divided. Kennedy, who had provided a crucial fifth vote in 1992 when the justices affirmed abortion rights, bitterly dissented in 2000. He said government should be free to outlaw the "abhorrent" procedure and that states had a legitimate "concern for the life of the unborn and for the partially born." This time, a big question will be whether Kennedy, a frequent swing vote on the court, still supports a ban on the procedure without a health exception.

If he does, the court's reshaped conservative wing — Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, along with newcomers Roberts and Alito — could be positioned to uphold Congress' ban. Scalia and Thomas consistently have voted against abortion rights. Roberts' record as a lawyer in the Reagan and first Bush administrations and Alito's rulings as a lower court judge suggest that they also are likely to take a limited view of such rights.

Remember To Vote, Hope It Counts (NYT)

By Michael Waldman, Wendy Weiser And Open, N.y.

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

ON Nov. 7, many voters will encounter new voting machines, new computerized voter lists and new rules regarding registration and ID requirements. As primaries earlier this year demonstrated, local officials and poll workers are overwhelmed by all the changes — some of them engineered by mischievous partisans who have passed laws and rules that would block many eligible citizens from voting.

There is a silent disenfranchisement afoot — one that could affect hundreds of thousands of voters. That's bad for democracy. In the 2004 presidential election, some states were decided by less than 1 percent of the vote. This year, dozens of Congressional races could be close enough that vote suppression would affect them.

What follow are examples of ways the vote could be suppressed next week around the country. Problems listed in one state may also apply to several others. Taken together, they show just how urgent it is that the country move toward a system of universal voter registration, in which the government takes responsibility to ensure that all citizens are on the rolls, with real protections.

Looking forward, Congress and state legislatures should spurn partisan attempts to manipulate elections by imposing new voting requirements, like proof of citizenship and identification. They should ban wireless components in voting machines and require an audited paper trail. Judges should continue to strike down illegal and anti-democratic laws. And citizens and journalists should demand to know who is being purged from the rolls, and why. All registered voters should cast their ballots and insist their votes be counted.

Can This Machine Be Trusted? (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, October 30, 2006

A woman walked into a polling place in Peoria, Ill. last week and proceeded to use one of the new electronic voting machines set up for early voting. She logged on, went through each contest and seemed to be making her choices. After reviewing each race, the machine checked to see if she was satisfied with her selections and wanted to move on. Each time, she pressed YES, and the machine progressed to the next race. When she was done, a waving American flag appeared on the screen, indicating that her votes had been cast and recorded.

But there was a problem. The woman had not made any choices at all. She had only browsed. Now when she told the election judges she was ready to do it again--but this time actually vote--they told her it was too late. Pressing the last button, they said, is like dropping your ballot in an old-fashioned ballot box. There's no getting it back.

So what?

So this: In one week, more than 80 million Americans will go to the polls, and a record number of them--90%--will either cast their vote on a computer or have it tabulated that way. When that many people collide with that many high-tech devices, there are going to be problems. Some will be machine malfunctions. Some could come from sabotage by poll workers or voters themselves. But in a venture this large, trouble is most likely to come from just plain human error, a fact often overlooked in an environment as charged and conspiratorial as America is in today. Four years after Congress passed a law requiring every state to vote by a method more reliable than the punch-card system that paralyzed Florida and the nation in 2000, the 2006 election is shaping up into a contest not just between Democrats and Republicans but also between people who believe in technology and those who fear machines cannot be trusted to count votes in a closely divided democracy.

Perhaps the biggest fallacy in this debate is the notion that elections were perfect before Congress decided to hold them on computers. They weren't. "Stuffing the ballot box" is not an expression from the world of fiction. The problem with overvoting punch cards existed for decades before the dateline PALM BEACH COUNTY became a household term. Peoria County clerk JoAnn Thomas says she routinely tossed out several hundred twice-punched ballots every year. That represents roughly 1% of all registered voters in her jurisdiction.

The 2000 election reminded Americans that every vote makes a difference, and scrutiny of polling practices intensified. So just as America has moved to a process of electronic voting and tabulation intended to make voting more accessible, reliable and secure, trust in the system has actually gone down. Says David Orr, clerk of Illinois' Cook County: "We used to have a problem with giving people the wrong ballots. And if we were lucky, we'd catch it before they voted. Now, if the same thing happens with a touch screen, it's a conspiracy."

So far, at least, Murphy's Law has been a bigger problem than fraud. Many jurisdictions, especially those with long or bilingual ballots, have struggled to program their computers perfectly, and there have been scattered reports of glitches. In three Virginia cities, for example, electronic voting machines have inadvertently shortened the name of the Democratic candidate in one of the tightest Senate races in the nation. In Charlottesville, Falls Church and Alexandria, James H. Webb's name will appear on the ballot summary screen page simply as "James H. 'Jim'"--with no last name. Sounds like a crisis--except that the same thing happened in the June primary and Webb still won.

A bigger worry concerns something that is least likely to happen--that someone will somehow meddle with the devices and manipulate vote tallies. It's not impossible. Princeton computer scientist Edward Felten and a couple of graduate students this past summer tested the defenses of a voting machine made by Diebold, a major manufacturer of such devices. Felten's team found three ways to insert into the machine rogue programs that allowed them to redistribute votes that had already been cast. In one instance, the testers had to take the machine apart with a screwdriver--an act likely to draw the attention of poll workers. But in two others, they were able to quickly infect the device with a standard memory-access card in which they had installed a preprogrammed chip. Other computer scientists have also breached electronic voting machines. Congressman Vernon Ehlers, a Michigan Republican who has been holding hearings this fall, says manufacturers "have produced machines that are very vulnerable, not very reliable and I suspect fairly easy to hack."

Concerns about fraud are heightened by the fact that with some electronic voting machines, there is no such thing as a real recount. When asked again for the tally, the computer could spit back the same response as the first time. For that reason, at least 27 states have built in a backup that requires electronic voting machines to provide an attached voter-verified paper trail--a running ticker that allows voters to see on paper that their votes are recorded as cast. That way, if there's a question about the electronic tally, the paper records can be counted by hand.

It was just such a paper trail that enabled Marilyn Jo Drake, the auditor in Iowa's Pottawattamie County, to suss out an anomaly in a county-recorder race she was monitoring in June. She noticed that a 20-year incumbent was being beaten 10 to 1 by an unknown newcomer. Sensing a glitch, Drake cross-checked the electronic results against the totals on the paper vote and discovered the veteran was actually well ahead. The problem, it turned out, was the way the candidates' names had been ordered and coded into the access cards that activated the machines, which were made by Omaha's ES & S. Drake says she should have caught the problem in the pre-election test runs. "It was human error both on their end and my end," she notes. Not every county will have an auditor as sharp-eyed as Drake--or an outcome as transparently false as the one she uncovered. "We were just plain lucky," she says.

Rather than waiting for results to be contested, some states are requiring election officials to conduct random samples of electronic results next week and compare them with the paper printouts. Minnesota's secretary of state, Mary Kiffmeyer, plans to audit the tally from two precincts in each of her state's 87 counties to make sure the electronic tabulation matches the paper trail. Audits, says Kiffmeyer, "just build confidence." In Los Angeles County, officials aren't waiting for the election to start running their tests. They will soon conduct random audits of 5% of the devices used in early voting, which began in earnest last week.

County election officials who spoke to TIME reported that most of the fears they field about the new machines come from Democrats, who have not won a national election in three cycles. It may be that a solid Democratic win in 2006 will allay some of their worries. It follows, of course, that if the Republicans lose, they will take up the charge. In fact, that's already happening in some places this year.

In a country of 300 million, it is far preferable for partisans, poll workers, defensive voting-machine manufacturers and voters to adjust to the new technologies, eliminate their weak spots and work to keep human errors to a minimum. In that way, voting by machine may someday be no more mysterious than making a visit to the ATM. Harrah's Pushes Back Plans For Gulf Coast Casino By PETER SANDERS (WSJ)

Harrah's Entertainment Inc. has delayed plans for a $1 billion resort-casino along the Biloxi, Miss., coast, the second time it has pulled back on plans in the wake of a $15.5 billion acquisition offer from two private-equity firms.

Harrah's executives last week told analysts on a conference call that high construction costs and the "volatility of the marketplace" in Biloxi were factors that have effectively postponed any major development. Plans for the resort-casino had been drawn up by late July.

A person familiar with the company's thinking said Biloxi has slipped on Harrah's priority list, especially after it experienced a tough third quarter in Atlantic City, N.J. The company is now focusing mostly on Las Vegas and Atlantic City.

The Biloxi project is the second unexpected development-related news from the company since an effort by private-equity firms Apollo Management LP and Texas Pacific Group to acquire Harrah's was disclosed earlier this month.

A week after the offer was announced, Harrah's said it wouldn't bid for a multibillion-dollar resort-casino project in Singapore. Harrah's had lost an earlier bid in Singapore that was awarded to rival Las Vegas Sands Corp. The casino industry also spent much of the summer awaiting Harrah's plans for the 350 acres it has acquired on and around the Las Vegas Strip. Harrah's has delayed details of that announcement, as well.

DOJ_NMG_0087767

The Las Vegas company, however, maintains it is in a business-as-usual mode. Last week, the company sweetened its bid for British casino operator London Clubs International PLC to about $570 million. Harrah's also has spent more than $8 million in Rhode Island to support a ballot initiative that would allow a tribal casino in West Warwick.

Harrah's spokesman Alberto Lopez said the company "has acquired quite a large footprint" in Biloxi and still has plans to "build something spectacular."

After Katrina struck in August 2005, Harrah's pushed Mississippi legislators to amend laws that previously required all gambling to be conducted over water or on barges. The state changed the rules to allow casinos to build on land within 800 feet of the Gulf's shoreline.

Once the law changed, Harrah's and its rivals, including MGM Mirage and Isle of Capri Casinos Inc., raced to get gambling halls up and running again. Two weeks after Harrah's Biloxi Grand reopened in August, MGM completed its more-than-$500-million repair of its Beau Rivage resort.

In the conference call, Harrah's executives said results at the Biloxi casino were "encouraging" but acknowledged there was a supply problem. The Mississippi Gulf Coast's casino recovery has far outpaced the recovery of infrastructure to support the tourist market.

Rinker Is To Reject Cemex Bid Suitor Likely Needs To Raise Current Offer Up From $11.7 Billion By BILL LINDSAY And IAN PEMBERTON In Sydney And JOHN LYONS In Mexico City (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

Australian building-materials company Rinker Group Ltd. today is set to reject an unsolicited US$11.7 billion takeover bid by Cemex SAB as inadequate, dashing the Mexican company's hopes for early support from Rinker's board.

"The bid is highly opportunistic and conditional. It has been made at time when the shares are trading at a cyclical low," said a person with knowledge of the bid. Rinker's board, which met over the weekend, reconvenes today and will issue its first formal response to the Cemex bid later in the day, this person said.

Analysts and fund managers say they believe Cemex, the world's largest seller of ready-mix concrete, has little chance of snaring control of Rinker and boosting its presence in the crucial U.S. building-materials market without improving its offer.

The all-cash offer prices Rinker at US$13 a local Australian share, or about a 26% premium over the average trading price during the past three months, Cemex said. That comes out to an equivalent local price of A$17. Cemex put the total value at US$12.8 billion, including Rinker's debt.

Rinker's shares closed Friday at A$14.70 after a late surge driven by a Wall Street Journal article on the unsolicited offer. Its American depositary receipts soared 33% Friday to close at US$71.10, compared with US$65 offered by Cemex for each ADR.

Fund managers "will fight it out; they will be looking for something closer to A$20 before they even consider selling," said Charlie Aitken, the head of trading at institutional broker Southern Cross Equities.

Shares of Rinker, which generates around 80% of its sales in the U.S., have fallen as much as 43% from their late April record of A$21.44 amid a slowing U.S. housing market.

The bid takes Cemex into uncharted territory, even considering the Mexican cement maker's growing penchant for big deals. The offer is twice as big as Cemex's prior biggest deal, last year's $5.8 billion purchase of RMC of Britain. If successful, Cemex's bid will rank as the largest merger-and-acquisition deal in Australian history, beating the A$14 billion takeover of Optus by Singapore Telecommunications Ltd. in 2001.

It is also Cemex's first foray into the world of unsolicited takeovers, usually far more complex and costly than the so-called friendly deals it has negotiated in the past. Unsolicited takeover offers are tricky because they open the door for other suitors, prompting a bidding war that raises the price. They can also take months or even years to complete, draining time, attention and money from top management.

Potential competitors include U.S. aggregate companies such as Martin Marietta Materials Inc. and Vulcan Materials Co., as well as Cemex's big cement rivals, Holcim and Lafarge -- or any of the private-equity firms, analysts said.

Cemex does have one advantage: Australia takeover law is very friendly to unsolicited offers, giving little leeway to boards and managements that act against the wishes of shareholders. The person with knowledge of the bid said Rinker could consider measures to retain its independence, including a capital return or special dividend that might exceed A$2 billion, or more than A$2 a share.

Aware that the bid's success relies on institutions that account for 75% of Rinker's share register, Cemex executive Juan Pablo San Agustin arrived in Sydney yesterday to start briefing investors as well as attempting to arrange a meeting with Rinker.

"We've already offered to have a meeting whenever they feel it's convenient," said Mr. San Agustin, Cemex's senior vice president of corporate strategic planning. "We would like to engage with them and we would much prefer to be friendly or recommended."

Rinker's largest shareholder, Perpetual Trustees Australia Ltd., has a 10.5% stake. U.S. fund giant Capital Group is the next biggest investor, with a 6% holding.

The bid has a 90% minimum acceptance condition, pressuring Cemex to win board support or face the prospect of an investor holding out or retail shareholders taking their cue from directors and refusing to accept.

A purchase of Rinker would make Cemex the world's biggest producer of cement aggregates and expand Cemex operations in its biggest market, the U.S., where it is already the single biggest producer of cement.

Rinker's dependence on the U.S. residential-housing market has some on Wall Street worried. The concern is that Cemex is increasing its bet on a market that is entering a downturn, before it is fully clear how deep or prolonged the downturn will be. In an interview Friday, Cemex Chief Executive Lorenzo Zambrano defended the decision, saying he has confidence in the U.S. market long-term. The deal, which is to be financed through borrowing, would more than double Cemex's debt to around $21 billion, prompting Fitch Ratings and Standard & Poor's Ratings Group to say they may downgrade Cemex's credit rating.

Schneider Offers $6.1 Billion For American Power Conversion (WSJ)

By Anne-sylvaine Chassany

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

PARIS -- French electric-equipment maker Schneider Electric SA said Monday it made an offer to buy U.S. power-supplies and surge-protection-products manufacturer American Power Conversion Corp. in a $6.1 billion cash deal.

The French company said it's offering $31 for each APC share.

The offer, which has been approved by APC's board of directors, represents a 30% premium over the last APC share price and is expected to boost Schneider's earnings per share starting 2007, the company said.

"The acquisition of APC will lead to a strong value creation, superior to $3 billion," Schneider said in a statement, adding it aims to tie up APC with its MGE UPS Systems subsidiary.

Cost synergies are expected to amount to $220 million, of which 70% will be achieved by 2009, the company said. To finance the deal, Schneider said it will launch a €1.2 billion ($1.53 billion) capital increase and use debt financing.

APC Chairman Rodger Dowdell and APC Chief Technical Officer Neil Rasmussen, who jointly own 9.6% of APC shares, committed to tendering their shares to Schneider, the company said.

With 7,600 employees, APC generated about $2 billion sales in 2005, three quarters of which were in low power systems, Schneider said. Investments APC made in the fast-growing high power systems segment "dramatically deteriorated its operating profitability to 9.4% in 2005," Schneider said. Schneider "is confident" it will help APC to recover rapidly.

Schneider emphasized APC's production capacity in Asia, where APC generates 18% of its sales.

No Business Patenting Vague Methods (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Feds should be circumspect in handing out business method patents.

IN 1999, AMAZON.COM won a controversial patent for a seemingly obvious feature of online stores: Letting shoppers buy an item by pointing their mouse and clicking on it. Now the retailer is getting a taste of its own medicine from IBM, calling into question why the federal government needs to protect methods of doing business in the first place.

IBM filed a pair of lawsuits last week accusing Amazon of violating five of Big Blue's patents related to e-commerce. Although IBM contends that the patents are grounded in important technological advancements, the list involves such mundane activities as "ordering items using an electronic catalog" and "presenting advertising in an interactive service."

Both appear to fall under the much-maligned category of "business method" patents, or federally protected ways to perform such fundamental commercial activities as marketing, billing and monitoring inventory.

The requirements for obtaining patents have evolved since 1790, when the first Congress created the federal patent system, but a key principle has remained consistent: They are to be awarded for the implementation of ideas, not the ideas themselves. Other important requirements added along the way include that the invention be novel and useful, and not obvious.

Business methods were not considered patentable for many years because they were too much like ideas. In the late 1990s, however, a federal appeals court ruled that methods could be protected if they met the same criteria as other inventions. These rulings, combined with the emergence of the World Wide Web and the business world's increasing reliance on computers, fueled an exponential increase in the number of patents sought for high-tech ways to conduct business.

To its credit, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has been slow to recognize business methods. Of the more than 42,000 such patents sought between 2000 and 2005, only 3,600 have been approved. Nevertheless, some of the office's grants have blurred the distinction between novel commercial methods and abstract business models. Applicants exacerbate the problem by claiming the broadest possible coverage — applying the patent to the idea instead of their way of implementing it. And the short history of the Internet as an electronic shopping mall has made it harder for patent examiners to gauge how new and non-obvious the proposed methods are.

So should business methods be totally ineligible for patenting? That may be a step too far. At minimum, though, method patents should only be granted if they're tied to real technical innovation.

Bush Appointee Said To Reject Advice On Endangered Species (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

A senior Bush political appointee at the Interior Department has rejected staff scientists' recommendations to protect imperiled animals and plants under the Endangered Species Act at least six times in the past three years, documents show.

In addition, staff complaints that their scientific findings were frequently overruled or disparaged at the behest of landowners or industry have led the agency's inspector general to look into the role of Julie MacDonald, who has been deputy assistant secretary of the interior for fish and wildlife and parks since 2004, in decisions on protecting endangered species.

The documents show that MacDonald has repeatedly refused to go along with staff reports concluding that species such as the white-tailed prairie dog and the Gunnison sage grouse are at risk of extinction. Career officials and scientists urged the department to identify the species as either threatened or endangered.

Overall, President Bush's appointees have added far fewer species to the protected list than did the administrations of either Bill Clinton or George H.W. Bush, according to the advocacy group Center for Biological Diversity. As of now, the administration has listed 56 species under the Endangered Species Act, for a rate of about 10 a year. Under Clinton, officials listed 512 species, or 64 a year, and under George H.W. Bush, the department listed 234, or 59 a year.

The dispute is the latest in a series of controversies in which government officials and outside scientists have accused the Bush administration of overriding or setting aside scientific findings that clashed with its political agenda on such issues as global warming, the Plan B emergency contraceptive and stem cell research.

Interior spokesman Hugh Vickery said the agency has added fewer plants and animals to the list because it has been mired in lawsuits over existing listings and was more focused on ensuring their recovery than in identifying new ones.

MacDonald said she does not make the decision on whether to federally protect a species, because the head of the Fish and Wildlife Service has that responsibility. But she said she had made her feelings clear in an array of documents; overruled scientists' conclusions in areas where she has authority, such as designating critical habitat; and mocked rank-and-file employees' recommendations.

MacDonald said she sees her job as protecting "the public face of the Fish and Wildlife Service" by carefully scrutinizing listing documents that often seem vague or unsupported by evidence.

"A lot of times when I first read a document I think, 'This is a joke, this is just not right.' So I'll ask questions," said MacDonald, a civil engineer by training who worked at the California Resources Agency before joining the Interior Department in 2002. "These documents have tremendous economic and social implications for people."

Since the act's inception in 1973, the government has identified 1,337 domestic species as threatened or endangered, of which 1,311 remain on the list. At any given time the government is evaluating hundreds of candidate species: Officials and scientists review all the available scientific literature on a plant or animal before awarding it protection.

The process can take several years, even though under law it should take no more than two years and three months.

Hundreds of pages of records, obtained by environmental groups through the Freedom of Information Act, chronicle the long-running battle between MacDonald and Fish and Wildlife Service employees over decisions whether to safeguard plants and animals from oil and gas drilling, power lines, and real estate development, spiced by her mocking comments on their work and their frequently expressed resentment.

Two advocacy groups, the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Center for Biological Diversity, provided the documents to The Washington Post. Francesca Grifo, who directs the union's scientific integrity program, said MacDonald's actions are "not business as usual but a systemic problem of tampering with science that is putting our environment at risk."

In a few instances, federal judges have overturned decisions that MacDonald had influenced. After she declared that the endangered Santa Barbara and Sonoma salamanders were no longer "distinct populations" entitled to protection, William Alsup, a judge on the U.S. District Court for Northern California, ruled that MacDonald had arbitrarily instructed Fish and Wildlife scientists to downgrade the two species even though an agency scientist concluded that "genetics state otherwise."

"This is not to suggest that the Secretary of Interior has no role in the ultimate decision," Alsup wrote. "If the Secretary wants to re-assess the evidence, he may choose to do so, but, in doing so, he must set forth a discernible rationale."

In several instances, MacDonald wrote sarcastic comments in the margins of the documents, questioning why scientists were portraying a species' condition as so bleak. When scientists raised the possibility that a proposed road might degrade the greater sage grouse's habitat, which is scattered through 11 Western states, MacDonald wrote: "Has nothing to do with sage grouse. This belongs in a treatise on 'Why roads are bad'?"

MacDonald acknowledged that her comments appeared harsh at times.

"Mea culpa," she said of the roads comment. "I read so many of these I get frustrated sometimes. I shouldn't be flippant. I shouldn't be sarcastic."

MacDonald has repeatedly urged employees to consider the position of industry officials more seriously when weighing whether to declare a species threatened or endangered. During a discussion of greater sage grouse populations in the first half of the 1800s, she wrote, "This paragraph completely ignores the comments received by the Owyhee Cattlemen's Association and the Idaho Cattle Association." The organization opposed the listing on the grounds that it would limit their use of land where the birds live.

During a separate rulemaking concerning the threatened bull trout's habitat on the Klamath River, Fish and Wildlife officials debated via e-mail on how to respond to MacDonald. Her questions, they believed, reflected the concerns of Ronald Yockim, a lawyer representing three Idaho counties opposing a pending decision to protect nearly 300 miles of the river. After MacDonald's intervention, Fish and Wildlife officials opted to protect 42 miles instead.

John Young, a Fish and Wildlife biologist, wrote to several colleagues: "Yockim is an attorney representing various interest groups. It appears that Julie has shared our responses to her comments with Yockim, which have generated additional comments from Yockim. It seems to me it would be inappropriate to essentially continue the public comment period (it is closed) by contacting and responding to his follow-up questions/comments that he did not provide during the comment period."

MacDonald said that she was following up on a letter Yockim had sent and that the solicitor's office had approved such contacts.

MacDonald said that on occasion she told officials they did not have to heed her advice. In documents concerning the white-tailed prairie dog, an e-mail from her on Oct. 25, 2004, stated, "None of these changes are final or a directive."

But on Nov. 1, an official in the Denver regional office, Seth Wiley, sent a follow-up e-mail that said: "Just spoke with Chris Nolan and Kurt Johnson. Julie McD and the Department want to go with a not-warranted listing."

Before issuing that memo, MacDonald changed how the agency characterized the threats facing the species. Staff scientists wrote in a summary that "both documents clearly identify current and projected threats to the species, including mortality and habitat loss, fragmentation and degradation. We believe further evaluation of the extent of leasing and current and projected oil and gas development is necessary."

MacDonald eliminated the reference to energy leases and added: "The identified threats are speculative, and neither document provides substantial scientific information supporting the speculation."

Amid the complaints, Interior officials have privately contacted the ranking Democrat on the House Resources Committee, Rep. Nick J. Rahall II (W.Va.), who plans to hold oversight hearings into the matter if his party retakes the majority in next month's elections.

Budgets Falling In Race To Fight Global Warming (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

DENVER — Cheers fit for a revival meeting swept a hotel ballroom as 1,800 entrepreneurs and experts watched a PowerPoint presentation of the most promising technologies for limiting global warming: solar power, wind, ethanol and other farmed fuels, energy-efficient buildings and fuel-sipping cars.

“Houston,” Charles F. Kutscher, chairman of the Solar 2006 conference, concluded in a twist on the line from Apollo 13, “we have a solution.”

Hold the applause. For all the enthusiasm about alternatives to coal and oil, the challenge of limiting emissions of carbon dioxide, which traps heat, will be immense in a world likely to add 2.5 billion people by midcentury, a host of other experts say.

Moreover, most of those people will live in countries like China and India, which are just beginning to enjoy an electrified, air-conditioned mobile society.

The challenge is all the more daunting because research into energy technologies by both government and industry has not been rising, but rather falling.

In the United States, annual federal spending for all energy research and development — not just the research aimed at climate-friendly technologies — is less than half what it was a quarter-century ago. It has sunk to $3 billion a year in the current budget from an inflation-adjusted peak of $7.7 billion in 1979, according to several different studies rael.berkeley.edu/files/2005/Kammen-Nemet-ShrinkingRD-2005.pdf.

Britain, for one, has sounded a loud alarm about the need for prompt action on the climate issue, including more research. [A report commissioned by the British government and scheduled to be released today calls for spending to be doubled worldwide on research into low-carbon technologies; without it, the report says, coastal flooding and a shortage of drinking water could turn 200 million people into refugees.]

President Bush has sought an increase to $4.2 billion for 2007, but that would still be a small fraction of what most climate and energy experts say would be needed.

Federal spending on medical research, by contrast, has nearly quadrupled, to $28 billion annually, since 1979. Military research has increased 260 percent, and at more than $75 billion a year is 20 times the amount spent on energy research.

Internationally, government energy research trends are little different from those in the United States. Japan is the only economic power that increased research spending in recent decades, with growth focused on efficiency and solar technology, according to the International Energy Agency.

In the private sector, studies show that energy companies have a long tradition of eschewing long-term technology quests because of the lack of short-term payoffs.

Still, more than four dozen scientists, economists, engineers and entrepreneurs interviewed by The New York Times said that unless the search for abundant non-polluting energy sources and systems became far more aggressive, the world would probably face dangerous warming and international strife as nations with growing energy demands compete for increasingly inadequate resources.

Most of these experts also say existing energy alternatives and improvements in energy efficiency are simply not enough.

"We cannot come close to stabilizing temperatures" unless humans, by the end of the century, stop adding more CO2 to the atmosphere than it can absorb, said W. David Montgomery of Charles River Associates, a consulting group, "and that will be an economic impossibility without a major R.& D. investment."

A sustained push is needed not just to refine, test and deploy known low-carbon technologies, but also to find "energy technologies that don't have a name yet," said James A. Edmonds, a chief scientist at the Joint Global Change Research Institute of the University of Maryland and the Energy Department.

At the same time, many energy experts and economists agree on another daunting point: To make any resulting "alternative" energy options the new norm will require attaching a significant cost to the carbon emissions from coal, oil and gas.

"A price incentive stirs people to look at a thousand different things,' " said Henry D. Jacoby, a climate and energy expert at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

For now, a carbon cap or tax is opposed by President Bush, most American lawmakers and many industries. And there are scant signs of consensus on a long-term successor to the Kyoto Protocol, the first treaty obligating participating industrial countries to cut warming emissions. (The United States has not ratified the pact.)

The next round of talks on Kyoto and an underlying voluntary treaty will take place next month in Nairobi, Kenya.

Environmental campaigners, focused on promptly establishing binding limits on emissions of heat-trapping gases, have tended to play down the need for big investments seeking energy breakthroughs. At the end of "An Inconvenient Truth," former Vice President Al Gore's documentary film on climate change, he concluded: "We already know everything we need to know to effectively address this problem."

While applauding Mr. Gore's enthusiasm, many energy experts said this stance was counterproductive because there was no way, given global growth in energy demand, that existing technology could avert a doubling or more of atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide in this century.

Mr. Gore has since adjusted his stance, saying existing technology is sufficient to start on the path to a stable climate.

Other researchers say the chances of success are so low, unless something breaks the societal impasse, that any technology quest should also include work on increasing the resilience to climate extremes — through actions like developing more drought-tolerant crops — as well as last-ditch climate fixes, like testing ways to block some incoming sunlight to counter warming.

Without big reductions in emissions, the midrange projections of most scenarios envision a rise of 4 degrees or so in this century, four times the warming in the last 100 years. That could, among other effects, produce a disruptive mix of intensified flooding and withering droughts in the world's prime agricultural regions.

Sir Nicholas Stern, the chief of Britain's economic service and author of the new government report on climate options, has summarized the cumulative nature of the threat succinctly: "The sting is in the tail."

The Carbon Dioxide Problem

Many factors intersect to make the prompt addressing of global warming very difficult, experts say.

A central hurdle is that carbon dioxide accumulates in the atmosphere like unpaid credit card debt as long as emissions exceed the rate at which the gas is naturally removed from the atmosphere by the oceans and plants. But the technologies producing the emissions evolve slowly.

A typical new coal-fired power plant, one of the largest sources of emissions, is expected to operate for many decades. About one large coal-burning plant is being commissioned a week, mostly in China.

"We've got a $12 trillion capital investment in the world energy economy and a turnover time of 30 to 40 years," said John P. Holdren, a physicist and climate expert at Harvard University and president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. "If you want it to look different in 30 or 40 years, you'd better start now."

Many experts say this means the only way to affordably speed the transition to low-emissions energy is with advances in technologies at all stages of maturity.

Examples include:

¶ Substantially improving the efficiency and cost of solar panels;

¶ Conducting full-scale tests of systems for capturing carbon dioxide from power plants and pumping it underground;

¶ Seeking efficient ways to generate fuels from crops;

¶ Finding new ways to store vast amounts of energy harvested intermittently from the wind and sun.

Carbon dioxide levels will stabilize only if each generation persists in developing and deploying alternatives to unfettered fossil-fuel emissions, said Robert H. Socolow, a physicist and co-director of a Princeton "carbon mitigation initiative" created with $20 million from BP and Ford Motor.

The most immediate gains could come simply by increasing energy efficiency. If efficiency gains in transportation, buildings, power transmission and other areas were doubled from the longstanding rate of 1 percent per year to 2 percent, Dr. Holdren wrote in the M.I.T. journal Innovations earlier this year, that could hold the amount of new nonpolluting energy required by 2100 to the amount derived from fossil fuels in 2000 —a huge challenge, but not impossible.

Another area requiring immediate intensified work, Dr. Holdren and other experts say, is large-scale demonstration of systems for capturing carbon dioxide from coal burning before too many old-style plants are built.

All of the components for capturing carbon dioxide and disposing of it underground are already in use, particularly in oil fields, where pressurized carbon dioxide is used to drive the last dregs of oil from the ground.

In this area, said David Keith, an energy expert at the University of Calgary, "We just need to build the damn things on a billion-dollar scale."

In the United States, the biggest effort along these lines is the 285-megawatt Futuregen power plant planned by the Energy Department, along with private and international partners, that was announced in 2003 by President Bush and is scheduled to be built in either Illinois or Texas by 2012. James L. Connaughton, the chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said the Bush administration was making this a high priority.

"We share the view that a significantly more aggressive agenda on carbon capture and storage and zero-pollution coal is necessary," he said, adding that the administration has raised annual spending on storage options "from essentially zero to over $70 million."

Europe is pursuing a suite of such plants, including one in China, but also well behind the necessary pace, several experts said.

Even within the Energy Department, some experts are voicing frustration over the pace of such programs. "What I don't like about Futuregen," said Dr. Kutscher, an engineer at the National Renewable Energy Laboratory in Golden, Colo., "is the word 'future' in there."

Beyond a Holding Action

No matter what happens in the next decade or so, many experts say, the second and probably hardest phase of stabilizing the level of carbon dioxide will fall to the generation of engineers and entrepreneurs now in diapers, and the one after that. And those innovators will not have much to build on without greatly increased investment now in basic research.

There is plenty of ferment. Current research ranges from work on algae strains that can turn sunlight into hydrogen fuel to the inkjet-style printing of photovoltaic cells — a technique that could greatly cut solar-energy costs if it worked on a large scale. One company is promoting high-flying kite-like windmills to harvest the boundless energy in the jet stream.

But all of the small-scale experimentation will never move into the energy marketplace without a much bigger push not only for research and development, but for the lesser-known steps known as demonstration and deployment.

In this arena, there is a vital role for government spending, many experts agree, particularly on "enabling technologies" — innovations that would never be pursued by private industry because they mainly amount to a public good, not a potential source of profit, said Christopher Green, an economist at McGill University.

Examples include refining ways to securely handle radioactive waste from nuclear reactors; testing repositories for carbon dioxide captured at power plants; and, perhaps more important, improving the electricity grid so that it can manage large flows from intermittent sources like windmills and solar panels.

"Without storage possibilities on a large scale," Mr. Green said, "solar and wind will be relegated to niche status."

While private investors and entrepreneurs are jumping into alternative energy projects, they cannot be counted on to solve such problems, economists say, because even the most aggressive venture capitalists want a big payback within five years.

Many scientists say the only real long-term prospect for significantly substituting for fossil fuels is a breakthrough in harvesting solar power. This has been understood since the days of Thomas Edison. In a conversation with Henry Ford and the tire tycoon Harvey Firestone in 1931, shortly before Edison died, he said: "I'd put my money on the sun and solar energy. What a source of power! I hope we don't have to wait until oil and coal run out before we tackle that."

California, following models set in Japan and Germany, is trying to help solar energy with various incentives.

But such initiatives mainly pull existing technologies into the market, experts say, and do little to propel private research toward the next big advances. Even Vinod Khosla, a leading environment-oriented venture capitalist who invests heavily in ethanol and other alternative energy projects, said in an interview that he was not ready to back solar power because it did not appear able to show a profit without subsidies.

The Role of Leadership

At the federal level, the Bush administration was criticized by Republican and Democratic lawmakers at several recent hearings on climate change.

Mr. Connaughton, the lead White House official on the environment, said most critics are not aware of how much has been done.

"This administration has developed the most sophisticated and carefully considered strategic plan for advancing the technologies that are a necessary part of the climate solution," he said. He added that the administration must weigh tradeoffs with other pressing demands like health care.

Since 2001, when Mr. Bush abandoned a campaign pledge to limit carbon dioxide from power plants, he has said that too little is known about specific dangers of global warming to justify hard targets or mandatory curbs for the gas.

He has also asserted that any solution will lie less in regulation than in innovation.

"My answer to the energy question also is an answer to how you deal with the greenhouse-gas issue, and that is new technologies will change how we live," he said in May.

But critics, including some Republican lawmakers, now say that mounting evidence for risks — including findings that administration officials have tried to suppress of late — justifies prompt, more aggressive action to pay for or spur research and speed the movement of climate-friendly energy options into the marketplace.

Martin I. Hoffert, an emeritus professor of physics at New York University, said that what was needed was for a leader to articulate the energy challenge as President John F. Kennedy made his case for the mission to the moon. President Kennedy said they were imperative, "not because they are easy, but because they are hard."

In a report on competitiveness and research released last year, the National Academies, the country's top science advisory body, urged the government to substantially expand spending on long-term basic research, particularly on energy.

The report, titled "Rising Above the Gathering Storm," recommended that the Energy Department create a research-financing body similar to the 48-year-old Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or Darpa, to make grants and attack a variety of energy questions, including climate change.

Darpa, created after the Soviet Union launched Sputnik in 1957, was set up outside the sway of Congress to provide advances in areas like weapons, surveillance and defensive systems. But it also produced technologies like the Internet and the global positioning system for navigation.

Mr. Connaughton said it would be premature to conclude that a new agency was needed for energy innovation.

But many experts, from oil-industry officials to ecologists, agree that the status quo for energy research will not suffice.

The benefits of an intensified energy quest would go far beyond cutting the risks of dangerous climate change, said Roger H. Bezdek, an economist at Management Information Systems, a consulting group.

The world economy, he said, is facing two simultaneous energy challenges beyond global warming: the end of relatively cheap and easy oil, and the explosive demand for fuel in developing countries.

Advanced research should be diversified like an investment portfolio, he said. “The big payoff comes from a small number of very large winners,” he said. “Unfortunately, we cannot pick the winners in advance.”

Ultimately, a big increase in government spending on basic energy research will happen only if scientists can persuade the public and politicians that it is an essential hedge against potential calamity.

That may be the biggest hurdle of all, given the unfamiliar nature of the slowly building problem — the antithesis of epochal events like Pearl Harbor, Sputnik and 9/11 that triggered sweeping enterprises.

Changing Climate On Climate (WP)

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

President Bush has two more years to do something about climate change. Will he waste them, too?

AFTER THE coming election, President Bush is likely to face a Congress more apt than the current one to take strong action on climate change. He will then face a fateful choice: Does he want to spend his final two years in office blocking action and pretending that voluntary curbs on greenhouse gases will solve the problem of global warming, or does he want to help shape solutions? At some point, conservatives will need to reconcile themselves to the problem of climate change. Some leading Republicans -- Arizona Sen. John McCain and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, most notably -- have already taken strong stands on the question. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine that the intransigence of Mr. Bush's administration on climate change will long survive his tenure, no matter who succeeds him. Will he take a hand in developing America's response to this global problem, or will he go down as the president who fiddled while Greenland melted?

An engaged president could do much to change the political climate on climate -- which is already changing around Mr. Bush. It will take presidential leadership to put in place the sort of regulatory infrastructure necessary, over the long run, to move away from fossil fuels. Federal policy must put a price on emitting carbon into the atmosphere so that companies have an incentive to sequester carbon emissions and to develop energy sources that don't increase atmospheric greenhouse concentrations. This probably can't happen without a president willing to put his prestige and time into the issue.

Even short of a dramatic new initiative, Mr. Bush could alleviate the country's addiction to carbon by encouraging energy efficiency. His administration has already taken constructive steps on fuel economy standards, but those standards remain insufficiently ambitious. Likewise, a huge percentage of buildings in this country will be refurbished or replaced in the coming decades; aggressively pushing design features that maximize energy savings would reduce energy use enormously without much pain.

Ultimately, strong steps have to be taken; the chances of catastrophic consequences of global warming are too high to ignore. The longer policymakers wait, the more wrenching economically and culturally the steps are likely to prove. Mr. Bush spent his first six years emphasizing the undeniable need for more research; in his final two years, he could finally embrace the need to act.

This Land Is My Land (TIME)

By Margot Roosevelt

Time, October 30, 2006

For 60 years, three generations of Robert Blue's family have operated a luggage store at Hollywood and Vine, along the brass-starred Walk of Fame. Lucille Ball bought her suitcases there. The neighborhood fell into disrepair in recent years, though, with homeless people camping out on trash-strewn streets. Blue's shop was looking shabby too, its window displays outmoded, its linoleum worn. But when the City of Los Angeles moved to condemn his building--not to build a school or a fire station but to make way for a glitzy $500 million private hotel and condo complex--Blue dug in for what would become a three-year legal fight to save his store. "Big developers come along and say, 'Hey, that's a nice corner,'" he fumes. "Where will it stop?"

Blue won, and is now part of a movement that is pushing back hard against the government's power to meddle with property owners. The campaign is largely a response to the Supreme Court's controversial 2005 decision allowing the city of New London, Conn., to raze private homes for a commercial waterfront project. The ruling struck a deep chord in the American psyche; that the government could seize your house or business in order to build a road for everyone's use was one thing, but the idea that it could hand your property over to private developers was, to many, intolerable.

Since then, 24 state legislatures have passed laws limiting the government's ability to appropriate land for privately financed projects, and similar measures will be on 11 state ballots next week. Three of those initiatives, plus a fourth measure unrelated to eminent domain, would go even further--forcing governments to compensate anyone whose property lost value because of zoning, environmental or, in some cases, consumer-protection laws. That has opponents of these "regulatory takings" measures--in California, Arizona, Idaho and Washington--asking Blue's own question: "Where will it stop?"

California's Proposition 90, says Chris McKenzie, executive director of the California League of Cities, "is designed to eliminate virtually all government regulation." Environmentalists say that if it passes, California's coastal commission, unable to compensate everyone who wants to build along the oceanfront, would no longer be able to protect it from ugly McMansions and ensure public beach access. And developers could build homes on dangerously steep slopes or plop factories into residential neighborhoods. More imaginatively, the nonpartisan California Budget Project argues that because Prop 90 applies to consumer-protection laws, if the state restricted ATM fees, it would have to compensate banks for the revenue they would lose because of the capped charges.

Many of the claims are "hysterical gibberish," maintains Prop 90 spokesman Kevin Spillane, noting that compensation would be required only for "substantial" damage to property values. The initiative exempts health and safety regulations, he points out, and current zoning laws would still apply, protecting beaches and steep slopes, for instance. As for future laws, he argues, "if you own a piece of property that's zoned one way, then it is unfair for the government to change the rules." While California's initiative affects only future government actions, Washington's Initiative 933 allows landowners to file retroactive claims for changes in zoning rules over the past 10 years.

The four takings initiatives, which are largely funded by libertarian activist Howard Rich, a New York real estate investor, are modeled on a 2004 Oregon initiative. Measure 37 effectively overturned the country's strictest planning regime, a 30-year-old law that concentrated growth in cities while protecting farmland and open space. So far, aggrieved property owners have filed 2,724 claims seeking $6.1 billion in compensation. Under the law, local authorities can "pay or waive," and so far, strapped for funds, they are mostly choosing to waive zoning rules. As a result, some Oregonians fear that sprawl will soon strangle Portland's famous greenbelt.

For Robert Blue, back on Hollywood and Vine, the issue is fairness, whether the government seizes land or merely passes a law affecting the value of a home or business. "If you make an investment and the rules change," he says, "you should be compensated." It's up to his fellow taxpayers in California and the three other states to decide whether they are ready to pay up.

Does Barack Really Rock? (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

Rod's Grill, in Arcadia, Calif., has really been Manny Romero's grill since he bought the place 10 years ago. And in that decade, he has built a loyal following. So when the city wanted to seize the restaurant property through eminent domain and turn it over to a nearby car dealership seeking to expand, the community objected-and the restaurant survived. "I have the same right to do business ... as the Mercedes-Benz dealership," Romero insists.

He isn't the only one chafing under the current use of eminent domain. Twelve states-including California-will vote November 7 on limiting the government's ability to regulate and seize property. The ballot measures signal outrage at the Supreme Court's 2005 decision in Kelo v. New London, which seemed to broaden governmental power to take private land. But opponents of the measures see them as a misleading effort to further a radical property-rights agenda.

Eminent domain is not new, but it has typically been used to take property for obvious public uses, such as roads. In Kelo,the court held that seizing land for private projects that promoted economic development could qualify as public use. Since the decision, 31 states have already restricted the government's power of eminent domain. Most of the ballot measures would focus mainly on undoing Kelo. But the most aggressive initiatives-found in Arizona, California, Idaho, and Washington-would go further, requiring that the government also compensate property owners for "regulatory takings"-regulations that damage a property's value.

Zoning? Polling suggests all four regulatory takings initiatives will pass; backers are focusing on examples of eminent domain abuse. But Howard Rich, a New York real-estate investor who has spent millions of dollars trying to get the measures on the ballot, says, "It doesn't matter if government takes your property outright or regulates it to the point of little or no value; the result is the same."

Critics of the regulatory takings measures, including conservation and anti-tax groups, say they could strain government budgets or severely limit the ability to enforce environmental or zoning regulations. In Oregon, where a similar law has been on the books since 2004, the state has largely waived any sort of property restrictions rather than compensate landowners. Suzie

Kunzman, an alpaca farmer in Molalla, Ore., became a cautionary tale after her neighbor tried to build a gravel mine behind her house; that issue is still unresolved.

The eminent domain measures are among the boatload of ballot questions-205 in all-that voters will face this November. After sweeping 13 states in 2004, amendments banning gay marriage will be on the ballot in eight states; polls suggest most will pass. Voters don't seem quite as exercised about that issue as they were two years ago, but James Dobson, chairman of the evangelical group Focus on the Family, said last week that he hopes the decision by the New Jersey Supreme Court extending the benefits of marriage to same-sex couples will give the issue new urgency. Conservatives are also pushing to uphold a restrictive abortion ban in South Dakota (story, Page 36).

Liberals have ballot measures of their own, including efforts in six states to hike the minimum wage. State chambers of commerce are opposing those efforts but concede they are fighting an uphill battle.

Experts don't believe the crop of ballot measures will dramatically affect elections, but there could be exceptions. Former North Carolina senator-and possible 2008 presidential candidate-John Edwards said last week that minimum wage measures could boost Democratic prospects on Election Day by increasing turnout. In Nevada, Republican Don Chairez, a candidate for attorney general, openly credits his advocacy of the state's anti-Kelo initiative for his surprisingly strong poll numbers.

While the total number of ballot measures has varied in recent years, the number of initiatives-put on the ballot by collecting signatures-has been rising. The 76 initiatives in 2006 are the third highest in 100 years, a sign of both voter frustration with government and increasing attention to the initiative process. Many western ballots feature 10 or more measures, and some worry that voters are on the verge of being overwhelmed. "I've seen the ballot. It's like legal-size paper plus," says Jon Paul, who is coordinating Colorado's marriage initiative. Doing one's civic duty has become quite an undertaking.

Water From Ships Raises Fears About Harmful Species (AP)

AP, October 30, 2006

CHARLESTON, S.C. - Shipping companies and environmentalists are trying to come up with a reasonable cost method for keeping foreign marine species out of the waters of the nation's port cities.

The issue is particularly important for Charleston, where millions of gallons of ballast water are potentially dumped into the harbor each year.

Seawater is drawn and discharged by large ships for balance as they carry heavy cargo.

But when they carry water from one part of the world to another, they also bring animal and plant life that can harm native species and habitats.

U.S. Coast Guard Lieutenant Eddie Lesane said there have been no reports of invasive species in Charleston from ship ballast.

Steve de Kozlowski of the state Natural Resources Department says there are hundreds of species already loose in South Carolina, but only a few are destructive enough to be much of a problem.

"We are certainly an at-risk city, with our coastal waters extremely important for our economy and quality of life," said Nancy Vinson of the Coastal Conservation League. "It's high time we deal with these kinds of environmental and human health threats in an appropriate manner."

Ships are required to drop their foreign ballast water at least 200 miles offshore and pick up more local water.

Failing to do so can result in fines or charges. The Coast Guard reviews ship logs and occasionally checks ballast water for salinity to make sure the exchange has taken place.

No one has been charged in the United States so far, said Bivan Patnaik, Coast Guard environmental regulations coordinator. Several warning letters and fines less than $27,000 have been issued.

"The Coast Guard doesn't know anything about invasive species or water quality," said Tim Eichenberg of the Ocean Conservancy.

The conservancy wants the federal Environmental Protection Agency to set standards and issue permits for handling ballast and has won a court ruling that the water cannot be exempt from EPA regulations for wastewater discharge.

The EPA and U.S. Justice Department can appeal the decision and have two years to create regulations for ballast water.

Those regulations could include tighter enforcement of offshore exchange to filters or other forms of treatment of the ballast water.

In California, some ships are being outfitted with treatment devices that can cost as much as $500,000 for installation.

Among those is Matson, a Pacific Ocean container ship company.

The Hawaii-based company has had "a little more sensitivity" to environmental protection, said spokesman Jeff Hull. "I can't speak for the industry as a whole, but I think there's some momentum here with green initiatives."

But even with new regulations, there still is the problem of enforcement.

"How do you enforce it without putting an inspector on every ship in international waters?" asked EPA spokesman Dale Kemery.

As Houses Rise In The Wild, So Do Fire Concerns (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

BANNING, Calif., Oct. 29 -- Dennis Watkins wanted a piece of the good life. Several years ago, the Frito-Lay salesman and his wife bought a three-acre plot of land in the San Jacinto Mountains. In May, they completed their house -- a 3,000-square-foot ranch-style abode, 3,500 feet above the smog of western Riverside County.

"We built our dream house," Watkins, 54, enthused as he surveyed his estate. "We planned to retire here. After 14 years living in tract housing with no back yard, we loved the space."

A fire that started on Thursday roared through the mountains where Watkins lives. It burned 63 structures and 63 square miles, and it killed four firefighters while they tried to save a weekend house, making it the deadliest wildfire for firefighters since 2001. A fifth firefighter was in critical condition Sunday with burns over 95 percent of his body. Investigators said the fire was the work of an arsonist. As of Sunday, it was 70 percent contained.

Watkins's house was spared except for two windows that blew out because of the blaze's intensity. Flames roared past the house; charred chaparral now surrounds it. Still, Watkins said the inferno did not extinguish his desire to spend his golden years here. "It'll take two or three years for this to get back to normal," he said.

Watkins's journey from the suburbs to countryside -- and his brush with disaster -- has become increasingly common in the United States. He inhabits a zone known to experts and firefighters as the wildlands-urban interface -- the space where houses intermingle with wilderness, a space where millions of Americans long to live.

"It's the place where I want to live -- it's probably where you want to live, too. It's an attractive setting, but if we don't start planning development with these fires in mind, the problem is only going to get worse," said Volker C. Radeloff, an assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and an expert on the wildlands-urban interface.

In the 1990s, according to Radeloff's research, of the 13 million homes built in the United States, 9 million, or 69 percent, were constructed in these zones. California leads the nation with homes in these perilous districts -- with 5.1 million, up 12 percent since 1990 -- and it tops the nation in homes lost to wildfires. While many think the problem is confined to the West, New Jersey, because of the thousands of houses in and around the Pine Barrens, is second in the number of homes lost to wildfire. And 85 percent of New Hampshire homes are in the interface zone.

The development boom in forests and chaparral and along riverbeds has led some experts to question whether society can afford to have firefighters risk their lives to protect this lifestyle and whether federal, state and local governments should not limit development. Federal wildfire firefighting costs jumped 73 percent from 1994 to 2005, according to statistics from the National Interagency Fire Center. This year in California there have been 7,757 wildfires, many near populated areas.

The growth in the number and intensity of the blazes has prompted fire chiefs to acknowledge that "some fires can't be fought," said Walter Boyce, the director of the Wildlife Health Center at the University of California at Davis. "That's a notion fire chiefs didn't used to admit."

Now fire departments in California and elsewhere routinely take inventories of new houses to determine which can be protected if a fire erupts. "If we face a choice, we'll pick the house that has the best defensible space," said Janet Upton, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Forestry. She said she could not comment on what prompted the Forest Service fire crew to take a stand to save a house on Gorgonio View Road; that is the subject of a federal investigation.

On the plus side, houses more than ever can withstand fire. Watkins, for example, built his house with a fire-retardant composite roof and cleared a 200-foot brush-free buffer. Insurance rules in California would have caused his rates to triple if his house had a wood-shingle roof.

Still, with more people recolonizing America's wilderness, wildfires that used to erupt in isolation now invariably threaten property and lives.

"Every fire in California is not a fire, it's a rescue," Upton said, "because people don't defend their own homes or they live in the middle of a fuel region."

A turning point in how wildfires are viewed came in 2003 with a week-long blaze in several Southern Californian counties that killed 26 people, destroyed 3,361 homes and laid waste to more than 750,000 acres at the cost of more than $2 billion. Fire specialists argued that residents needed to understand that infernos such as these were going to grow more likely as more people move closer to wild areas.

While there is general agreement that the problem is going to worsen, how to deal with it is a subject of much debate. For one, Americans don't take kindly to being told where they can live. In California, thousands of houses have been built not just in the woods and in chaparral but along perilous earthquake fault lines and in the flood plains of the Sacramento River.

Secondly, with respect to Southern California's wildfires, there is much debate about mankind's role in their frequency and intensity. One school of thought, led by Richard Minnich of the University of California at Riverside, contends that the fire-suppression techniques have contributed to the blazes' ferocity.

During the summer, he said, firefighters quickly extinguish small lightning-caused fires that historically ignited the chaparral. As a result, in late October, when hot Santa Ana winds whip across the region from the southwest deserts, the brush is more overgrown than ever and the fires burn hotter, longer and farther. Minnich bases his conclusion on a comparison between Southern California and the nearby Mexican region of Baja California. Because of man's work, he said, Southern California is the home to huge destructive fires, whereas in Baja, where nature has been left to its own devices, "they have 10 times as many fires, but they are one-tenth the size."

Minnich's research is challenged by scientists led by Jon E. Keeley and Max A. Moritz of the University of California at Berkeley. They argue that disastrous wildfires in the chaparral are natural and therefore must be planned for, similar to earthquake and hurricane preparation.

Back along Twin Pines Road, near where the firefighters died, residents had displayed huge thank-you signs for the firefighters who protected their property. John Rutgers, one of Watkins's neighbors, was rooting around in his shed amazed that it, too, had escaped the blaze. Inside was his Toyota MR2 sports car with a full gas tank, a motorcycle, jugs of kerosene, paint thinner and other flammables. The wooden half of the shed looked like the remnants of a big campfire. But here in the cement half, only a little charcoal dust provided evidence of the blaze.

Rutgers, 55, said he, too, planned to start building his dream house later this year. Did the fire change his mind? "Not at all. The only thing it changed," he said, surveying a charred field of small trees and scrub brush, "is that this year it looks like we're not going to have to do weed control."

In D.C., It's Big Names Vs. A Litigious Developer (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

On a rustic and exclusive lane in Northwest Washington dating from the Civil War, the Battle of Chain Bridge Road is raging.

DOJ_NMG_0087779

A group of homeowners has been trying to stop the construction of 13 mansions on 3.5 acres, the largest piece of open land in the affluent Palisades neighborhood.

In most zoning disputes, residents might testify at public hearings. But in a neighborhood filled with boldfaced names, the fight is on a different level.

The neighbors -- including NBC News correspondent Andrea Mitchell, her husband, former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan, and former Environmental Protection Agency deputy administrator Robert Sussman -- have hired a zoning attorney, an arborist, a traffic expert and a storm water management engineer. To date, they've spent nearly $100,000.

Then again, they're facing Morton A. Bender.

"We tried to do this the old-fashioned way," Mitchell said. "But we're up against a developer with the deepest of pockets and no sense of community obligation. Sure, people here have resources. But believe me, there's a lot better ways I'd prefer to spend my money."

Bender, a 73-year-old native Washingtonian who made a fortune in the family construction business, is one of the most determined men in town, both admirers and detractors say. This is not a man who likes to negotiate. He enjoys a good fight.

The local and federal courts hold stacks of cases in which he is sometimes the defendant but more often the plaintiff. He says he can't keep track of all the people and institutions he's currently suing and doesn't know how many lawyers he's hired. "I saw the mayor at an event, and he said, 'How many cases do you have against the District?' and I said 'a few,' " Bender said.

His affection for his fellow combatants is so great that when he threw a birthday party years ago, he invited only his lawyers. About 30 came to the restaurant, where Bender hung a "Bender's Barristers Club" sign and handed out diplomas from "Bender Law School."

"He thoroughly enjoys a good controversy and draws strength from it," said Stephen Joel Trachtenberg, the president of George Washington University, where Bender is a generous donor. "He's a very nuanced and complicated man. It's not as if those descriptions of him as a tough guy are wrong. He is a man with many sides to him. If attacked, he fights back with everything. If he thinks you are wrong, he's not a man who understands the meaning of the word 'compromise.' But at the same time, he is very funny and charitable."

Bender, who lost a son to AIDS in 1995, donates heavily to programs that fight the disease. "He's personally given away hundreds of thousands of dollars to a whole panoply of programs from pediatric AIDS to the transgendered community," said D.C. Council member David A. Catania (I-At Large), who chairs the committee on health care. "To be sure, he is a very complicated character. I've never met someone with such a capacity of determination. I would never want to be on the other side of Morty Bender."

When he split from his first wife in 1977, Bender not only sued her for divorce based on adultery, he filed suit against her lover for "criminal conversation," an ancient legal theory that holds a husband has exclusive rights to his wife's affection and can sue anyone who interferes. Bender won.

In July, Bender gave his second wife, Grace, a 60th birthday party at the Mandarin Oriental Hotel. The couple transformed the space into Hotel Nacional, a Havana landmark where Grace Bender grew up as the daughter of the hotel manager. They flew in cigar rollers from Miami for the 350 guests, hired two Latin bands and commissioned a cake reproduction of the Nacional from a celebrity baker in Manhattan. Morton Bender balked at the hotel's charge for 20 pounds of caviar and insisted on bringing in his own, less expensive caviar. The catering director objected. Bender won.

Bender is currently suing Independence Federal Savings Bank, the District bank where he is the largest shareholder. He tried to take control of the bank last fall, but shareholders rejected his candidates for the board of directors. So Bender filed suit, alleging that the election was tainted by improprieties. In the preliminary stage, Bender won.

When Bender realized that the law firm representing him before the zoning board on the Chain Bridge Road project was also representing Independence in its fight against him, he pointed out the conflict, he said. The firm stopped representing him. The lawyer involved, Holland and Knight partner Norman "Chip" Glasgow Jr., declined to comment.

"I'm fit to be tied," Bender said. "I'm going to sue them."

For years, Bender has wrangled with the District over the tax rate for six vacant historic buildings on N Street NW near the Tabard Inn. He bought them 18 years ago for $8 million cash and has tried to win approval to turn them into a hotel.

He has also fought the city over its assessment of his home, the former Korean Embassy in Massachusetts Avenue Heights. The city assessed the eight-bedroom, nine-bath house resembling a French chateau at $3.2 million in 2002; Bender argued it was worth $2.2 million, and the taxes should have been lower. He lost that one.

"I stand up to be counted," Bender is fond of saying. "No one stands up for rights anymore."

The Battle of Chain Bridge Road comes to a head tomorrow, when the Board of Zoning Adjustment holds the fifth and final hearing on the matter. It began in 2002, when Bender paid $6 million for two pieces of land on the road.

DOJ_NMG_0087780

One tract was anchored by a modest house, which Bender demolished. The smaller lot held the vacant Chain Bridge Road School, used by the children of freed slaves who lived along the road after the Civil War. The original one-room 1865 schoolhouse was replaced by a two-floor stucco structure in 1923, which closed as a school in 1941 but remained on the property.

Right after Bender bought the lots, the neighbors got the school named a historic landmark, ensuring he couldn't knock it down and limiting the development potential.

"They started the war," Bender said.

Early discussions between Bender and the neighbors about his plans went nowhere. He ended up suing one neighbor over a retaining wall that encroached 15 inches onto his new property. He won in D.C. Superior Court but not before the judge questioned why Bender brought the case.

"It seems to be the height of folly, laced with a bit of vindictiveness the source of which is unknown to the court, for plaintiff to insist that this attractive and necessary wall be removed simply so that it can be reconstructed about two feet further down the hill," Judge Geoffrey M. Alprin wrote.

Under current zoning laws, Bender can build nine houses on Chain Bridge Road, said Maxine Brown Roberts of the D.C. Planning Office. Asked why he wants to build 13, Bender sketched on a piece of paper how he can maximize profits from 13 houses. His plans meet the minimum lot requirements under the zoning rules, he said.

If the neighbors wanted lower density, they should have petitioned the city to increase the lot requirements, he said. The houses, one of which would be nearly 10,000 square feet, would sell between $3 million and $5 million each, he said.

Across the street is Battery Kemble Park, a former Union Army fort, where dog walkers chat about Bender's plans. "People are just furious that someone would come who doesn't care about the neighborhood and would put 13 mansions on 3.5 acres," said Hattie Babbitt, wife of former Interior secretary Bruce Babbitt, who walks their German shorthaired pointer in the park.

Like many residential streets in the District and close-in suburbs, Chain Bridge Road has been under development pressure. Aging homeowners have sold, and newcomers are replacing modest houses with towering homes.

"Suddenly, a three-story house goes up next to you -- the light gets cut off half the day, and the vegetable garden you had last year won't grow because there's no sun," said Alma Gates, the advisory neighborhood commissioner, who has lived in there since 1969.

To slow the trend, the neighborhood persuaded the city in 1999 to enact zoning rules that protect mature trees and limit development there.

"We've reached our limit," said Mitchell, adding that neighbors would have backed Bender had he planned six to eight houses. "But to talk about 13 houses is completely disrespectful of the land."

If Bender wins, she says she will sell. "I can't imagine staying in the neighborhood if those houses come in," said Mitchell, who has lived in an 1894 farmhouse for 30 years.

City agencies that reviewed Bender's plan have issued conflicting opinions. The Planning Office recommended approval if Bender dropped one house and lowered the height of another, among other conditions. But the city's Urban Forestry Administration said the zoning board should reject the plan because it violates the special zoning protection for mature trees.

Bender has at least one ally on the street. "Every time someone wants to build a house in this neighborhood, the neighbors get all excited," said Bernard Gewirz, an acquaintance of Bender's. "It's 'I've got mine, and keep the other people out.' "

If they lose before the zoning board, the neighbors say they will probably take Bender to court. And if Bender loses, he might do the same.

Or not.

"I can put a farm over there," he said. "I was thinking of pigs and peacocks. Peacocks make a hell of a racket."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Suspect Held In Slaying Of Fla. Family (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

(AP) A family of four was gunned down execution-style along a dark and deserted stretch of highway. Each was lying down or kneeling, and the mother was clutching her two young sons.

Authorities announced Friday it was no random act of violence, and that the Escobedos fell prey to a dangerous drug trade. The suspected killer was in custody, they said.

Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, was likely involved in cocaine trafficking, and he and his family were killed "for drugs, money or both," Sheriff Ken Mascara said.

The suspect was among three men and a woman who were arrested Wednesday on drug charges and are "persons of interest" in the killings, Mascara said. None had been charged with the slayings, and another man is being sought, he said.

The sheriff identified the drug suspects as Danny Varela, 26, Liana Lopez, 18, and Daniel Troya and Ricardo Sanchez, both 23.

A fifth man, Juan Gutierrez, was arrested and charged in the drug case but is not named as a person of interest in the slayings. He told authorities he and Varela were at the Escobedos' home before the killings and helped destroy drug packaging materials, according to court papers.

The five made their initial appearances in federal court Friday in Fort Pierce, said Jeannette Moran, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman. A bond hearing was set for Nov. 3. All the suspects have lengthy criminal records, including arrests for burglary, drugs and weapons possession.

Escobedo, his 25-year-old wife, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, and their sons, Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3, were found shot to death Oct. 13 along Florida's Turnpike near Port St. Lucie, about 50 miles north of their home in the Palm Beach County city of Greenacres.

Police searching the home after the killings found evidence that the father was involved in drug trafficking, Drug Enforcement Administration agent David Weeks said in court papers filed Friday. The items were said to include "suspected drug ledgers" and plastic packaging used to wrap illegal drugs.

Investigators linked the drug suspects to Escobedo through references in the ledgers, among other things, Weeks said.

A search of the West Palm Beach home where three of the men under arrest were living turned up suspected cocaine, Ecstasy and drug packaging materials, the DEA agent said. Investigators also found more than a dozen guns, including an AK-47 assault rifle. Weeks did not say if the weapons were used in the killings.

There also was a photograph of Escobedo with one of the suspects, according to court papers.

The sheriff would not say which of the suspects is believed to have shot the family. But he told The Associated Press that it appeared those responsible for the killings were in custody.

"Indications are that there may be homicide charges filed," said Troya's lawyer, Ruben Garcia. "That's all I can tell you right now."

Lopez's attorney, Ronald Chapman, said he had just been assigned the case and wasn't prepared to comment. Messages left for the other suspects' attorneys were not returned.

Investigators believe the family's Jeep was pulled to the side of the highway and that someone inside the vehicle shot the family and drove away. The Jeep was found abandoned in West Palm Beach three days later.

The family had moved to Florida in June from the Brownsville, Texas, area.

The sheriff said Escobedo's brother was involved in a heroin ring and is believed to be a fugitive in Mexico.

Suspect In Custody In Slaying Of Family; Drug Connection Is Seen (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. - Authorities investigating the slaying of a family of four alongside a Florida highway said Friday that the father was probably involved in drug trafficking and that the suspected killer was in custody.

The suspect was among three men and a woman who were arrested Wednesday on drug charges and are "persons of interest" in the killings, St. Lucie County Sheriff Ken Mascara said. No one has been charged in the slayings.

The couple and their two young sons were found shot to death Oct. 13 off a desolate stretch of Florida's Turnpike near Port St. Lucie, about 50 miles north of their home in the Palm Beach County city of Greenacres.

Police searching the victims' home after the killings found evidence that the dead father, Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, had been involved in cocaine trafficking, Drug Enforcement Administration agent David Weeks said in court papers filed Friday. The items included "suspected drug ledgers" and plastic packaging used to wrap illegal narcotics.

Investigators linked the drug suspects to Escobedo through references in the ledgers that included detailed accounts of drug payments and debts owed, among other things, the DEA agent said.

A search of the West Palm Beach home where the three male suspects were living turned up suspected cocaine, Ecstasy and drug packaging materials, the agent said. Investigators also found more than a dozen guns, including an AK-47 assault rifle. The DEA agent did not say if the weapons were used in the killings.

There was also a photograph of Escobedo with one of the suspects, Danny Varela, 26, according to court papers. The sheriff identified the other suspects as Liana Lopez, 18, Daniel Troya, 23, and Ricardo Sanchez, 23.

Mascara would not say which of the suspects is believed to have shot Escobedo, his 25-year-old wife, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, and their sons, Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3. But he told The Associated Press that it appeared those responsible for the killings were in custody.

The four suspects are charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

A fifth man, Juan Gutierrez, was also arrested and charged in the drug case but he is not named as a person of interest in the slayings. According to court papers, he was cooperating with authorities, and told them that he and Varela were at the Escobedo's home before the killings and helped destroy drug packaging materials.

Officials also cleared Michael James Naujalis, of Lake Worth, of involvement in the case. Naujalis was the last registered owner of a 1999 red Dodge conversion van that authorities believe was involved in the murders. Naujalis had sold the van in August to Varela, but Varela had never completed the transfer of title and ownership.

DEA spokeswoman Jeannette Moran said they made their initial appearances in federal court Friday in Fort Pierce. A bond hearing was set for Nov. 3. All the suspects have lengthy criminal records, including arrests for burglary, drugs and weapons possession.

Lopez's attorney, Ronald Chapman, said Friday he had just been assigned the case by the federal court and wasn't prepared to comment. Troya's attorney, Ruben Garcia, also said he had just been assigned the case.

"Indications are that there may be homicide charges filed," Garcia said Friday. "That's all I can tell you right now."

Telephone messages left for the other suspects' attorneys were not immediately returned.

Mascara said the investigation of the deaths quickly led them to believe this was a deliberate act on the family for drugs, money or both.

Investigators believe the family's Jeep was pulled to the side of the highway sometime between 1:30 a.m. and 3 a.m., and that someone inside the vehicle shot them and drove away. Authorities have said the victims appeared to be lying down or kneeling when they were shot. The woman was clutching her two sons in an apparent effort to protect them.

The Jeep was found abandoned in West Palm Beach three days later.

The family had moved to Florida in June from the Brownsville, Texas, area.

The sheriff said Escobedo's brother was involved in a heroin ring and is believed to be a fugitive in Mexico, but he said that case has no relation to the killings.

Suspect in killing of family in custody

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- Authorities investigating the slaying of a family of four alongside a Florida highway said yesterday that the father probably was involved in drug trafficking and that the suspected killer was in custody.

The suspect was among three men and a woman who were arrested Wednesday on drug charges and are "persons of interest" in the killings, Sheriff Ken Mascara said. None had been charged with the slayings, he said. Another man is being sought, he said.

The couple and their two young sons were found fatally shot Oct. 13 off a stretch of Florida's Turnpike near Port St. Lucie, about 50 miles north of their home in the Palm Beach County city of Greenacres.

Police searching the home after the killings found evidence that the father, Jose Luis Escobedo, was involved in drug trafficking, Drug Enforcement Administration agent David Weeks said in court papers filed yesterday.

Soldier arraigned on murder charges

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. -- The Army arraigned a 101st Airborne Division soldier yesterday who was charged with raping and killing a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and killing three others in her family.

Pfc. Bryan L. Howard is accused of plotting in March to rape and kill the teenager in Mahmoudiya, a village about 20 miles south of Baghdad. Three other soldiers and a former Army private from the division's 502nd Infantry Regiment also face charges related to the attack.

Pfc. Howard deferred entering a plea during the proceedings at Fort Campbell. Both his attorney, Capt. Ryan Rosauer, and his father, Lynn Howard, declined to speak to reporters.

Two other soldiers accused of rape and murder in the incident -- Sgt. Paul E. Cortez and Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman -- could get the death sentence if they are convicted, a military judge ruled earlier this month. Both will be arraigned soon, the military said.

Former Army Pvt. Steve Green also faces rape and murder charges but is being tried in federal court.

Clinton office searched for powdery substance

DOJ_NMG_0087783

NEW YORK -- Police and Secret Service agents determined yesterday that a suspicious substance found at former President Bill Clinton's office in Manhattan was not toxic.

Mr. Clinton was not at the office at the time, officials said. A woman opened an envelope that contained a white powdery substance and called authorities.

Police and emergency crews were called to the Harlem office building about 3:45 p.m. Yellow police tape blocked off the sidewalk in front of the building, but traffic was not disrupted.

Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said the building was not evacuated. He had no other details.

Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren said a field test on the substance found it to be inert.

Killer confessed to more murders

SHREVEPORT, La. -- Shortly before he was executed in Florida this week, serial killer Danny Rolling handed his spiritual adviser a handwritten confession to a grisly triple murder 17 years ago in his hometown of Shreveport, police said yesterday.

"I, and I alone am guilty," the one-page note said. "It was my hand that took those precious lights out of this ole dark world. With all my heart & soul would I could bring them back."

Rolling, the son of a Shreveport police officer, was executed Wednesday for killing five college students in Gainesville, Fla., in a string of slayings in 1990.

Police have long suspected that Rolling also stabbed William T. Grissom, 55, his daughter, Julie, 24, and grandson Sean, 8, as they got ready for dinner on Nov. 4, 1989, in Mr. Grissom's home.

4 Are Linked To The Killing Of A Family On A Roadside (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 27 — Four people were arrested on Wednesday on federal drug charges and linked to the shooting deaths of a family of four this month, the St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office said Friday.

One victim may have been involved in drug dealings with the suspects, officials said.

Sheriff Ken Mascara said his office "now considers these four individuals people of interest" in the killing of the Escobedo family, Jose Luis Escobedo, 28; his wife, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, 25; and their sons, Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3. Their bodies were found on Oct. 13 on a remote part of Florida's Turnpike near Port St. Lucie, 120 miles north of Miami.

"Our investigation quickly leads us to believe that this was a deliberate act of premeditated murder on the Escobedo family for drugs, money or both," Sheriff Mascara said.

The four suspects, Liana Lopez, 18; Ricardo Sanchez, 23; Daniel Troya, also 23; and Danny Varela, 26, were charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute after a search of their house in West Palm Beach turned up what appeared to be cocaine, as well as Ecstasy tablets, drug packaging and 13 firearms, the authorities said. A photograph of Mr. Varela and Mr. Escobedo was also found.

The suspects, all of whom have extensive criminal records, have not been charged in the killings, but the police have said they think that the person who pulled the trigger is in the group.

In a search of the Escobedos' house in Greenacres, investigators recovered "items which led them to conclude that the home may have been utilized to facilitate narcotics trafficking," David Weeks, an agent from the Drug Enforcement Administration, wrote in an affidavit.

Among the items found were plastic packaging and "suspected drug ledgers," one of which listed nicknames that, the affidavit said, were thought to refer to Mr. Sanchez and Ms. Lopez under the title "Money that needs to get paid."

Investigators said they thought the family, which moved here from the Brownsville, Tex., region several months ago, had been traveling with their killer in their Jeep Cherokee when the car pulled to the roadside. Each family member was shot several times on the grass outside the S.U.V. by someone inside who presumably used it as a getaway vehicle, officials said.

Ms. Escobedo had cradled the children under her arms to try to protect them from the gunfire, the police said. The vehicle was recovered three days later in an industrial section of West Palm Beach, 70 miles south of the crime scene.

Florida Holding Four People In Highway Murder Investigation (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Florida authorities are holding four people in connection with the slayings of a family whose bodies were found on the side of the state turnpike, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0087784

The four ``persons of interest'' are being held on drug charges in Palm Beach County, according to sheriff's officials from St. Lucie County, where the victims were found. The four haven't been charged in the killings, the St. Lucie County officials said in a televised news conference.

Police have found a van they had sought in connection with the crimes and are searching for its registered owner, they said.

The bodies of a man, a woman and two young boys were found Oct. 13 on the south side of the turnpike in Fort Pierce, about 125 miles (201 kilometers) north of Miami in St. Lucie County.

The man's brother may be connected to a large cocaine- and heroin-trafficking ring, police said in the news conference. Officials from the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives assisted in the investigation.

All four suspects, three men and one woman, all have felony convictions for cocaine trafficking, police said.

Family's Killing Linked To Drugs, Money (STCN)

Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers, October 28, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Two weeks after a family of four was gunned down on the side of Florida's Turnpike, investigators said the crime was related to the theft of drugs and money and named several "people of interest" believed connected to the killings.

However, a man named as the owner of a van sought in the case was cleared of any involvement. Michael James Naujalis, 24, of Lake Worth, sold the van to one of the suspects, who failed to transfer the title and registration, St. Lucie County Sheriff Ken Mascara said in a press release late Friday.

Though Naujalis was not involved, the van still is believed to have been used in the murders, Mascara said.

Four of five people arrested on federal drug charges in West Palm Beach remain "people of interest" in the Oct. 13 slaying of the Escobedo family.

"We are looking at these individuals as being connected to the murders," Mascara said during a news conference in Palm Beach County on Friday. "We have a very good idea of how it went down, but we don't want to reveal it."

Liana Lopez, 18; Daniel Troya, 23; Daniel Varela, 26; and Ricardo Sanchez, 23, were in custody on drug charges and are "people of interest" in the deaths of Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife, Yessica, 25, and their sons Luis Damien, 4, and Luis Julian, 3.

A fifth man, Juan C. Gutierrez, 20, of West Palm Beach, has been charged in the drug case but is not connected to the killings, authorities said.

The family's execution was not random or a revenge killing but "a deliberate act of premeditated murder" related to the "ongoing" theft of drugs, money or both that "culminated" on the side of the turnpike, Mascara said.

Jose Luis Escobedo and his younger brother, Jose Manuel Escobedo, 28, had drug charges in their past. Their criminal histories do relate to the crime, Mascara said.

Within 24 hours of the killings, the Drug Enforcement Administration was involved, and within 36 hours they had identified the people of interest named Friday. The individuals knew the Escobedo family, Mascara said.

When asked if the killer was in custody, the sheriff said, "We would hope so."

The five made their first appearances in federal court in Fort Pierce Friday morning and are expected to appear in court for a detention hearing next Friday. All are charged with possession with intent to distribute 500 or more grams of cocaine between May and October 2006.

'MADE PROGRESS'

"Investigators have worked day and night on this case for the past two weeks," he said. "We have made progress, but we need more information."

The family were natives of Brownsville, Texas, who had lived in Greenacres for only a few months before their deaths. They were buried in Brownsville on Monday in a ceremony attended by hundreds of friends and relatives.

Yessica's brother, Mike Guerrera, of Brownsville, said by phone he didn't know what to say about the accusations that his brother-in-law was involved in the drug trade.

"Even if my brother-in-law was doing something, it's not right to kill the kids like that," he said. "I hope we get justice done."

If the people in custody are responsible, Guerrera said he will feel somewhat relieved to know the killers are caught.

"Those kinds of people being loose — you never know if it could happen to another family," he said.

SEARCHING THE HOMES

After the Escobedo family was shot to death, investigators searched their home in Greenacres and found "items which led them to conclude that the home may have been utilized to facilitate narcotics trafficking," according to an affidavit filed in the case.

Investigators found suspected drug ledgers and plastic packaging materials typically used for wrapping "narcotic substances into kilogram quantities." One of the ledgers contained a list called "Money that needs to get paid."

The ledger pointed investigators to Varela, Sanchez and Lopez, whose nicknames were all listed in one of the books. On Oct. 25, a search warrant was served at a home in West Palm Beach, where Mascara said Troya and Sanchez lived and Lopez and Varela were frequent visitors.

Hundreds of grams of cocaine powder and crack cocaine were found in various rooms, along with tablets of MDMA, also known as ecstasy. Thirteen guns, including an AK-47 in a closet, were found in the house.

A photo in the home showed Varela and Escobedo, the affidavit states.

Although many guns were removed from the home, it was not clear whether any were used to kill the Escobedos, Mascara said.

Sheriff Calls Drug Suspects 'People Of Interest' In Death Of Parents, Two Young Sons (FLSUNSEN)

By Jerome Burdi, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 28, 2006

West Palm Beach · Jose Escobedo was caught up in a web of drugs, guns and money. He brought his wife and two young boys from Texas and got involved with drug dealers and traffickers. At least one of them shot all four Escobedos to death on a dark stretch of Florida's Turnpike.

Yessica Escobedo was found sheltering her sons in her arms.

The St. Lucie County sheriff and federal documents on Friday began painting a picture of the ruthless homicides and the people authorities think are responsible.

"These people all do know each other. We do not feel it was a revenge killing," St. Lucie County Sheriff Ken Mascara said. "We think it was either related to the theft of drugs or money or both."

At a news conference, Mascara named four "people of interest" in the Escobedo family homicide. They are in federal custody after the Drug Enforcement Administration on Wednesday night raided their rented West Palm Beach home, in the 6400 block of Garden Court in the Briar Bay development.

They are Ricardo Sanchez and Daniel Troya, both 23; Daniel Varela, 26; and Liana Lopez, 18, of Greenacres. They are being held without bond in the Palm Beach County Jail, facing federal charges of cocaine possession with intent to sell. No one has been charged in the Escobedo killings.

The four appeared in federal court in Fort Pierce on Friday and were assigned attorneys, said Alicia Valle, special counsel to the U.S. Attorney's Office. They are scheduled to return to court Friday.

Juan Gutierrez, 20, was arrested on the drug charges with the others Wednesday but is not connected to the killings, investigators said.

The search Wednesday turned up cocaine, crack and Ecstasy; 13 guns in the garage; and an assault rifle in the master bedroom, according to the U.S. Attorney Office's criminal complaint. The guns are being tested for a connection to the killings, St. Lucie Sheriff's Lt. Jerry Rothman said.

Authorities turned up a photo of Varela with Jose Escobedo.

During an Oct. 14 search of the Escobedo home in Greenacres, local authorities concluded that the home might have been used for drug trafficking, according to the complaint.

They found drug ledgers with names and initials, figures and notations to calculate debt and payment, the complaint reads. Some of the initials and nicknames match the drug suspects. Another list read "Money that needs to get paid," according to the complaint.

Escobedo had computer printouts of jail booking photographs of Sanchez and Lopez, who had been charged with probation violation and drug charges, respectively.

The DEA was brought into the homicide investigation within the first 36 hours, when authorities had an idea who killed Escobedo, 28; his wife, Yessica, 25; and sons Luis Damien, 4, and Luis Julian, 3. Their bodies were found Oct. 13 along a desolate stretch of the turnpike in Port St. Lucie.

The Escobedos moved from Brownsville, Texas, to Greenacres in June.

"We think the theft of drugs and money was an ongoing theft and it culminated on the shoulder of the Florida Turnpike," Mascara said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0087786

Detectives began looking at drug involvement when they traveled to Texas, confirming that Escobedo's brother, Jose Manuel Escobedo, was involved in heroin and cocaine trafficking. He is a fugitive from federal authorities and believed to be in Matamoros, Mexico, Mascara said.

The four well-known drug suspects have 27 felony arrests among them on drugs, robbery and battery charges, Mascara said. Troya has spent five years in prison between two convictions, including burglary, battery and grand theft, according to the state Department of Corrections.

"The entire community has been up in arms about this homicide," Mascara said. "We receive calls daily about people being fearful."

Neighbors said the four-bedroom, single-family house in the gated Briar Bay community was quiet, with comings and goings at night. Varela, Sanchez and Troya lived there and Lopez, Varela's girlfriend, visited often, according to the complaint.

St. Lucie County investigators Friday cleared the owner of a red van thought to have been used in the murders. Michael Naujalis, 23, of Lake Worth, sold the van to Varela in August but never removed his license plat, and Varela never completed the transfer of title.

Investigators: Escobedo Home Used For Drug Trafficking (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 27, 2006

FORT PIERCE — When investigators searched the rented Greenacres home of the family found gunned down on the side of Florida's Turnpike, they found items that led them to believe the home was used to "facilitate narcotics trafficking," according to court documents obtained this morning.

Among the items discovered at the home at 1244 Olympic Circle, where Jose Luis Escobedo Jr and his wife and two children lived, were: suspected drug ledgers in the form of handwritten lists of names and figures; documents containing a running tabulation of debts and payments and plastic packaging materials typically used to wrap narcotics into kilogram quantities, according to the court documents.

One of the ledger's found was titled: "Money that needs to get paid."

"The evidence seized from the Escobedo residence, combined with information obtained during interviews with family members and associates of the victims, led law enforcement officers to conclude that Jose Luis Escobedo Jr. was likely involved in cocaine trafficking activities before he was murdered on or about October 13, 2006," according to a criminal complaint.

The items found in the home led investigators to five people who were arrested Thursday night on federal charges of possession with the intent to distribute 500 grams of cocaine. The five defendants were in federal court in Fort Pierce this morning for their first appearance.

During the homicide investigation, investigators found evidence linking Danny Varela, 26; Daniel Troya, 23; and Ricardo Sanchez Jr, 23. to Escobedo, according to the complaint. They executed a search warrant on Wednesday at Varela's home at 6458 Garden Court in West Palm Beach. The other two men are also from West Palm Beach.

In that home, they found crack and powder cocaine, ecstasy, what appeared to be packing material for kilograms of cocaine and 13 firearms, according to the complaint. They also discovered drug paraphernalia, such as scales, a suspected drug ledger and razor blades. In a bedroom closet, they found an "AK-47-style assault rifle," the documents state.

Two other people were arrested in connection with this case: Liana Lee Lopez, 18, of Greenacres and Juan C. Gutierez, 20 of West Palm Beach.

Suspects In Escobedo Case 'seemed Like Drug Dealers' (FPTRIB)

By DEREK SIMMONSEN And GABRIEL MARGASAK, staff writers

Fort Pierce Tribune, October 30, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — The alleged drug dealers hid in plain sight amid the quiet gated neighborhood of Briar Bay.

They stashed their hundreds of grams of crack and powder cocaine, their Ecstasy pills and a small armory of guns in an almost 3,000-square foot home. But neighbors suspected something with all the flashy cars and comings and goings at all hours.

Yet the operation's downfall would come at the end of the trail of blood from a family of four killed on the shoulder of Florida's Turnpike about two weeks ago.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents announced Friday they had arrested five people at the home on cocaine distribution charges. St. Lucie County Sheriff Ken Mascara said four of them were "people of interest" in the killings of Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife, Yessica, 25, and their sons Luis Damien, 4, and Luis Julian, 3.

Officials said Jose Luis Escobedo was part of the drug operation and his family had been killed because of it.

None of his alleged drug associates had been charged in the killings as of Saturday.

Investigators did clear the owner of a 1999 Red Dodge conversion van thought to have been used in the killings.

Lake Worth resident Michael James Naujalis, 23, was the registered owner but said he sold the van to Daniel Varela, 26, a person of interest in the killings and one of the five arrested on drug charges last week. Varela never transferred the title.

"After extensive questioning and review of the sale documentations, Naujalis has been cleared of any involvement in the murders. The van, which was previously owned by Naujalis, continues to play a pivotal part in the murders," Mascara said in a statement.

Steve Naujalis, Michael Naujalis's father, told WPTV News Channel 5 reporter Marci Gonzalez that his son met Varela while fishing but didn't know anything about the drug operation.

"My kid's scared for his life. Wouldn't you be?" he told Gonzalez. "We know how this works ... court date's over, then my kid's a target for everybody, right?"

St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office officials and other agencies declined to release any further information in the case Saturday. One law enforcement official said authorities would remain tight lipped so as not to upset the ongoing murder investigation.

In West Palm Beach, those who lived near the alleged drug house said the residents of one house on Garden Court stood out among a population that includes many families and older residents.

Federal drug agents said Daniel Troya, 23, Ricardo Sanchez, 23, and Varela lived there. Varela's supposed girlfriend Liana Lopez, 18, also spent time there.

Mascara said the suspects had 27 felony arrests among them on drugs, robbery and battery charges, Mascara said.

Troya has spent five years in prison on burglary, battery and grand theft convictions, according to the state Department of Corrections.

Sanchez cousin, Juan C. Gutierrez, 20, who was also arrested on the drug charge, said he also spent time at the home but authorities said he was not connected to the killings.

The front yard was well-kept with several palm trees outside and children rode bicycles and played in the street out front.

But Kristen Sacks, 32, who lives a few doors down from the home, said people came in and out of the house at all hours of the day and night and they tended to drive flashy, customized cars, like what you see in the movies.

"They seemed different from the rest of the neighbors," she said. "They seemed like drug dealers to us."

Although learning they were arrested on drug charges didn't come as a shock, she was surprised to hear they might be suspected of murder.

Maricela Rocha, 39, who lives next door to the home, said the new neighbors moved in about two months earlier.

"Most of the neighbors, we know each other, we talk to each other," she said. "They never talked to anyone."

Men Allegedly Linked To Highway Killings (UPI)

United Press International, October 28, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 28 (UPI) -- Florida police Saturday had in custody four men allegedly tied to the execution-style killing of a family of four on a deserted stretch of highway.

Police said at least one of the four men, ranging in age from 18 to 26, killed Jose Escobedo, 28, his wife Yessica, 25, and their two children, Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3, The Palm Beach Post reported.

The family was found shot to death Oct. 13 along Florida's Turnpike near Port St. Lucie, about 50 miles north of their home in Greenacres.

Escobedo was involved with drug traffickers and he and his family were killed "for drugs, money or both," Sheriff Ken Mascara said.

No one was immediately charged in the Escobedo killings.

The four men in custody, held without bond, face federal charges of cocaine possession with intent to sell.

Sheriff: Parents, Kids Killed For Drugs, Money Or Both (CNN)

CNN, October 30, 2006

FORT PIERCE, Florida (CNN) -- Investigators believe the killings of a family of four along Florida's Turnpike this month were premeditated and carried out for "drugs, money or both," St. Lucie County Sheriff Ken Mascara said Friday.

Four people -- a woman and three men -- are in custody on federal drug charges unrelated to the deaths, Mascara said, and they and the missing brother of one of the victims "all do know each other."

"We do not feel it was a revenge killing," Mascara said at a Friday morning news conference. "We think it was related to either the theft of drugs and money or both." (Watch police explain their theory as to what motivated killings -- 1:57)

The four have been identified as "persons of interest" in connection with the October shooting deaths along Florida's Turnpike, the sheriff said.

An official with the St. Lucie County sheriff's office said after the news conference, "We feel comfortable the shooter or shooters is one of these people."

But he added, "We are not ready to charge the shooter or shooters yet."

The drug suspects have been identified as Lianna Lopez, 18, of Greenacres, Florida, and West Palm Beach residents Daniel Troya, 23, Danny Varela, 26, and Ricardo Sanchez, 23.

They appeared in court for the first time Friday on the drug charges. They're being detained at the Palm Beach County Jail.

On October 13, a motorist found the bodies of four family members on the turnpike north of Port St. Lucie. The victims were identified as Jose Luis Escobedo Jr., 28; his wife, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, 25; and the couple's sons, Luis Damian Escobedo, 3, and Luis Julian Escobedo, 4. All four had been shot to death, autopsies showed.

Authorities said the four were kneeling or lying down when shot.

Mascara has said the family had recently moved from Brownsville, Texas, to West Palm Beach, about an hour south of where the bodies were found. A vehicle believed to belong to the family was found a few days after the slayings, which occurred in St. Lucie County.

Mascara said authorities are searching for the husband's younger brother, Jose Manuel Escobedo, who did not show up for a federal work camp in Louisiana after being sentenced on a drug conspiracy charge. He had been involved in a "significant heroin and cocaine distribution organization," the sheriff said.

About 24 hours after the slayings, said Mascara, the Drug Enforcement Administration became involved in the probe. As the result of the DEA investigation, a Palm Beach County residence was searched Wednesday morning.

"I cannot reveal the nature of the evidence recovered in that search," Mascara said. "However, I can tell you that investigators are reviewing any possible connection of that evidence to the Escobedo murders."

He added, "Despite the crime's initial appearance as a possible random act of violence on a family traveling on the Florida turnpike, our investigation quickly led us to believe this was a deliberate act of premeditated murder on the family for drugs, money or both."

Thursday night, the St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office issued a nationwide bulletin for a 1999 red Dodge conversion van. It was found and is being processed, Mascara said.

However, the registered owner of that van, who was initially called a "person of interest" in the case, has been interviewed and cleared, police said later Friday.

Michael Naujalis, 24, met with detectives Friday and explained to them that he had sold the van to Varela in August. Varela never completed the transfer of title and ownership out of Naujalis' name, according to a sheriff's statement, and Naujalis' tag was still affixed to the van.

"Detectives are satisfied that Naujalis was not involved in the Escobedo family homicides and is no longer considered a person of interest," the statement said.

Drugs, Money Figure In Murder Of Former Texas Family (KWTX)

KWTX-TV, October 27, 2006

(October 27, 2006)—A former Texas man who was killed along with his wife and two young children was likely involved in the narcotics trade according to new court documents.

The bodies of 28-year-old Jose Luis Escobedo and his wife and two young sons were found alongside the Florida Turnpike.

They had all been shot to death as the mother evidently tried to shield the children.

An affidavit filed Friday by a Drug Enforcement Administration agent says evidence found in the Escobedo family home points toward drug trafficking.

It includes what are described as "suspected drug ledgers," as well as plastic packaging used to wrap drugs.

Meanwhile, investigators say they're confident that one of four drug suspects is the person who gunned down the family earlier this month.

The sheriff investigating this month's killings won't say which of the four is the accused shooter.

But he says those responsible for the killings are in custody.

Sheriff Ken Mascara isn't disclosing a motive but says investigators quickly concluded that the Escobedos were gunned down for drugs, money or both.

He notes that Escobedo's brother is involved in a significant heroin distribution organization.

He's believed to be hiding out in Mexico.

The murder victims had moved to Florida several months ago from Brownsville.

Illegal Immigrant Drug Offenders Face Deportation, Prison Or Both (ASPTIMES)

By Joel Stonington

Aspen Times, October 27, 2006

'It's one of those cases of plead and deport'

In December, police arrested Jesus Gabriel Soto Sandoval in the drug sting at two local restaurants. Less than six months after his deportation, Sandoval was back in Aspen and in custody for cocaine possession.

So, deport him again and save the cost of prison or punish him so he won't come back for a third crack at dealing cocaine out the back door of an Aspen restaurant?

It's a question members of law enforcement and the legal community differ on greatly. For example, in a separate case Thursday, Jose de Fletes Rodriguez was sentenced to five years of probation for possession of less than one gram of cocaine. He was arrested in a traffic stop after a tip from undercover DEA agents in the latest Aspen-area sting operation - known as the "wiretap case."

"It's one of those cases of plead and deport," said his attorney, Arnie Mordkin.

In Soto Sandoval's case, it's not so simple the second time around. The first time, authorities caught him with a half gram of cocaine while working at Little Annie's Eating House, and he pleaded guilty to possession in a bargain that resulted in dropping the charges of dealing cocaine and conspiracy to deal. Six months later, police caught him with cocaine while he was working at Campo de Fiori.

"My clear position is that this is his second time on a drug felony within a year ," said Gail Nichols, assistant district attorney. "He needs to be punished or he'll just come back and do it again."

But Soto Sandoval's sentencing hearing hit a snag Thursday because the minimum sentence for a second drug offense while on parole is four years in prison. Further, he will go straight from this decision back into the hands of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, where he will likely face federal prison time for unlawful re-entry by a felon.

"One half of all our criminal caseload is related to immigration; that is a significant change over the last five years," said Troy Eid, the U.S. attorney for Colorado. Though the vast majority of prosecutions for re-entry are of violent felons, some drug crimes can be considered violent, Eid said. Eid has committed to taking all cases of felons who have re-entered America illegally.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office has historically prosecuted people who have re-entered and have prior felonies," said Eid's spokesman, Jeff Dorschner. "Under Troy Eid's leadership, that has become a top priority."

Greg Greer, a public defender representing Soto Sandoval, said re-entry cases are better for padding a prosecutor's statistics than for helping society. The U.S. attorney can seem tough on crime by upping convictions because proof that a violent felon re-entered after deportation can be simple.

"It's a slam-dunk and an easy conviction statistic for any prosecutor," Greer said. "You keep him for an extra two years, then keep him in fed prison for two years ... then deport him. It's an awful lot of resources to use. Prison is expensive."

Both Nichols and Greer agree every case is different and there is a lot of discretion in charging the criminals. They also agreed that in a case like Soto Sandoval's, all the possible punitive measures need to be taken into account. Hence, Nichols and Greer put off Soto Sandoval's sentencing for two more weeks while they figure out what to ask for.

"I'm hearing from friends who do federal defense work that they are prosecuting these cases a lot," Greer said. "I have heard this valley is a source of a large number of them."

Owens Drug Talk No Love-in (RMN)

By David Montero

Rocky Mountain News, October 27, 2006

Pro-pot protesters give the governor no peace at Capitol

The scene might've been something Gov. Bill Owens would envision in a bad dream - or in this case, maybe a bad drug trip.

Protestors of all ages - most dressed in green, waving signs and chanting loud enough to drown out what he said - stood on the capitol steps Friday morning to support the legalization of marijuana while mocking Owens.

The Republican governor lined up with Attorney General John Suthers and about a dozen law enforcement officials to explain why they thought the statewide ballot measure was a bad idea.

He tried a soft opening, but the hostilities began before he even started.

"Lie louder, Bill," a lone voice shouted. "We can't hear you."

DOJ_NMG_0087790

"I'm really proud to be here with so many people who are concerned about the impact of legalizing marijuana in the state of Colorado," Owens said with a smile, trying to laugh off the taunts before continuing down the rabbit hole.

"Voting yes on Amendment 44 will have the explicit effect of legalizing the possession of an ounce of marijuana in this state," he said. "But a yes vote will have countless, implicit effects that are much more serious than the drug itself."

"Like telling the truth?" another voice derisively yelled from the crowd.

So much for peace, love and understanding.

Owens hurried through the rest of his comments, telling the wall of green shirts and sign wavers they risked dangers from second-hand smoke if the measure passed and that's why his administration signed into law the Clean Indoor Air Act that restricted smoking in restaurants and bars.

"Can we smoke pot in casinos?" a sarcastic voice asked, referring to the exemption under the law that allows cigarettes to be smoked in gambling halls.

The phalanx of uniformed officers behind him shifted nervously in the face of the more than 50 people determined not to listen or accept any point being made by the governor's contingent.

Owens introduced Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener, who had recently become famous for being the face of Bailey - the site of a shooting at Platte Canyon High School in which a 16-year-old girl was killed and several other girls were held hostage and sexually assaulted.

Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Amendment 44, said before the news conference that Wegener had better not try to use that crime for political gain.

Minutes into his comments, Wegener alluded to the tragedy.

"What about the possibilities of this individual being a pilot or a bus driver? The potential consequences of their actions are too horrific to ignore," Wegener said, his voice starting to quiver. "Couldn't happen? That's what was said about a school shooting in Bailey."

The crowd jeered. Tvert huffed. Wegener stared.

Pot smokers will tell you the most intense part of the joint is right at the end - the roach clip, in drug parlance.

The news conference was getting to the roach clip.

Sensing it, the crowd began chanting, "Hey, ho - you say drink, we say no."

The face for the anti-marijuana initiative for several debates slowly took the podium and waited a few seconds to see if the crowd would stop the anti-booze, pro-pot chant.

Seeing they weren't in a mind to quit, Attorney General John Suthers began talking. He cited his statistics about the level of THC in pot increasing dramatically in the past 17 years.

"Hey, ho - you say drink, we say no," the crowd bellowed.

Suthers plowed ahead with more statistics. At times, he couldn't be heard. After about four minutes, he asked Colorado voters not "to wave the white flag" in the drug war. He moved back to his place amongst the law enforcement officials, and the crowd crowed over its perceived victory.

Owens seethed.

"Ladies and gentlemen, this is a sad day for Colorado," Owens said to rising jeers. It got so loud, he had to repeat it. "Ladies and gentlemen, this is a sad day for Colorado."

He said in his decade of political life in Colorado, he had never been shouted down like that before. Owens complained about the lack of civil debate on the matter.

The crowd chanted: "What do we want? A safer choice. When do we want it? Now."

Owens tried to take a question from a television reporter over the chants, and it looked like it might not happen when Tvert raised his arms like Moses over the Red Sea and the crowd immediately stopped.

"Wow. Boy, that's amazing," Owens said sarcastically.

Later, Tvert held his own news conference and noted nobody was trying to shout him down or opposed the amendment. He brought the former Seattle Police Chief to explain why fighting pot with laws made no sense. He expressed indignation at the law enforcement officials and Owens for opposing the measure.

"Clearly they haven't done their jobs. They haven't educated people about drugs. They've simply pushed people from one drug they don't like to the other one they do. I think it's telling that Gov. Owens supported the largest drug dealer in the state of Colorado - and perhaps this country - for the Senate seat in this state," he said, referring to unsuccessful 2004 Senate candidate Pete Coors.

Tvert might be pushing pot, but wasn't passing the peace pipe.

Officials, Pro-44 Lobbyists Clash (DTC)

By John Fryar, The Daily Times-Call

Daily Times-Call, October 30, 2006

DENVER — Supporters of Amendment 44 outnumbered the state and local law enforcement officials who gathered Friday on the state Capitol steps to detail their opposition to that marijuana-legalization initiative.

"This is a sad day for Colorado," Gov. Bill Owens said after the pro-44 demonstrators heckled and chanted during the anti-44 news conference.

Owens, one of the featured speakers at the news conference, complained he'd never before seen a news conference where a legitimate debate by organizers was "shouted down."

Owens ignored a challenge from Amendment 44 proponent Mason Tvert to debate the initiative, which asks voters to make it legal under state law for anyone age 21 and older to possess up to an ounce of marijuana.

In the news conference sponsored by Save Our Society from Drugs, one of the groups campaigning against Amendment 44, Owens and Colorado Attorney General John Suthers were joined by about a dozen law enforcement officers, including Boulder County Sheriff Joe Pelle and Weld County Sheriff John Cooke.

But more than four dozen marijuana-legalization supporters showed up, many of them wearing green "Yes on 44" shirts and carrying signs directed at the anti-44 law officers that said, "Protect the People, Not Your Jobs." Demonstrators aligned with SAFER, the group supporting Amendment 44 that contends marijuana offers a safer alternative to alcohol, jeered when Suthers said: "There is nothing safe about marijuana."

Accompanying Tvert and the SAFER protestors was Norm Stamper, a 34-year law enforcement veteran who was a San Diego police officer before serving as Seattle's police chief from 1994 to 2000.

Stamper said in an interview that drug prohibitions have led to more death, disease and crime than would have been the case under a system of taxation, regulation and control of drugs like marijuana.

Marijuana laws now "are not working and need to change," Tvert said.

But Owens, Suthers and law enforcement officials at the news conference offered a laundry list of reasons against the measure.

"We are also concerned that legalizing marijuana will cause a spike in impaired-driving fatalities and injuries caused by more motorists driving impaired on marijuana," said Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener, president of County Sheriffs of Colorado.

"The reality also exists that it is more difficult for law enforcement to detect impairment caused by marijuana and other drugs as compared to alcohol," Wegener said.

Protest Erupts Over Marijuana At State Capitol (9News)

9news.com, October 27, 2006

DENVER - A news conference about Amendment 44 turned into a war of words on the steps of the State Capitol.

What was supposed to be a news conference on Amendment 44 turned into a war of words on the steps of the State Capitol Friday. 9NEWS at 5 p.m. October 27, 2006.

Governor Owens and members of different law enforcement agencies initially gathered to speak out against Amendment 44.

The amendment would make it legal for people 21 and older to possess up to an ounce of marijuana in Colorado.

After the news conference began, it quickly became a contest of who could be the loudest.

"We're trying to have a legitimate debate, but we're being shouted down by you all," said Owens.

The group SAFER, which supports Amendment 44, shouted things like, "What do we want? A safer choice."

"Marijuana smoke is every bit as cancer causing as cigarette smoke," said Owens.

Colorado Attorney General John Suthers met the most opposition when he was at the podium.

Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener was also there.

"It doesn't make sense, it's irresponsible," said Wegener.

"As law enforcement, we see the direct results on young lives, your children and your grandchildren," said Lt. Col. Rick Salas with the Colorado State Patrol.

Supporters of the amendment were joined by a former police officer in Seattle, who supports legalizing marijuana.

"I think it's tragic that police officials and local leaders don't do their homework. Marijuana is not a gateway drug," said Norman Stamper, former Seattle Police officer.

DOJ_NMG_0087792

Supporters of Amendment 44 say it is a better alternative than alcohol.

"There are parents here and professionals and students and children who realize these laws are not working and need to change," said Mason Tvert, the SAFER campaign director.

U.S. Court Upholds Law Denying College Loans To Drug Offenders (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- A federal judge in South Dakota upheld a law making students ineligible for federally backed college loans once they have been convicted on a drug charge.

U.S. District Judge Charles Kornmann, ruling in a case brought by three student plaintiffs and backed by the American Civil Liberties Union, said that students enjoy no guaranteed right to financial aid and that the legislative branch has wide discretion in setting punishment for drug law violators.

``The Constitution affords no right to a higher education," Kornmann, based in Aberdeen, South Dakota, wrote today in his decision granting a dismissal of the case as requested by the defendant, the U.S. Department of Education.

The lawsuit was organized by Students for Sensible Drug Policy, a Washington-based advocacy group, which said it has not decided its next step. ``We're weighing our options," said Kris Krane, the group's executive director.

The suit argued that the law enacted in 1998 violates due- process and double-jeopardy provisions of the U.S. Constitution.

The law discriminates against poorer students who rely on federal aid to pay tuition, said Kraig Selken, a senior at Northern State University, in Aberdeen, and one of the three student plaintiffs. Selken, who lost his student aid after a marijuana conviction, said students have a harder time improving their lives because of the law.

The federal government spends more than $78 billion a year on student financial aid. About two-thirds of the nation's 19 million undergraduate students receive some type of assistance, according to the Education Department.

`Health and Safety'

The Education Department supports the law as part of a government effort ``to decrease illegal drug use and protect the health and safety of all our nation's students," department spokesman Chad Colby said after the suit was filed in March.

The Education Department initially enforced the law against students with any drug convictions. Under that policy, the law affected 35,000 students a year, said Adam Wolf, the ACLU's lead attorney in the case. Congress earlier this year revised the law, saying it applies only to convictions occurring while the student is in school.

The case is Students For Sensible Drug Policy Foundation v. Spellings, CIV. 06-3007, U.S. District Court for the Northern District of South Dakota.

Eight Charged In Alleged Internet Drug Sales (AP)

AP, October 30, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) -- A crackdown on Internet sales of anabolic steroids and other prescription drugs has led to criminal charges against eight defendants in two separate cases.

In one case, federal prosecutors say six defendants were charged with conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. That carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a 250-thousand dollar fine.

The complaint in that case alleges that beginning in 2003, the Web site PM-eds-dot-com took drug orders from the Tinley Park residence of Larry Calow. It then forwarded them to a site in Mexico manned by his brother, Gary Calow. The complaint says the drugs then were smuggled into the United States for shipment to customers.

The U-S attorney's office says PM-eds-dot-com and a sister Internet pharmacy business were created by the Calow brothers and co-defendant Ricky Boros of Oak Brook.

Snoop Dogg Suspected Of Weapon, Drug Possession (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The rapper-actor known as Snoop Dogg was arrested Thursday at Bob Hope Airport in Burbank on suspicion of being a felon in possession of a gun and of transporting marijuana, police said.

The performer, whose real name is Calvin Broadus, was arrested by officers from the Burbank-Glendale-Pasadena Airport Authority Police Department at 3:45 p.m.

Officers had approached him for a vehicle code violation in the passenger loading and unloading zone.

Police said they soon discovered a gun and marijuana in his vehicle.

DOJ_NMG_0087793

He was freed on $35,000 bond and is scheduled to be arraigned in Los Angeles County Superior Court in Burbank on Dec. 12. Last month, Broadus was arrested after allegedly trying to bring a collapsible police baton aboard a plane at John Wayne Airport in Orange County.

Snoop Dogg Arrested On Drug, Gun Charges (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

BURBANK, Calif. — Snoop Dogg was arrested on suspicion of illegal drug and gun possession, police said.

The rapper, whose real name is Calvin Broadus, was arrested at 3:45 p.m. Thursday at Bob Hope Airport, police said. Snoop Dogg posted $35,000 bail and was scheduled to appear in court Dec. 12.

Airport police officers stopped Snoop Dogg at a loading zone for a vehicle code violation. When officers searched the vehicle they found a gun and marijuana, police said.

"There was no basis for this arrest," the rapper's lawyer, Donald Etra, said in a statement. "We believe that once this is cleared up, all charges will be dismissed."

The Orange County district attorney's office has been considering charges against Snoop Dogg after authorities last month discovered a 53-centimetre collapsible baton in his bags as he boarded a New York-bound flight from John Wayne International Airport.

The rapper was convicted in 1990 of cocaine possession and charged with gun possession after a 1993 traffic stop. He pleaded guilty in exchange for three years' probation and a promise to make public service announcements against violence.

He was acquitted of murder in 1996 following the death of an alleged gang member who was killed by gunfire from the vehicle Snoop Dogg was travelling in.

IMMIGRATION:

The Fence Campaign (NYT)

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

President Bush signed a bill to authorize a 700-mile border fence last week, thus enshrining into federal law a key part of the Republicans' midterm election strategy. The party of the Iraq war and family values desperately needs you to forget about dead soldiers and randy congressmen, and to think instead about the bad things immigrants will do to us if we don't wall them out. Hence the fence, and the ad campaigns around it.

Across the country, candidates are trying to stir up a voter frenzy using immigrants for bait. They accuse their opponents of being amnesty-loving fence-haters, and offer themselves as jut-jawed defenders of the homeland because they want the fence. But the fence is the product of a can't-do, won't-do approach to a serious national problem. And the ads are built on a foundation of lies:

Lie No. 1: We're building a 700-mile fence. The bill signed by Mr. Bush includes no money for fence building. Congress has authorized $1.2 billion as a down payment for sealing the border, but that money is also meant for roads, electronic sensors and other security tactics preferred by the Department of Homeland Security, which doesn't want a 700-mile fence. Indian tribes, members of Congress and local leaders will also have considerable say in where to put the fence, which could cost anywhere from $2 billion to $9 billion, depending on whose estimates you believe.

"It's one thing to authorize. It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it," said Senator John Cornyn, a Texas Republican. "I'm not sure that's the most practical use of that money."

Lie No. 2: A fence will help. A 700-mile fence, if it works, will only drive immigrants to other parts of the 2,000-mile border. In parts of the trackless Southwest, building the fence will require building new roads. Who uses roads? Immigrants and smugglers. And no fence will do anything about the roughly 40 percent of illegal immigrants who enter legally and overstay their visas.

Lie No. 3: The Senate's alternative bill was weak, and its supporters favored amnesty. In May, the Senate passed a bill that had a fence. Not only that, it had money for a fence. It also included tough measures for cracking down on illegal hiring. It demanded that illegal immigrants get right with the law by paying fines and taxes, learning English and getting to the back of the citizenship line. It went overboard in some ways, weakening legal protections for immigrants and hindering judicial oversight. But it went far beyond the fence-only approach. Its shortcomings and differences with the House bill might have been worked out in negotiations over the summer. But instead, House Republican leaders held months of hearings to attack the Senate bill. And all we were left with was the fence.

Will the Republican strategy work? We'll know next week, but we hold out hope that hard-line candidates are misreading the electorate. Voters all over are concerned about immigration, of course, but many polls have repeatedly shown that they warm to reasonable solutions and not to stridency. They can recognize the difference between the marauding army of fence-jumpers they see in commercials and the immigrants who have become their neighbors, co-workers, customers and friends. Citizen anger cuts both ways, and many voters, Latinos in particular, say they are put off by the Republican hysteria.

Poll results in some races suggest that xenophobia and voter deception are not necessarily a ticket to victory. In Arizona, Randy Graf, a Republican, is running for Congress as a single-issue candidate focused on border security, Minuteman-style. He has said that if his strident argument won't fly in his prickly border state, it might not fly anywhere. He is trailing Gabrielle Giffords, a moderate Democrat who supports the comprehensive approach to immigration reform endorsed by the Senate and — once upon a time — by President Bush.

Whatever happens in November, Congress will eventually have to deal with the 12 million illegal immigrants unaffected by the fence, and the future flow of immigrant workers. That means tackling "amnesty" directly. The sad thing is that Democrats and moderate Republicans — and Mr. Bush — already did this, and settled on an approach that is both tough and smart.

But now is the time for stirring up voters, and the pliant Mr. Bush has decided to go along, adding his signature to the shortsighted politics of fear.

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

Get ready to hear a lot more about the Terps, Francis Scott Key, and the glorious blue crab if the Democrats take charge of the House in this week's midterm elections. That's because Mr. Maryland, Rep. Steny Hoyer, is set to move in as the House majority leader, the No. 2 slot behind likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi, by reason of, in no small part, his coast-to-coast campaigning-37 House districts in October alone. "Yeah, you could call him 'Mr. Maryland,'" says a pal. More than any other Maryland House member, Hoyer wears his state colors for all to see. Start with the University of Maryland, his alma mater. He's a regular at Terrapin games and even has a carved turtle on his desk. His betting currency of choice is lump crabmeat. Then there are his replicas of historical Maryland scenes like the Revolutionary War battle at Fort McHenry, which led Key to write "the Star-Spangled Banner."

There's also a softer side to the 67-year-old "Silver Fox." He has helped to establish "Judy Centers," named for his late wife, throughout the state to help in early-childhood development. And every day, he brings his English springer spaniel, Charlotte, to his office, where she guards the Maryland seal at the entrance.

But don't ask him about moving his Maryland museum to the majority leader's office. Like a superstitious skipjack captain, he's not going there until it happens.

A Compliment but Steeped in Politics

No, Vice President Dick Cheney wasn't losing his mind last week when he said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is a formidable 2008 presidential candidate who can win. Insiders say he was telling the truth-and trying to invigorate his base in the GOP against a familiar but recently quiet foil. "That was good for us," says a Bushie. "You'll see more of that."

Why a Rice-Obama Race Isn't Crazy

Pollster John Zogby is following a trend in next week's midterm elections that could have a huge impact in the 2008 presidential race: Will black Republicans win black votes? He thinks they will, just as when about 40 percent of the Hispanic vote moved into the GOP column in 2004, breaking the proverbial political barrier. He's focused on Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele, the lone black Republican seeking statewide office who could win. What would it take? Zogby thinks if 20 percent or more vote Steele, it will represent a major shift away from the Democrats and signal what he's dubbed "the Emerging African-American Icon." It could have a huge impact in 2008. Just think, he says, if Secretary of State Condi Rice runs for president and gets 25 percent of the black vote to add to the Republican base. Bingo-front-runner. And, he adds, let's say media favorite Illinois Sen. Barack Obama challenges Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. If he gets half of the black vote, which is 25 percent of the Democratic base, "it thrusts him at least into the high second tier" of candidates, and maybe, maybe, we have the first ever black-versus-black presidential campaign.

Are Higher Taxes In The Offing? (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

DOJ_NMG_0087795

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans' 11th-hour campaign strategy includes stirring voter fears of a Democratic tax increase. But a big increase would be unlikely under a Democratic Congress, at least over the next two years.

In part, that is because Democratic leaders have, as the election nears, limited their options by repudiating proposals once popular in the party, like boosting taxes on the rich and on investments. Democrats don't want to "retroactively roll back the tax cut," New York Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel, who would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, said in an interview last week. Leaving the breaks in place until their scheduled expiration in 2010 is "good tax policy and good politics," he added.

Even if Mr. Rangel and other congressional leaders sought to go back on those promises, they would be hemmed in by moderate members in the party that they recruited to pick up seats in Republican-leaning districts. Many of those politicians have said they would be reluctant to back any tax increases. And President Bush likely would veto any such proposals.

That isn't to say that Democrats don't want to make changes in tax policy if they win a majority in the House or Senate on Nov. 7, or that their influence won't be felt. They likely would block any attempts to extend estate-tax relief after 2010 -- a proposal that nearly passed earlier this year under the Republican-led Congress. And they have said they would push for higher taxes on corporations, particularly oil companies, by eliminating breaks and urging a crackdown on "loopholes."

Focusing on the AMT

Democrats say they would also likely try to steer any new revenue toward paying for extending tax breaks aimed at lower and middle-income families, like a child credit, the 10% rate for low-income families; and relief from the so-called marriage penalty -- a set of provisions that can cause people who are married to pay more in tax than if they were single. Another tax issue for many Democratic lawmakers is relief from the alternative minimum tax, a complex set of provisions designed to make sure people don't rack up so many deductions and credits that they avoid taxes altogether.

For all the tax talk in the 2006 campaign, it is the 2008 election that will have more significant implications for tax policy. That is because voters then will be choosing a new president as well as a new Congress -- and those politicians will determine the fate of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, most of which are slated to expire during that congressional term, in 2010. The question then will be which, if any, are extended and which are allowed to expire.

Mr. Rangel and other Democrats remain coy on that issue. "I don't know how much time is being spent on 2010, to be honest," he said. "I don't know what the situation will be in 2010, we don't know what the economy will be. ... I'm 76, I don't buy green bananas." Republicans regularly cite remarks Mr. Rangel was quoted making a month ago saying he "cannot think of one" tax cut he would extend. He now says he simply wasn't ruling anything out.

With Republicans on the defensive this year on issues such as Iraq and ethics, the White House and party leaders are trying to stoke fears that a Democratic Congress would weaken the fight against terrorists and would boost taxes. The Republican National Committee recently released an Internet ad titled "Tax Man," purporting to show life under a Democratic Congress, showing a tax collector popping up in the delivery room, at a funeral, taking the pacifier from a baby in his stroller. "If Democrats take over Congress, they will raise taxes by $2.4 trillion to keep up with their reckless spending," the narrator says.

Indeed, ever since President Bush and the Republican Congress pushed through a massive tax cut in 2001, many Democrats have talked about "rolling back" some of those cuts, particularly on the wealthiest Americans. Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry made it a centerpiece of his 2004 campaign against Mr. Bush. For much of the year, Democratic House leaders in Washington ripped the Bush tax cuts, promising to raise income-tax rates for people making more than $250,000 or $300,000, and threatening the dividend and capital-gains breaks that Republicans passed in 2003.

Moderating the Rhetoric

But with the election getting closer, Democratic leaders, including would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, have moderated their rhetoric, at least somewhat, suggesting that Democrats could fund any desired spending increases with offsetting budget cuts, rather than tax increases.

"It doesn't have to be [that] if you invest in something, you have to therefore raise taxes," Ms. Pelosi said recently on CNBC's "Kudlow & Company." "You can make substitutions," she added.

Democrats are focused on closing the "tax gap" -- the estimated annual $300 billion or so in taxes that are owed but not collected by the federal government -- to raise revenue. That includes a number of tax shelter loophole-closers. Democrats also have promised to roll back tax breaks for oil companies and other multinationals. Democrats likely would resort to those before attacking any of the existing Bush breaks.

A senior Democratic House leadership aide said that "a number of our members see the value" of the investor breaks, and "there's no way we're rolling them back." The aide added that lawmakers may discuss raising rates for the highest-income households and could even propose that in the House budget resolution. But "I don't know that it's going to happen," the aide said. "If that was at the top of [Ms. Pelosi's] agenda, she would have put it in the Six for '06" -- her list of top priorities for the Congress that begins in January.

That list includes eliminating tax policies that benefit big oil companies and encourage shifting of jobs overseas; making college tuition tax-deductible; rewriting the Medicare drug benefit; expanding stem-cell research; and overhauling U.S. policy in the war against terrorism, including a phased redeployment of forces out of Iraq starting this year.

Another factor that would tie the hands of Mr. Rangel and Ms. Pelosi: many incoming freshman Democrats in the House would be more moderate than their leaders, and reluctant to go along with broad assaults on the Bush tax cuts. By Republicans' count, more than a dozen Democratic challengers have avoided taking a position on the Bush cuts. And at least a few have endorsed the Bush tax cuts and called for their permanent extension. Those members -- and many incumbent moderate Democrats -- would be loath to risk their hard-won seats by enacting tax increases.

Debate in Indiana

At a recent congressional debate in Indiana, Democratic candidate Brad Ellsworth, seeking to oust Rep. John Hostettler, brushed off his opponent's suggestion that he would vote with his liberal leadership. "I've signed a pledge with the American Taxpayers Association not to raise taxes," he said. He promised to focus instead on cutting government spending. "A lot of money comes into our government," said Mr. Ellsworth, a local sheriff. "What makes Hoosiers so mad is when you see the wasteful spending."

Republicans say the point isn't that their tax cuts will be wiped out immediately. They say Democrats hope to remain in control long enough to let the tax cuts expire on their own in 2010. "The Democrats are still determined to raise your taxes, and if they gain control of the Congress, they can do so without lifting a finger," Mr. Bush said in his radio address on Saturday. But Mr. Bush, like other Republicans, makes the issue seem urgent.

"Next time you're having dinner at home, look around the table and multiply the number of children you have by $500," he said in his radio address, referring to the amount by which the per-child credit would decrease if the current law expires in 2010. "That's how much more you will be sending to Washington in taxes if Democrats take control of the Congress."

To the extent that Democrats talk about 2010, they say they wouldn't let breaks like the child credit expire. In the meantime, Mr. Rangel said a priority for him beforehand would be trying to find some way of easing the burden on lower and middle-income families of the alternative minimum tax.

Originally aimed at very high-income people, the AMT has begun to snare more middle-class families, driving up their tax bills. Because it is triggered by big deductions, it is hitting people who pay high state and local taxes. And it is projected to grow so large in the coming decade that within a few years it will account for more federal tax dollars than the regular income tax.

Mr. Rangel, whose district is centered in Harlem, is eager to find a solution to the AMT problem, which he fears will hamper development in urban cores. It's an expensive proposition, because federal budget projections now rely on all the money the AMT will raise in coming years. And the easiest way to fix it -- shifting the burden back to the highest-income earners -- is unpalatable to Republicans.

Some Republicans say a deal is at least possible, if Democrats are willing to give ground elsewhere -- say, by lowering income-tax rates again, or allowing overhauls of the corporate income tax that would exclude income earned abroad. Democrats say they would like to overhaul the AMT as part of a broader revamp of the entire tax code.

But few observers say such sweeping changes are possible over the next two years, as both sides maneuver for advantage in the 2008 presidential race. That campaign likely will also decide the long-term fate of Mr. Bush's rate cuts and dividend and capital-gains breaks, as well as the estate tax.

Top Democrat Casts Doubt On Regulatory Co-operation (FT)

By Jeremy Grant And Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Financial regulators on both sides of the Atlantic may not be able to resolve policy disputes through co-operation and the creation of a global regulator should be considered, according to Barney Frank, the senior Democratic congressman.

The views of the man widely expected take over the chair of the House financial services committee if the Democrats retake the chamber stand in stark contrast to those of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the financial regulator that the committee oversees.

Christopher Cox, chairman of the SEC, has been at pains in recent months to highlight stepped-up co-operation with foreign regulators such as the UK's Financial Services Authority.

This co-operation is seen as necessary as exchanges consolidate beyond regional borders, moves highlighted by the proposed New York Stock Exchange merger with Euronext.

DOJ_NMG_0087797

"Doesn't that sound like fun," Mr Frank said of such co-operation. "Joint action is theoretically [good] but what does that mean? In American baseball, if the runner and the ball arrive at the base at the same time, the tie goes to the fielder. Who breaks a tie if there is a disagreement over policy between the SEC and FSA?"

Asked if a supra-national regulator would be needed, he told the Financial Times: "I don't know. At this point that's something to look into."

He also dismissed fears in Europe about the prospect of tough Sarbanes-Oxley compliance laws moving beyond the US.

Mr Frank is the senior Democrat on the House financial services committee, and is poised to take over the chairmanship from Michael Oxley, the Republican co-author of Sarbox who is retiring.

He said the idea that Sarbox could be more widely applied abroad was "not going to happen" because it was being watered down in the US.

Business and financial leaders in Europe continue to fret about the possibility that Sarbox could find its way to the UK and elsewhere through the back door, such as if a stock exchange in the US acquired one in the UK.

Asked if Europeans were justified of such concerns, Mr Frank said: "It's not going any further. Six months from now it will be less of a burden for companies than it is today." His view reflects a belief in Washington that Sarbox should not be changed through Congress.

Instead, the two regulators responsible for overseeing how it is implemented – the SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting watchdog – should clarify how sections of the law should be implemented.

Business fury at Sox is focused on Section 404, requiring CEOs to regularly evaluate a company's internal controls and to have these checked by external auditors. Critics have also hit at guidance from the PCAOB on whether such internal controls and evaluations are adequate, saying it has been needlessly aggressive. Both agencies are in December expected to unveil fresh guidance on Section 404 of Accounting Standard No. 2 guidance. Mr Frank said: "They have the authority to thin out what is required. We think the accountants probably overloaded on the audit requirements."

NIH's New Ethics Rules Lead Some To Ponder Jumping Ship (WP/AP)

By Rita Beamish

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Nearly 40 percent of the scientists conducting hands-on research at the National Institutes of Health say they are looking for other jobs or are considering doing so to escape new ethics rules that have curtailed their opportunity to earn outside income.

Most scientists say the ethics crackdown is too severe, and nearly three-quarters of them think it will hinder the government's ability to attract and keep medical researchers, according to a survey commissioned by the government's premier medical research agency.

The tightened rules were established last year after NIH found that dozens of scientists had run afoul of existing restrictions with private consulting deals that had enriched them with money from drug and biotechnology companies.

Outside income from such companies is now banned. NIH also is placing greater restrictions and disclosure requirements on employees' financial holdings.

"Of course we are concerned when any employees are saying they might consider leaving as a result of a change of policy," said Raynard S. Kington, the agency's principal deputy director. But he said in a telephone interview Friday that the survey results are muddy because they combine those actively seeking to leave and those thinking about it.

NIH Director Elias A. Zerhouni, in a letter Thursday to the staff, said the survey "does suggest concerns about the impact of the regulations on recruitment and retention." But he added: "At this time we do not anticipate revisions in the regulations."

About 8,000 NIH employees, or about half the workforce, responded to the Internet-based survey. Employee job satisfaction was generally high, the survey found. But 39 percent of the scientists researching disease and cures -- known as tenure and tenure-track scientists -- said they were actively seeking new work or considering leaving NIH because of the rules.

Overall, 3,336 NIH scientists responded to the survey, including 512 tenure and tenure-track researchers.

Among all NIH scientists, 18 percent said they were trying to leave or considering it. Those not in the tenure group typically do not conduct research and instead manage outside research performed with NIH money by universities and other nonfederal entities. They are less likely to have private consulting opportunities.

One-third of all NIH scientists said they thought the new rules would hurt NIH's ability to fulfill its mission, and most said the old rules could have been enforced better rather than tightened.

Kington highlighted a finding that nearly nine in 10 scientists reported they intend to work at NIH a year from now. Despite rumblings of low morale, he said the scientists' job satisfaction rate of 81 percent reflects one of the government's most positive workforces.

Officials also emphasized employees' opinion that the new rules will boost the agency's credibility with the public; 73 percent of the employees who responded agreed with that, the survey found.

Arthur Caplan, medical ethics chairman at the University of Pennsylvania, said tighter rules are needed but "we still haven't figured out exactly how to manage conflict of interest."

"The leaders of the NIH and in Congress have to think a bit harder about giving a tiny bit of breathing room so that NIH scientists are not sent into a monastery from which they can't ever come out in the name of scientific integrity," he said.

Anti-secrecy Panel Called 'Puppet' (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

A panel set up last year to reduce excessive secrecy in government is being labeled toothless after its chairman told lawmakers that he could not act except at the request of the president.

"The statute under which we operate provides that [President Bush] must request the board undertake such a review before it can proceed," wrote L. Britt Snider, chairman of the Public Interest Declassification Board, to Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat.

Government transparency advocates say that if the statute is interpreted that way, it makes the board, in the words of Steven Aftergood, of the Federation of American Scientists, "a White House puppet."

Mr. Aftergood said, "The board needs the capacity for independent action; otherwise it might as well not exist."

The letter from Mr. Snider says it is "an interim response" to a request from Mr. Wyden and a bipartisan group of colleagues for the board to review two reports from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that assessed U.S. intelligence about Iraq before the 2003 invasion, in the light of what has been learned since.

"We believe that portions of these two reports remain unnecessarily classified," wrote committee members Sens. Christopher S. Bond, Missouri Republican; Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat; Mike DeWine, Ohio Republican; Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat; Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican; and Vice Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat, in a letter last month.

They requested that the board review the reports to see whether they were overclassified -- the first test of the board's role as a watchdog for secrecy policy.

"I think the intelligence community used their black highlighters excessively as they reviewed these reports," Mr. Wyden said at the time. "I am particularly concerned it appears that information may have been classified to shield individuals from accountability."

The board was established in law in 2000, after a 1997 recommendation from a commission headed by Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, New York Democrat. The board was set up, according to the statute, "To promote the fullest possible public access to a thorough, accurate, and reliable documentary record of significant U.S. national security decisions and ... activities."

But the administration did not appoint any members until September 2004, and no funds were appropriated for it until last year.

Now the board says it is stuck in the middle of a tussle about its authority between lawmakers and the White House.

"The White House position is they have to request "any review such as that of the Senate committee report," Mr. Snider said. "The senators believe they can ask independently. ... We're kind of stuck in the middle."

Mr. Snider said the board was "waiting for guidance from the White House" about how to proceed. The board's executive secretary, J. William Leonard, added that the board was keen to get things right the first time around.

"There's a desire that [this first request] is processed in accordance with the statute, because it will be establishing a precedent," he said.

Seniors Fret Over Changes In Medicare Drug Program (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 30, 2006

WOOSTER, Ohio — Gordon Musch stares into a computer monitor and listens while an insurance counselor peppers him with unfamiliar terms.

For Musch, like millions of other seniors and people with disabilities, it's time to learn again about Medicare's prescription-drug program. It was confusing the first time around. Now, there are even more plans to consider for 2007. The enrollment period begins Nov. 15 and ends Dec. 31, but officials say those who wait past early December could face delays.

The lowest-priced premiums have risen considerably. Lists of covered drugs have changed, as have rules that must be followed to get coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0087799

And plans that last year provided continuous insurance throughout the year for all drugs now have a "coverage gap" for brand-name drugs. Most plans have a gap that begins when total drug costs reach $2,250 and ends when the beneficiary has spent $3,600 out of pocket.

For all those reasons, experts say, virtually everyone in the program should shop around.

That's what Musch is doing here, about an hour south of Cleveland in Ohio's farm country.

"What you did would take me five or six hours to struggle through," he tells the state counselor helping him choose three alternatives from Ohio's 61 plans for next year. Only Pennsylvania and West Virginia, with 66, have more.

"My older brother's a physicist, my younger brother's a pharmacist, and I'm an engineer, and we've all found it to be very, very complicated," Musch says. "I feel sorry for the mass of elderly people out there. It's got to be very confusing for them."

Prescription-drug coverage was added to the Medicare program by Congress in 2003. Under the program, which took effect this year, coverage is provided by private insurers approved by Medicare. Most states have about 40 plans this year, rising to more than 50 next year.

In addition to widespread confusion, the program got off to a rough start. Thousands of low-income beneficiaries who previously received their drugs through Medicaid were mistakenly dropped or overcharged. Millions more with slightly higher incomes were never reached and remain outside the program.

Medicare officials hope for a smoother transition to the program's second year. They have improved the online "Plan Finder" used by beneficiaries, their families and friends, and insurance counselors to find the best plans in terms of price, drug coverage and convenience. Average monthly premiums are $24 to $29, below original estimates.

"People seem a lot more OK with it this year," says Lynn Heskett of the Ohio Department of Insurance, who travels a 27-county area advising Medicare beneficiaries about their choices. "I haven't had many people who were really angry."

National advocates are beginning to hear complaints. Vicki Gottlich of the Center for Medicare Advocacy says beneficiaries are finding their deductibles and co-payments rising, even if premiums are not. "A lot of this is hidden," she says.

Deane Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center says low-income beneficiaries who applied for extra financial assistance this year are getting letters from Medicare stating that they have to prove their case again.

"They're calling us in a panic," she says. "They're very confused about the process, and what they have to do."

In Wooster and thousands of other communities across the country, counselors are beginning to help seniors and people with disabilities research their options for 2007. They're finding many who need to switch plans:

·Cinda Meyer, 56, of Seville, Ohio, wants out of the Humana plan which last year offered continuous coverage for all her drugs. This year, Humana will only cover generics continuously, and premiums are rising.

"Less coverage for more money doesn't sound good to me," Meyer says. She plans to switch to a plan with complete coverage, even though its monthly premium will be about $95, up from the $64 she paid this year.

·Delbert Moine, 74, of Rittman, Ohio, plans to leave the same Humana plan because it's no longer the best deal for him. He's staying with Humana in a plan that has a gap in coverage but lower premiums.

"It's cost-effective for my wife and me, but you've got to persevere," Moine says. At one point this year, Social Security stopped automatically deducting premiums from their monthly benefits, and both Medicare and Humana asked for direct payments.

·Musch, 67, of West Salem, kept his former employer's retiree coverage this year. But since it's not considered "credible" coverage by Medicare, he must pay 1% more in premiums for every month he stays outside the program. Because the signup period ended May 15 this year, that means a 7% penalty for 2007. If he waited another year, it would be 19%.

"It behooves me to get into a plan," Musch says. Despite the program's complexity, he says, "Most of the people that I talk to have been satisfied with it."

Democrats Critical Of New Medicare Guide (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 29 — Congressional Democrats say a new government publication being sent to all Medicare beneficiaries inappropriately favors private insurance plans over the traditional government-run program.

The publication, the 2007 Medicare handbook, "presents a misleading and biased view of Medicare coverage and options," the Democrats said last week in a letter to Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services.

Beneficiaries use the handbook as an authoritative guide. It has become more important in the last few years as Medicare has become more complex, with new insurance options and a prescription drug benefit offered by scores of competing private insurers.

"The 2007 handbook strongly favors health maintenance organizations, preferred provider organizations and other private Medicare Advantage plans over the traditional Medicare fee-for-service program," the Democrats said in the letter.

The Bush administration defended the handbook and said beneficiaries could save significant amounts — more than $100 a month on average — by enrolling in private health plans that provided a full package of benefits including doctors' services, hospital care and prescription drugs.

"Our only goal is to provide information that is accurate, useful and objective," said Lorraine A. Ryan, a spokeswoman at the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Managed care plans often have networks of doctors and hospitals, and beneficiaries may have to pay higher fees, exceeding what they would pay under traditional Medicare, if they go outside the network. In traditional Medicare, patients can choose from a broader range of doctors and hospitals, although a small number of doctors say they do not take Medicare patients because they consider the payments inadequate.

The letter to Mr. Leavitt was signed by Senators Max Baucus of Montana and John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, and by Representatives Sherrod Brown of Ohio, John D. Dingell of Michigan, Charles B. Rangel of New York and Pete Stark of California. They are the senior Democrats on committees and subcommittees with authority over Medicare. Their concerns will carry more weight and could inspire legislation if Democrats gain seats in Congress in the Nov. 7 elections.

Senior Democrats have repeatedly suggested that the federal government is paying excessive subsidies to private plans to get them to participate in Medicare, though some Democrats have voted for higher payment rates because their constituents like the private plans.

Thus, for example, while Congress was debating an overhaul of Medicare in 2003, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, proposed higher payment rates as a way of "enticing H.M.O.'s back to Long Island." Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, supported the proposal, saying he was "a strong supporter of the wonderful health plans we have in Massachusetts," especially nonprofit plans like Harvard Pilgrim.

Federal officials say that 7 million of the 42 million Medicare beneficiaries are in Medicare Advantage plans, an increase of more than 1 million over last year.

The new handbook, "Medicare and You 2007," begins with a chart comparing the original Medicare program with "Medicare Advantage plans like H.M.O.'s and P.P.O.'s." Under traditional Medicare, it says, "your costs may be higher than in Medicare Advantage plans." In private plans, it says, "you may get extra benefits," including eyeglasses, hearing aids and dental care.

William A. Dombi, vice president of the National Association for Home Care, a trade group, said he shared the concern about what he described as "official cheerleading" for Medicare health plans. "Many home health agencies have found that they can deliver more care, and more effective care, to patients in traditional Medicare than to those in Medicare Advantage plans," Mr. Dombi said.

Traditional Medicare has no co-payment for home care, he said, but some private Medicare plans charge $20 to $35 a visit.

Under federal law, the secretary of health and human services is to disseminate information comparing the performance of private plans under Medicare. But Consumers Union pointed out that this information was missing for more than half of the plans listed in the 2007 handbook. Federal officials said some of the data would be made available on the Internet.

Boehner Says Bush Still Faces Social Security Hurdle (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Bob Willis

Bloomberg, October 30, 2006

Oct. 29 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush may have a hard time getting his plans for overhauling Social Security and other entitlement programs through Congress in his last two years in office, House Majority Leader John Boehner said.

``We can't look at these big problems we have and think we're going to solve them in a very short period of time," Boehner, a Republican from Ohio, said today on ABC's ``This Week" program. ``Until people truly understand the magnitude of the problem we're facing with the large entitlement programs, trying to talk about options for fixing them is premature."

Bush said Oct. 22 that he planned to revive his plans for revamping Social Security, the government retirement program, after the Nov. 7 elections for Congress. With polls showing Democrats poised to overturn the Republican majority in the House and pick up seats in the Senate next week, resistance from Republicans such as Boehner may block Bush's Social Security goal for the remainder of his term.

Democrats aren't backing off their opposition to Bush's plan. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee issued a statement last week noting Bush's remarks about his agenda and telling voters, ``Just when you thought your Social Security was safe from privatization, George Bush is bringing back his plan."

DOJ_NMG_0087801

The 71-year-old program is projected to start paying out more than it gets in tax revenue beginning in 2017, according to a May report by its trustees. The president last year set aside his proposal to divert a portion of payroll taxes to individual accounts in the face of opposition from the public, Democrats and members of his own party.

Election

On another subject that is having an impact on Republican attempts to hold their congressional majorities, Boehner again said neither he nor House Speaker Dennis Hastert were aware of graphic messages that former Republican Representative Mark Foley sent to a teenage former congressional page.

``Neither the speaker, myself or anyone know of the sexually explicit instant messages," said Boehner. ``If anyone of us would have known about this, we would have dragged him out of there by his tie."

Foley, 52, resigned from Congress Sept. 29 after being confronted by ABC News about the messages.

Boehner repeated past statements that he had discussed with Hastert months ago messages sent by Foley to another former page, asking about his birthday and requesting a picture.

`Contact'

``All I was told that there had been contact between Foley and a former page," Boehner, 56, said. ``I believe that I talked to the speaker about this. I believe that he told me it had been taken care of."

Hastert has said he didn't recall the conversation. Both men have appeared before the House ethics committee, which is investigating what the leaders knew about Foley's contacts with pages, teenagers who run errands for lawmakers.

Foley's seat in a historically Republican district in Florida is among those that his party is in jeopardy of losing in the Nov. 7 election. Democrats need to gain 15 seats and six in the Senate to win majorities. The independent Cook Political Report lists the races for 25 Republican House seats as toss- ups. Democrats are making strong challenges for Republican-held Senate seats in seven states while Republicans are threatening the Democratic hold on two Senate seats, according to the Cook Political Report analysis.

National Poll

A poll for Newsweek magazine released yesterday showed Democratic congressional candidates are backed by 53 percent of likely voters and Republican candidates get support from 39 percent. The nationwide poll was taken Oct. 26-27 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Boehner said such national polls ``don't mean anything because what we have are 435 individual races all around the country, local candidates running on local issues."

If Republicans succeed in mobilizing ``all of our voters, we'll do well on Election Day," he said.

Senator Charles Schumer of New York, head of the Democratic Senate campaign organization, said his party is ``right on the edge" of taking control of the Senate.

``This election, more and more and more, is becoming a referendum on George Bush," Schumer said on the ``Fox News Sunday" program.

Local Issues

His Republican counterpart, Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, said that while the war in Iraq and the economy are major issues in the campaign, most races will turn on local concerns.

``Our candidates are talking about issues that are important in their states," Dole said on the Fox program.

Both agreed that Iraq is a major issue in the race.

One of the Senate seats being targeted by Democrats is that of incumbent Republican Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania. A poll conducted Oct. 16-25 for the Philadelphia Inquirer found Democratic challenger Bob Casey is leading with 54 percent support to 38 percent for Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate. Last month the margin was 11 percentage points. The Inquirer reported that doubts about the war are contributing to Casey's lead.

Another close fight is being waged in Missouri, where Republican Senator Jim Talent is tied with his Democratic rival, state Auditor Claire McCaskill, according to a poll for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and television station KMOV. Both had 47 percent support in the poll taken last week, the newspaper said.

Recent polls also show Democrats leading in the Senate races in Montana, Ohio, Rhode Island and Virginia, all seats currently held by Republicans. The Republican candidate is narrowly ahead in Tennessee.

In the contest to replace retiring Democratic Senator Paul Sarbanes in Maryland, Representative Ben Cardin is leading Republican Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele 54 percent to 43 percent, a poll taken Oct. 22-26 for the Washington Post showed.

As Election Day draws near, Bush is stepping up his campaign appearances for Republican congressional candidates. The president made campaign appearances last week in Iowa, Florida, Michigan, Indiana and South Carolina. He plans events this week in Georgia, Texas, Montana and Nevada.

It's Who? You Know. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

State Department career diplomats are in an uproar over the recent appointment of a mid-level civil servant who worked for Undersecretary Karen Hughes to a top job running the new Public Diplomacy Rapid Response office in Brussels.

In an unusually strong letter last week to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice , J. Anthony Holmes , head of the American Foreign Service Association, called the selection of Diane Zeleny a "pre-cooked deal," apparently done by manipulating the process and violating personnel rules and standard practices. AFSA, he said, was filing a grievance "to undo this assignment."

The job opening was never properly advertised. It was quietly announced at virtually the last minute in the personnel selection cycle, sources said, so there was no way top officers could apply for it.

Not so, say department officials. There was nothing untoward. The Brussels job wasn't created until the yearly State Department selection process was largely completed, and most people had already received their next posting. In addition, Hughes and Rice believe Zeleny is "the right person for the job," a spokesman said, "and they have full confidence in her."

Holmes's protest comes at a time when career officers were already upset over a wave of lower-level officers with political connections leapfrogging to top jobs. Also new rules require service in hardship posts, especially Iraq, before anyone can get the cushier European jobs. And many of those jobs are being shifted to send diplomats to Sudan and other garden spots.

The Brussels job, Holmes said, "might well have been a perfect fit . . . for a veteran coming out of . . . Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan or Saudi Arabia." But Zeleny was the only one who applied. Holmes called the selection "unfathomable."

Well, not really. Zeleny, who moved to Brussels for this new job at the end of August, has worked for several years in Europe, including in Brussels and at other posts. Besides, Zeleny is married to Reuel Marc Gerecht , an author and a former CIA Middle East specialist who was an early participant in the Project for the New American Century, the neocon hub and center for Iraq war enthusiasts. Gerecht, an expert on terrorism, was a prominent promoter of the war and has met with President Bush to offer advice on Iraq.

Victoria Nuland , a career officer now in Brussels as our ambassador to NATO, is a pal, and Nuland's husband is Robert Kagan , an author and Washington Post columnist and a PNAC founding member. So now there's four for bridge.

Hardly "unfathomable."They Weren't Even Pool Reporters

White House spokesman Tony Snow was hounded by reporters last week as he insisted that Vice President Cheney 's approval of "a dunk in the water" during a radio interview in no way indicated that he approved of waterboarding, a torture technique meant to simulate drowning.

Snow pointed out to incredulous reporters that Cheney was very careful in his use of language and the word "waterboarding" was never uttered. If he meant waterboarding, he would have said it.

Reporters weren't buying it.

"So, wait a minute," CBS reporter Jim Axelrod said. "So 'dunk in the water' means what? We have a pool now at Guantanamo and they go swimming?"

"You doing stand-up?" Snow asked.

"Saying that Vice President Cheney doesn't make mistakes like this," said ABC's Ann Compton , doesn't quite wash. "He did go up and curse a senator to his face on the Senate floor and accidentally shot his friend. So he's not perfect," she noted.

"Not germane," Snow said.

It is clear from the transcript that the interviewer brought up "dunking" in a discussion about terrorism and questioning techniques.

Perhaps Cheney thought he was talking about those county-fair water tanks: five tickets for $10, throw the ball, hit the target, and the person sitting above drops into the water?

As Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told reporters: "Back off."Invading Iraq, Invading Normandy

Speaking of Rumsfeld, Friday's column omitted a statement in one interview that gave important perspective to the current deep divisions over Iraq.

"I think that our country has always had dissent of various types. I lived through World War II," he said. (Rumsfeld was 13 years old when the war ended.) "And there were vicious comments made against our political leadership during that conflict. But the American people absorbed it. We persisted."

Yes. Who can forget those huge riots in Times Square, protesting the D-Day landings?

Beer PAC Aims To Put Congress Under Influence (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

DOJ_NMG_0087803

USA Today, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Congress returns Nov. 13, one bill likely to get a vote is a measure to curb underage drinking.

But the bill before the House is much different from the version lawmakers introduced last year.

Gone are sections that urged the NCAA to ban alcohol ads during college sportscasts and that called alcohol "the most heavily used drug by children." Added is a sentence that could help beer distributors fend off challenges to state regulations that require them — and only them — to transport beer to retailers.

The National Beer Wholesalers Association, a little-known but influential advocacy group, takes credit for the additional line and worked with the alcohol industry to delete the other sections. The beer group's political action committee (PAC) is one of the top givers to congressional candidates for the Nov. 7 elections.

The beer wholesalers are "the pit bull of the alcoholic-beverage industry," says George Hacker, who directs an anti-alcohol campaign led by the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a consumer group.

Since 1999, the beer wholesalers' PAC has given $8.6 million to federal candidates, exceeding donations by the American Medical Association, the American Bankers Association and the National Association of Home Builders for that period, according to the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks campaign funds.

That money opens doors to lawmakers' offices, where beer-association lobbyists fight to cut taxes, block federal efforts to regulate drinking, and erase descriptions of alcohol's economic and health costs in bills. Since 2005, the association has donated the maximum $10,000 in campaign contributions allowed to about 135 lawmakers, mostly Republicans, according to records of the Center for Responsive Politics and the Federal Election Commission. Many recipients support association priorities.

"They get an immediate audience when they want it because of the money they've given and the relationships they've developed," Hacker says. "They have lots more leverage with (congressional) leadership than even members of Congress do."

Chuck Hurley, CEO of Mothers Against Drunk Driving, says that leverage was shown when the association won an audience with the seven sponsors of the underage-drinking bill. "To have a meeting with that many members to change a bill requires a fair amount of access," says Hurley, a longtime congressional staffer, lobbyist and highway-safety expert.

The beer association's small size — more than 1,900 members — makes its political largesse striking. The biggest PACs include the 56,000-member Association of Trial Lawyers of America, the 750,000-member International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the National Association of Realtors, about 1.4 million strong.

"Our members understand the importance of advocacy," says Craig Purser, the beer association's president. Beer, he notes, is regulated and taxed by the federal government and states. Both also license beer distributors. And alcohol faces sharp scrutiny as states have tightened drunken-driving laws and health advocates focus on underage binge drinking.

That helps explain why the beer association and other alcohol-industry groups got lawmakers to delete from the underage-drinking bill three pages of "findings" that detailed alcohol's insidious effects. "There are some things you don't want in the Congressional Record if you don't agree with them or don't think them to be true," Purser says.

Last year, the beer wholesalers helped remove from a highway bill that became law "troubling provisions aimed at mandating programs to deal with drunk driving," according to the association's 2005 annual report.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., a sponsor of the underage-drinking measure, says cutting the three pages of findings "doesn't change the bill." It authorizes $72 million for underage-drinking prevention programs over four years and requires an annual federal report on those under 21 who drink.

The beer association got sponsors to add a sentence to the bill calling for "continued state regulation" of alcohol. That seemingly benign phrase helps beer distributors fight large retailers such as Costco that want to take over beer distribution, says Eric Shepard, executive editor of Beer Marketer's Insights, an industry newsletter. "It helps legitimize the positions beer wholesalers have and the roles they play," Shepard says.

The beer association rose from obscurity after Congress doubled the beer excise tax to $18 a barrel in 1991, which Purser describes as a "a wake-up call." A top priority has been repealing the increase, proposed in a bill that has 207 sponsors in the House and 13 in the Senate. Since 2005, about 160 of those sponsors have received $1.35 million from the association, according to Center for Responsive Politics data.

Purser says contributions aren't tied to any single issue but are given based on candidates' "understanding of issues important to beer distributors."

The repeal, proposed regularly since the mid-1990s, has not passed. No one, however, has sought to raise beer taxes. "Any time you've got almost 50% of one chamber wanting to reduce the tax," Purser says, "that makes it much more difficult for them to advocate for increasing the tax."

Pain From U.S. Housing Slump Is Likely To Linger, But Some Say Worst May Be Past By JAMES R. HAGERTY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

Just when the gloomier pundits were starting to enjoy the housing slump, optimists are piping up to declare it could be almost over.

Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, whose interest-rate cuts helped create what he once called "froth" in house prices, said in a speech last week that he detected "early signs of stabilization" in the housing market. Some Wall Street economists also are saying the worst may be behind us.

Not so fast, replies Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics Ltd., a Valhalla, N.Y., research firm: "It's going to get worse before it gets better."

CAST YOUR VOTE

Question of the Day:1 How will home prices in your neighborhood change over the next year?

Both camps are making valid points. The maximum impact of falling home construction may have hit the U.S. economy in the third quarter, some economists say. But that doesn't mean the housing market is on the verge of a miracle recovery. Construction is expected to fall further as builders struggle to shed a glut of unsold homes. And many economists expect house and condominium prices to continue falling for at least an additional six months to a year in parts of the nation where speculators went wild.

For now, the consensus among economists is that the housing downturn will remain a drag on the economy but probably won't sink the U.S. into a recession next year. Even Mr. Shepherdson, among the most bearish, believes the U.S. has a 60% chance of averting a recession in 2007. In any case, the weak housing market will remain painful for speculators who loaded up on credit to buy near the top -- and for millions of people working in housing-related industries. Just last week, Countrywide Financial, the U.S.'s largest mortgage lender, announced plans to shed about 2,500 jobs, or 4.5% of the company's total.

Largely because residential investment dropped at an annual rate of 17%, inflation-adjusted economic growth in the U.S. slowed to a feeble rate of 1.6% in the third quarter, according to an estimate released by the Commerce Department. Without that drop in residential building, economists said, the growth rate would have been about 2.7%.

After the third-quarter carnage, expect "some gradual improvement from here," says Peter Kretzmer, a senior economist at Bank of America in New York. He expects residential construction to decline at an annual rate of 13% in the current quarter, 5% in next year's first quarter and 2.2% in the second quarter before starting to grow again. Mr. Shepherdson disagrees, arguing that the drop in construction will accelerate before the market regains balance.

Offsetting the housing damage are several positives. Gasoline prices and mortgage interest rates have fallen in recent months. The stock-market rally has made some people feel richer, even as those who trust only in real estate feel poorer. And job growth, though unspectacular, continues at a "solid" pace, says Scott Anderson, an economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

With home prices flat to lower in much of the country, Americans already have less ability to tap their home equity to finance spending. But it is unclear how much effect that will have on consumer spending. Some economists believe that rising wages, the stock-market rally and lower energy costs will be enough to keep Americans loading their shopping carts with iPods and flat-screen TVs.

Mr. Greenspan sees hope in the rate of applications for home-purchase mortgages. After falling in the second half of 2005 and earlier this year, they have leveled off in recent weeks.

Some of the optimists' arguments are dubious. To bolster its position that the housing market is stabilizing, the National Association of Realtors last week trumpeted a 2.4% decline during September in the number of previously occupied homes offered for sale through multiple-listing services. But the Realtors' news release didn't mention that listings almost always decline in September, when the back-to-school season means fewer people are moving. Over the past 20 years, listings have declined an average of 3.4% in September, says Ivy Zelman, a Cleveland-based housing analyst for Credit Suisse.

Ms. Zelman, who last year correctly predicted a plunge in home-builder share prices, thinks investors who now are bidding those prices back up are way too early. Sales of new homes are unlikely to start rising again before early 2008, she says. Meanwhile, "land is going down in value daily," she says.

Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at research firm MFR in New York, is more upbeat but still thinks home prices will "stagnate" on a nationwide basis for several years, as rises in parts of the country are offset by continued declines elsewhere.

After the unusually steep surge in home prices during the first half of this decade, he says, it will take time for incomes to catch up again with housing costs.

Bursting Bubble Blues (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

Here are the five stages of housing grief:

1. Housing bubble? What housing bubble? "A national severe price distortion [in housing] seems most unlikely in the United States." (Alan Greenspan, October 2004)

2. "There's a little froth in this market," but "we don't perceive that there is a national bubble." (Alan Greenspan, May 2005)

3. Housing is slumping, but "despite what you hear from some of the Eeyores in the analytical community, a recession is not visible on the horizon." (Richard Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, August 2006)

4. Well, that was a lousy quarter, but "I feel good about the U.S. economy, I really do." (Henry Paulson, the Treasury secretary, last Friday)

5. Insert expletive here.

We've now reached stage 4. Will we move on to stage 5?

Over the last few years, most good U.S. economic news has been the result of soaring home prices. Spending on new houses created jobs and poured cash into the economy. Consumers borrowed against the rising values of existing homes and went on a buying spree, spending more than they earned for the first time since the great depression.

But the housing boom became a bubble, fueled by a surge of irresponsible bank lending, which continues even now. (Yesterday's Denver Post tells of a runaway prisoner who managed to borrow enough to buy three expensive houses while on the lam, then bought two more while in prison.) The question now is how much pain the bursting bubble will inflict.

Last week's report on G.D.P. showed the first signs of serious economic damage. According to the "advance" estimates (which are often subject to major revisions), growth in the third quarter of 2006 slowed to its worst level since early 2003. A plunge in spending on residential construction, which fell at an annual rate of 17 percent, was the main culprit. But was that just a temporary setback, or the beginning of something much worse?

Some say the worst is already over. Mr. Greenspan, who's been an optimist all the way, now argues that the latest data on new-home sales and mortgage applications suggest that housing has already bottomed out. Business investment is still growing briskly, and so far consumers haven't cut their spending. So maybe this is as bad as it gets.

But I think the pessimists have a stronger case. There's a lot of evidence that home prices, although they've started to decline, are still way out of line. Spending on home construction remains abnormally high as a percentage of G.D.P., because banks are still lending freely in spite of rapidly rising foreclosure rates.

This means that home sales probably still have a long way to fall. And you don't want to make too much of the fact that some housing indicators have turned up; those indicators tend to bounce around a lot from month to month.

Moreover, much of the good news in the latest economic report is unsustainable at best, suspect at worst. Almost half of last quarter's estimated growth was the result of a reported surge in automobile output, which some observers think was a statistical illusion, not something that really happened.

So this is probably just the beginning. How bad can it get? Well, you don't have to go far to find grim forecasts: Merrill Lynch predicts that the unemployment rate will rise from 4.6 percent now to 5.8 percent by the end of next year.

In case you're wondering, I don't blame the Bush administration for the latest bad economic numbers. If anyone is to blame for the current situation, it's Mr. Greenspan, who pooh-poohed warnings about an emerging bubble and did nothing to crack down on irresponsible lending.

Still, the bad news will have political consequences. The Bush administration has been trying to shift attention away from the disaster in Iraq to an allegedly booming economy. That strategy wasn't working too well even when the headline numbers were good, because it never felt like a boom to most Americans. But now even the headline numbers have turned lousy.

And if that hurts the G.O.P. in next week's election, well, there's a certain poetic justice involved. The administration tried to claim undeserved credit for the positive effects of the housing boom, so why shouldn't it receive some blame for the negative effects of the housing bust?

Pressure On Your Health Benefits (TIME)

After watching health-care costsÂ rise more than 60% in the past five years, most of America's 177 million insured workers are bracing for another dose of pain. As this November once again brings open-enrollment season--that annual headache of working out how much more of our paychecks will go to health benefits next year--2007 looks to bring no relief. For the average employee, premiums and out-of-pocket expenses will reach $2,904 a year for a family, up $300 from 2006. That's the pass-along pain of the costs that employers now endure, nearly $9,000 per employee, up an estimated $518 from this year.

Containing those costs is a new corporate imperative. Among the tactics: bosses are skimping on raises. They're being more restrictive about covering family members and offering more preventive programs to keep workers healthy--or at least forcing them to take more responsibility for their health-care spending. That is, if they even offer health benefits. Thirty-nine percent of companies offer no medical benefits, up from 31% in 2000. About 60% of companies say they expect coverage to decrease. So it's not surprising that 80% of Americans polled say the system is broken. "Really all humanity has been stripped out," says Cathi Shaefer, a grocery clerk for the supermarket giant Safeway in Upland, Calif. "The care of people is getting a lot less attention than numbers."

The few companies that have been able to keep their costs down could gain an advantage over rivals, since the disparity between those paying the highest price for health care and those paying the lowest is estimated at $3,000 per employee. For a firm of 10,000 workers, that's $30 million, a chunk of change that would have nearly any executive sweating his competitiveness.

One antidote to the cost spiral: puny raises and fatter deductibles. "Most companies realize they couldn't hire anybody if they didn't offer medical benefits," says Helen Darling, president of the National Business Group on Health. "But they also expect employees to share more of the burden." Workers can't help feeling it. According to Department of Labor statistics, salaries rose 3% from June 2005 to June 2006, but inflation rose 4.7% and health care 8%.

Those numbers won't change much in 2007. Someone making $40,000 a year can anticipate a 4% pay increase next year. (Don't spend it all in one place.) With health-care costs expected to rise about 7%, that means at least 16% of that raise would go to higher premiums or new out-of-pocket expenses. Stated another way, your 4% raise is actually closer to 3%. Of course, employers tend to look at it differently. "It's a phenomenon we call the hidden paycheck because companies have essentially been substituting health-benefit dollars for salary and merit increases," says Ron Fontanetta of the benefits-consulting firm Towers Perrin.

Companies are also saving money by cracking down on eligibility and raising costs for extended family coverage. Many have begun to impose a monthly surcharge of $50 to $200 to cover spouses and partners who could otherwise get coverage from their employer. Employees are now often paying more to cover their dependents themselves. Following the automobile industry's lead, many firms--about half of all businesses--are conducting audits, requiring marriage licenses or birth certificates to verify coverage for some spouses and dependents. Ford has cut more than 50,000 people from its rolls and Chrysler 26,000. That's a drop in the bucket when you expect to spend $2.3 billion on health care, Chrysler spokesman David Elshoff says, "but at that amount, you're looking at every option to bring costs down."

In addition to being less generous, businesses are being less paternal too, forcing workers to be more accountable for spending, a practice called consumer-driven health care. One immediate change has been a move away from fixed co-payments for such medical expenses as doctor visits and prescription drugs. That's being supplanted by coinsurance, under which the covered person pays a percentage of the expense. Nearly half of companies will have made the switch by next year. "The idea is to get employees to think before heading to the doctor for a cold," says Columbia University professor of health management Sherry Glied, "to shop around a little for the best price."

Another option growing in popularity: high-deductible health plans coupled with a reimbursement mechanism, most often a health-savings account. Younger and healthier workers increasingly select such coverage, which combines a deductible of at least $1,000 with a tax-deferred savings account to which employers sometimes contribute. Chicago-based accounting firm Blackman Kallick offered its more than 200 employees the plan this year. "About 10% chose it," says human-resources manager Suzanne Palombi, "many more than we anticipated." For Blackman, that equates to a 33% drop in premium costs for those workers.

Such savings from high-deductible plans, however, are most likely short lived. A study by benefits-consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide found no correlation between high-deductible plans and companies with the lowest health-care costs. And a Rand Corp. report last week showed that people with such coverage more often forgo necessary care--which generally leads to greater expense later.

Indeed, most corporations are focused on giving employees incentives to stay healthy. Some 60% promote preventive care through wellness programs, including smoking cessation and health-club discounts. "More than ever before, companies are seeing the link between good health and productivity," says Beth Bierbower, vice president of product innovation for insurance provider Humana. "So they're engaging employees more on what their personal needs are."

Humana offers customers several wellness components in their plans. One includes a point system, designed by British firm Virgin, in which a pedometer records an employee's movements. Each step, with extra credit for exercise activities, is converted into points that can buy music, sports equipment and even airline tickets. At Illinois-based International Truck and Engine Co., a similar program has its workforce racing CEO Daniel Ustian to better health. A quarter of its 17,000 employees put in 27 miles a week.

It's not the walkers who are the problem, though. Since 10% of employees account for 70% of costs, identifying and caring for those at the highest risk for illness is a priority. Employees at South Carolina's private utility SCANA who fill out annual health assessments get a special break: their premiums don't rise. Of the company's 15,000 workers, 94% took advantage of that offer this year. The data SCANA and other companies collect can then go toward disease management for such illnesses as diabetes and high blood pressure. At International Truck and Engine, where costs have remained flat the past two years, health professionals call chronically ill employees regularly (unless they opt out) to offer advice on care and medication. SCANA provides drugs through an in-house pharmacy. "We then can buy drugs at a wholesale price," says Joe Bouknight, SCANA's human-resources director. "In 2007 that will represent a nice discount for us and our employees." If only that were true for the rest of us.

America's Best Health Plans (USNEWS)

By Michelle Andrews

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

When Betty Noel was diagnosed with endometrial cancer last year, her husband, Larry, figured most of the costs would be paid by healthcare coverage from his job managing the garden shop at a Kmart in Lynchburg, Va. But when he got a $13,270 bill for the first month of Betty's radiation therapy, he found out differently. K Care Value Plan, his health insurer, informed him that the maximum coverage for outpatient services was $1,200 a year. Larry and Betty would be responsible for coming up with the rest. "We were shocked," says Larry, 59, who was paying about $300 a month for coverage. "I pay more than that just in premiums every year."

The Noels' experience is hardly unique. As healthcare costs have continued to climb-premiums rose 7.7 percent this year-employers have been shifting more of them onto workers' shoulders. The $5 copay has gone the way of the nickel candy bar. These days you can expect to shell out $20 or more every time you visit the doctor and pony up 20 to 30 percent coinsurance for some drugs and services. Annual deductibles of $1,000 or more are becoming more common.

At the same time, benefits are shrinking. "Definitely, we are seeing a trend toward lower benefits across the board," says Beth Darnley, chief program officer for the Patient Advocate Foundation, a nonprofit based in Newport News, Va., that helps people resolve health coverage problems. In the Noels' case, the foundation contacted Kmart. Within a few months the company revised its insurance to cover up to $500,000 annually for inpatient and outpatient care combined. (Kmart declined to comment.)

Out of pocket. That was good news, but it didn't solve all of the Noels'problems. Larry still had to withdraw $5,000 from his 401(k) retirement plan and take $4,000 out of their savings to cover the 20 percent coinsurance they owed for Betty's cancer care. He says, "Sometimes I wonder-what if I get to the point where I can't afford this anymore?"

It's a question many people are asking themselves. Healthcare ranked as the No. 1 concern, outpolling war and terrorism, among those responding to the annual health confidence survey released last week by the Employee Benefit Research Institute. Six in 10 respondents rated the American health system "fair" or "poor," and more than half said they are not satisfied with the cost of healthcare. In studies, people consistently give the healthcare system high marks for quality, and the rankings assembled here and on the Web by U.S.News in partnership with the National Committee for Quality Assurance, managed care's primary accrediting body, showcase the top performers in this important area. But people are worried about expenses, and as healthcare costs continue to shift to individuals, anxiety and dissatisfaction mount.

The buzzword for this cost-shifting is "consumerism." The latest hot concept to capture the imagination of health plans, employers, politicians, and policy wonks, consumerism hands the healthcare reins to individuals, giving them more responsibility for making decisions about their medical care-and a bigger financial stake in paying for it. The most high-profile way that consumerism has entered the mainstream is through health savings accounts (HSAs)-tax-advantaged financial accounts, attached to high-deductible health plans, that people can use to cover their medical bills and save for future medical costs. In addition, health plans are offering members a growing array of "consumer driven" tools that aim to help those in any kind of health plan evaluate healthcare prices, pick doctors and hospitals that are both cost effective and high in quality, get appropriate screenings and tests, and otherwise manage their health. Employers, meanwhile, are steering workers toward cheaper drugs, medical services, and providers by offering lower copayments and other incentives for certain choices.

It's 'Seller Beware' In Housing (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0087808

By Alex Markels

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

Roger Maehler has good reason to feel smug about the panoramic mountain views from his new backyard.

"I think I got a good deal," the Scottsdale, Ariz., resident says of the acre-plus adobe ranchette he snagged last week for $655,000-a 23 percent discount from the original $850,000 asking price.

Complete with swimming pool, spa, and a big-screen TV in the great room, the sprawling five-bedroom property was high on his list when he began shopping for a new home in May. But like many buyers these days, Maehler decided to hold off and see how the weakening market shook out over the summer. "I guess it was worth the wait," he says.

Since prices topped out in July, the housing downturn now underway in many parts of the country has already lopped $10,000, or 4.3 percent, off the median price of an existing home, the largest dollar decline the National Association of Realtors has ever recorded. Prices of newly built homes have slumped even more, sinking by 15.5 percent since their April peak, according to the Commerce Department.

Contrarians. While some areas like Houston and Seattle have bucked the trend, prices in once hot markets like Boston are now down by more than 10 percent from their high point. The same goes for parts of the Phoenix area, where the number of homes on the market has more than doubled to 45,000 since last October.

"I literally could have spent eight hours a day, five days a week looking at houses," says Maehler, who toured more than 30 properties before making a bid.

Indeed, the national inventory of 4.3 million unsold homes now stands at about a seven-month supply, a glut some economists say will persist until sellers make meaningful cuts in their asking prices. "Buyers want more than the traditional 2 to 5 percent price reduction before they sign on the dotted line," says Gregory Miller, chief economist for SunTrust Bank, who doesn't expect a significant reduction in inventory until early next year.

That assumes, of course, that sellers like Zaher El-Assi are willing to play along. Even after more than a year with his condo on the market, the Boston resident has steadfastly refused his real-estate agent's pleas to lower the $799,000 price. "I just want to see if I can get the right price," he says of the two offers he has turned down already.

People like El-Assi are "the seller's equivalent of the Looky Lou," says Jason Weissman, his frustrated broker, who estimates that as many as a third of sellers in the Boston area aren't serious about pricing their homes to sell.

Such inflexibility worries economists like Mark Zandi, who says it could take a "Roto-Rooter" to finally flush stubborn sellers-and their market-clogging inventory-from real-estate listings.

In the short run, he expects the market could stabilize somewhat as new construction slows and dejected sellers temporarily pull their homes off during the slow winter season. "But it could very well be a dead-cat bounce," the Moody's Economy.com chief economist says of the chance that a strong economy and persistent inflation will push up mortgage interest rates-just as sellers move to relist their houses in the spring. If that happens, "it'll come right out of housing prices again."

Bush Ventures Into 'killing Fields' In First Mid-term Foray (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Sellersburg, Indiana

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

President George W. Bush finally gave a new meaning to the word bully in his bully pulpit at the weekend.

With just 11 days before the end of his last political campaign, Mr Bush on Saturday starred in his first public rally of the mid-term elections. He rolled up his blue shirtsleeves to lambast Democrats as the party that would raise taxes and negotiate with terrorists.

Selling his party's message in Indiana, the president resembled an old-fashioned revivalist. His evocation of Democratic sins spurred the crowd at the Silver Creek High School, Sellersburg, into an ecstatic chorus of "Amen", "That's right", and one man spontaneously interjecting "You're the man, George".

The official White House transcript showed that the speech was punctuated by 98 bursts of applause and 12 "boos" at the spectre of activist judges, House Democrat leader Nancy Pelosi and gay marriage. The crowd of 4,000 – die-hard Republicans, the merely curious and an Abraham Lincoln impersonator – stamped their feet with unabashed approval and waggled pom-poms.

In a moment more pantomime than politics, Mr Bush encouraged the audience to shout "Just Say No" as he asked: "When it comes to detaining terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer? When it comes to trying terrorists, what's the Democrats' answer?"

For a beaming Mr Bush it was a welcome return to a vernacular he has long been at ease with. Four years ago he held more than 30 public rallies in the congressional campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0087809

In a sign of how his popularity has ebbed, Laura Bush, the First Lady who is more popular than her husband, appeared at two rallies on Saturday. Senator John McCain, the aspiring presidential candidate for 2008, has already held eight rallies this season – he did two on Saturday in Connecticut.

The fact that Mr Bush was in the ninth district of Indiana, a traditionally conservative region in a state that has only voted for the Democratic presidential candidate four times since 1896, underlines the challenge facing the party. It was the first visit by a sitting president since Lyndon Johnson opened a post office in 1964.

Sellersburg is located in the southern tip of the state, next to Kentucky. It is in the heart of the Ohio River valley, an area White House strategists concede is a significant problem.

"A Republican consultant referred to Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania as the killing fields of the Republicans this year," says Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report. "There are no three worse states in the union for Republican House candidates."

Polls show three Indiana seats are at risk. Jeff Hostettler has already been written off as one of the three most vulnerable Republican incumbents, with Chris Chocola nearly as shaky. Mike Sodrel, whose district includes Sellersburg, stood hip to hip with Mr Bush. He has the best hope of retaining his seat, trailing by 2 percentage points in polls.

The White House is paying attention. Last week Mrs Bush made the second of two visits, posing with pumpkins. Barbara Bush, the president's mother, has been through and on Monday Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, will visit Jeffersonville, eight miles away.

Saturday's rally was pure White House stagecraft. The lone black person in the room, and a Hispanic couple, were positioned directly behind Mr Bush. Dozens of ostensibly handcrafted signs – including "Moms for Mike" – were handed out by campaign aides.

Although strategists have dismissed the power of "values voters" in this election, arguing they have been trumped by Iraq and the economy, many of the crowd stressed the primacy of social issues. "Sodrel is against abortion and is pro-gun. My husband is a gun nut. Family values are the top issue for me. The other side are trying to kill babies and take away our guns," said Candace Crone, who described herself as "someone who loves my country".

Penne Keith, whose husband painted an American flag on his front lawn after the terror attacks in 2001, said she admired Mr Bush as "very moral, a Christian believer . . . My husband called in sick today to attend the rally, the first day he has missed this whole year."

The question is whether those at the rally show the same loyalty on November 7. In a nod that his own legacy is at stake, Mr Bush urged them to vote. "Your vote will have an impact not only on your lives here, but an impact that will help determine the course of this nation."

Bush Shows Potency In Rallying The Faithful (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 29 — For all the talk about the political baggage that President Bush carries this year, his stop in Indiana on Saturday showed that he could still turn on — and, White House strategists say, turn out — the most faithful party voters.

Women screamed his name, men chanted "U.S.A.," and no one doubted that the 4,000 people packed into a high school gymnasium for a rally in Sellersburg were primed to urge friends and neighbors to vote on Nov. 7 for Representative Mike Sodrel, who won his seat by just 1,300 votes two years ago.

The scene will repeat itself over and over before Nov. 7, as President Bush plunges into a blitz of rallies for embattled candidates. As the White House moves into its end game for this campaign, a crucial element is the use of the president to rally core voters in certain districts — and either to stop a Democratic takeover of the House and possibly the Senate in the last two years of Mr. Bush's presidency, or, at least, to keep the opposition's gains to a minimum.

The appearances buck the conventional wisdom that Mr. Bush is such a pariah to Republicans that he cannot be of much use on the campaign trail. White House strategists say they have carefully selected several make-or-break races in which the president's presence can still make a difference.

Over the next few days, Mr. Bush, whom members of both parties count as a thoroughbred campaigner, will go to Georgia (twice), Montana, Nevada and Texas.

"In a lot of these places a presidential appearance is going to make a difference in that district," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said in an interview on Sunday. Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush would use the appearances to press a new message that the Democrats have not united on a plan for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0087810

The strategy is not without its risks. It keeps Mr. Bush front and center when even strategists close to the White House have wondered in private conversations whether it would be better for him to focus on being presidential — perhaps concentrating on foreign policy — when Democrats are working hard to make the elections a national referendum on his policies.

"Anytime Bush is out, he's still on the news at night nationally and in newspapers in all of these competitive districts," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Wherever he goes, he's still hurting Republican incumbents."

The parade of Republican officeholders publicly distancing themselves from Mr. Bush has not let up. And that is seriously limiting the places where he can be of help. Last week, Representative John Hostettler, Republican of Indiana, told The Evansville Courier and Press that he had declined White House offers of help: "We just decided, just said, 'Just stay in Washington,' " the paper quoted Mr. Hostettler as saying.

But battles like Mr. Sodrel's, against Baron Hill, a former Democratic congressman, will be decided by which side can turn out its core voters. And that is something White House planners say Mr. Bush is still able to do. Yes, only 38 percent of respondents to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll said they approved of the job the president was doing. But that is still something for the White House to work with.

Many of the president's most loyal followers live in places like Sellersburg, where Mr. Bush beat John Kerry by nearly 20 percentage points in 2004, and where his message of low taxes and national defense can still pack a wallop.

Mr. Sodrel's campaign manager, Cam Savage, was only too happy to point out that the 4,000 tickets for the event sold out in just a couple of hours. In the 2000 census, Sellersburg had just over 6,000 residents.

The president's announced stops this week are in other fairly small towns that voted for him by wide margins: Billings, Mont.; Elko, Nev.; Perry, Ga.; Statesboro, Ga.; and Sugar Land, Tex. The combined population of those five places is just over 200,000.

In essence, these are slivers of the country where Mr. Bush's appearances will make a big splash in local papers and on local radio, where he is relatively popular, and where the election will hinge on base voters rather than, say, swing voters who may find him polarizing.

The president's two stops in Georgia on Monday and Tuesday are for two Republicans, Max Burns and Mac Collins, who are making headway in challenges against two Democratic incumbents, Representatives John Barrow and Jim Marshall, respectively. Mr. Bush is popular enough in those areas that the Democratic incumbents have tried to align themselves with him.

"We've gotten rid of 6,500 tickets for the rally already. We'd take him anytime," Tim Baker, Mr. Burns's campaign manager, said. "Bush will help our voters understand the stakes and get them to polls."

And then there are stops like the one on Monday in Sugar Land, for the seat that had belonged to Representative Tom DeLay, whose sudden resignation this year put a usually safe Republican seat in jeopardy.

Mr. Bush won the district over Mr. Kerry in 2004 by nearly 30 percentage points, but the Democrat, Nick Lampson, is favored to win. His main Republican opponent will need all the help she can get from Mr. Bush. She is a write-in candidate with a name that may not be easy to remember: Shelley Sekula-Gibbs.

A Tangle Of A Race To Fill DeLay's Old Seat (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 29 — Hoping against the odds to keep a prize Republican Congressional seat from falling to the Democrats next week, President Bush travels to his home state on Monday for a rally in the district long led by his Texas ally Tom DeLay.

But in a topsy-turvy race with more than its share of bizarre twists, the rally in Sugar Land is not for Mr. DeLay, the former House majority leader. Mr. DeLay, who is facing legal and ethical questions, capped a primary victory in March with the announcement that he was abandoning his run for a 12th term, resigning from Congress and moving to Virginia.

Instead, Mr. Bush is the headliner for a Houston councilwoman, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, who emerged only in August as the Republican choice for the 22nd Congressional District and who is running in two elections: the general election on Nov. 7 and a special election the same day to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term. Her main opponent to fill the House seat for the next two years is Nick Lampson, a Democrat and former congressman who has been campaigning for more than a year and is favored to win.

"The president is coming to rally the troops, and I am so thrilled," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist serving her third two-year term on the Houston City Council, said Friday by phone from the campaign trail. Asked if Mr. Bush's negative approval ratings could hurt her, she was indignant. "Only a Democrat would say that," she said. "He's tremendous. I'm thrilled he's coming."

As for Mr. Lampson, she said, "He's toast."

DOJ_NMG_0087811

Mr. Lampson, 61, who lost his House seat in a neighboring district after the 2003 redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay, has shored up his moderate credentials with endorsements from the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the National Rifle Association and has been beaming victory grins at campaign stops.

"This has been, believe it or not, a fun race," he told National Public Radio last week. "I thought it was going to be difficult and very ugly. It has not turned out that way."

But discord broke out Friday after Ms. Sekula-Gibbs showed up inside a Sugar Land polling place where voters were casting early ballots, setting off charges by Texas Democrats and the Lampson camp that she had willfully broken the law by campaigning inside a polling place. Ms. Sekula-Gibbs said she had been campaigning outside and briefly went in to use the restroom and inquire about voter turnout.

In one of the many oddities of the race, Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, 53, is running twice, as her campaign jingle, "Vote Twice for Shelley," to the tune of "Roll Out the Barrel," reminds voters. She is on the ballot with three other Republicans and a Libertarian in the special election that Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, waited until the last minute to call to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term until January. And she is a write-in candidate against Mr. Lampson as well as a Libertarian and two other write-ins in the general election to the 2007-8 Congress.

Only the Libertarian candidate, Bob Smither, 62, an engineer, appears on the ballot in both elections.

Mr. Lampson, perhaps reluctant to risk a loss for little gain, chose not to run in the special election. If Ms. Sekula-Gibbs takes the interim House seat but loses the general election, she would still be compelled to give up her Council position, a base for future campaigns, which has prompted speculation that she may turn down the interim seat. She declined to say.

"I'm running for both seats; I'm winning both seats," she said several times.

Her exclusion from the ballot in the general election goes back to the April decision by Mr. DeLay to give up his re-election race. He is under indictment in Austin in a felony campaign finance case and is facing an ethics investigation into his relationship with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in Washington.

The Texas Republican Party sought to designate a replacement candidate, but the Democrats, eager to keep the focus on Mr. DeLay and his problems, sued to keep him on the ballot. They argued that the voters had chosen Mr. DeLay as the Republican candidate and that replacing him on his assertion that he would not be a Texas resident on Election Day, as required under the Constitution, amounted to illegal manipulation of the voting list.

A federal judge agreed, preventing the Republicans from listing anyone but Mr. DeLay.

Ms. Sekula-Gibbs, in turn, has been trying to educate voters in how to use the new computerized voting machines to spell out her name.

Midterm Vote May Define Rove's Legacy (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

By many calculations, Democrats are ready to make big gains in the midterm elections, enough to take over the House and possibly the Senate. But White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten says there is one reason he is feeling upbeat amid so much Republican gloom.

"I believe Karl Rove," Bolten said in an interview in his West Wing office Friday. "Karl Rove, somewhere inside that massive brain of his, has figured out the political landscape more clearly than the entire collection of conventional-wisdom pundits and pollsters in the entire city of Washington."

That was true for two elections in a row, in 2002 and 2004, and President Bush's senior adviser has insisted to West Wing colleagues and party faithful alike that it will be again. But Rove is just eight days from having his genius designation revoked -- or upgraded to platinum status.

Even within Rove's own party, expectations are widespread that the Nov. 7 elections will mark a repudiation for the base-rallying, contrast-drawing brand of politics with which he and Bush have been so closely aligned. But it is a mark of the particular place Rove holds in the Washington psyche that even the most exuberant Democrats are wondering why he seems so confident.

There are two questions. Is Rove just acting cocky as a way of lifting GOP morale, or does he really believe it? And, if the latter, is he deluding himself, or does he once again know something that Democrats do not?

The answers have implications well beyond Rove's reputation. Midterm congressional losses for the GOP, some analysts and Republican veterans believe, could effectively end the Bush presidency two years ahead of schedule.

If the Republicans were to lose control of at least one chamber, those in the party who have long seen Rove's approach as polarizing would feel emboldened. At the same time, a new panel co-chaired by the man who exemplifies the GOP establishment, former secretary of state James A. Baker III, is preparing to chart a new course on the Iraq war -- which polls suggest is the single largest reason for the Republicans' current travails.

"The architect may find his engineering plans were faulty," said one former senior official of past GOP administrations, who has watched the current one with increasing dismay. "Turning out the base this year may not be a winning or a governing strategy. America seems to be looking forward to making things work together, rather than dividing people across the board."

Rove is dismissive of the idea that the Republicans will lose the 15 House seats or six Senate seats required to cede control to the Democrats. On Tuesday, when the White House hosted radio talk show hosts from around the country, Rove did at least 13 interviews. He was on the phone with Washington association executives with what one called "happy talk" about voter-turnout metrics, polling data and campaign funding.

"I look at the individual races as clear-eyed as I can every single day, knowing what we are doing and knowing that we have the capacity to move the resources in if we need to do more," Rove said in a brief telephone interview from the road last week. "Incumbents are hard to defeat. Our candidates by and large have significantly more resources than they have. And we have succeeded in making these races choices between two local candidates."

An object of fascination on both the left and right, Rove at age 55 counts as one of the most celebrated and notorious figures in modern presidential history. Inside the White House, he is a revered figure, known as something of a jokester who will show up at senior staff meetings bearing snacks and promising a coup if Bolten is absent. Ed Rogers, a prominent GOP lobbyist, calls him "the glue" that holds the White House together.

Rove has also acquired something close to cult status among movement conservatives: After the president, Laura Bush and Vice President Cheney, Rove is the most powerful draw on the GOP fundraising circuit. He has headlined more than 100 fundraisers this campaign cycle, raising close to $13 million for Republican candidates and causes.

And when he does show up to speak, as at the annual dinner of the Erie County Republican Party earlier this month in Buffalo, Rove is greeted like a visitor from Hollywood. Rove worked the room, posing for pictures, signing programs and making small talk with hundreds of GOP faithful, none of whom seemed disappointed that a deputy White House chief of staff was a last-minute substitute for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

The trip was arranged at the behest of embattled Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. Before the speech, Reynolds said, he made sure Rove inspected the damage from an unexpected snowstorm and received a briefing from Federal Emergency Management Agency officials. A few days later, Bush declared a federal emergency, making the city eligible for up to $200 million in disaster aid.

The White House says Rove had nothing to do with the designation, but Reynolds was clearly happy with the visit. "He has recognized that all politics is local," Reynolds said. Referring to Rove's overnight visit in the middle of a busy campaign season, he said, "The guy did a real favor for me."

The flip side of adulation is paranoia. Many Democrats are convinced Rove has some trick up his sleeve -- Osama bin Laden in the freezer, perhaps, ready for release just before Election Day -- that will save the Republicans from electoral disaster this fall.

"Karl is an absolute figure of fascination," said Walter Isaacson, president of the Aspen Institute, which hosted Rove at its annual "Ideas Festival" this summer. "What stuns people who don't know him is how personally charming he is, especially people who consider him the devil or a strange genius."

Isaacson said Rove not only answered questions for close to 90 minutes before a packed auditorium but also bantered for hours afterward with the high-powered attendees from the worlds of policy, politics and big business. For 40 minutes, he said, Rove engaged in the fine points of stem cell research with Silicon Valley venture capitalist John Doerr. "It always astonishes me that he knows more details about policy than anyone else -- that's the source of his strength," said Isaacson, who has also dealt with Rove extensively on issues of Louisiana reconstruction.

Rove was formally in charge of White House policy until this past spring, when he gave up the portfolio as part of a reshuffling of responsibilities engineered by Bolten. The shake-up was widely seen in Washington as a rebuke to Rove, though Bolten said he wanted to free up his friend for the big strategic thinking and politics he believes he does best.

Rove reads and makes comments on virtually everything the president is slated to say, plays a pivotal role in shaping the overall White House message and still plays an influential role on policy, according to Bolten. His decades-old relationship with the president appears strong and deep, as the two confer every day, sometimes multiple times, on political developments and other issues. He works closely with Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman to coordinate strategy, resource decisions and get-out-the vote efforts.

Bolten, who says he holds only Bush in higher regard than Rove, said he felt that when he took over this spring, Rove's portfolio, "even with his extraordinary abilities, would be unmanageable, especially going into a campaign season." Being in charge of the policy process, he said, requires a more neutral hand.

Rove "has very strongly held views," Bolten said. "He's best when he's liberated to assert his views and explain why."

Soon after the shake-up, Rove was relieved of what was probably an even bigger distraction -- the long-running investigation by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald into his role in the outing of the name of a CIA agent. Though Fitzgerald cleared Rove, many conservatives believe the investigation played a role in the drift of the second Bush term.

"Rove has been much weaker in the last year and a half, in large measure because of Fitzgerald, and Bush has not been as politically successful," said William Kristol, the editor of the Weekly Standard. Kristol voiced worry that moderates will try to "scapegoat" Rove after the election.

Associates say Rove is privately frustrated that individual candidates have not been more aggressive in drawing contrasts with Democrats on national security. In Buffalo, Rove dished out red meat with relish, pausing in the middle of an attack on Democrats for their votes against Bush's anti-terrorism policies to needle Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid for a recent controversy in Nevada. "You may have read about his land swaps," Rove noted dryly.

Rove sarcastically questioned Rep. John P. Murtha's plan for pulling troops out of Iraq and creating a rapid-response force to deal with contingencies in the Middle East, possibly at the American base in Okinawa. "I am from Texas -- I am a simple boy," Rove joked, before noting that Okinawa is close to 5,000 miles from Baghdad.

"It is foolishness to suggest that this is a real plan for America," Rove said. "The real plan is this: Fight, beat 'em, win."

But there is little evidence that White House political efforts on Iraq have worked as Rove had hoped. Rove this summer signaled his desire that the war could be neutralized or even turned into an asset for Republican candidates who cast Democrats as defeatist. Instead, many candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush on the war. And while Bush in 2004 showed he could lose independent voters and still win the election, this year's polls show swing voters even more powerfully against the GOP.

"It has been clear for a long time that the independents are consolidating a view that is very anti-the-Bush-administration, very anti-the-Iraq-war," said Ruy Teixeira, a joint fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress and the Century Foundation. "Maybe they were believing their press clippings that all they need is their base."

Rove voices impatience with the notion that his own reputation is on the ballot. "I understand some will see the election as a judgment on me," he said. "But the fact of the matter is that, look what has been set in motion -- a broader, deeper, strengthened Republican Party, and with an emphasis on grass-roots neighbor-to-neighbor politics, is going to continue."

While Rove's confidence in the midterms does not waver, he said the conservative changes that Bush has promoted do not hinge on just one election: "1938 was a huge wipeout for the Democrats -- do you think that was the end of the New Deal?"

Evangelical-GOP Alliance Weakens (AP-Y)

By Rachel Zoll

AP, October 30, 2006

Of the many disturbing trends for Republicans this campaign season, one of the most troubling is the drop in support among white evangelicals.

The number of conservative Christians with a favorable view of the party has plummeted from 74 percent to 54 percent between 2004 and this year, according to the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press. Evangelicals comprise more than one-third of GOP voters.

But analysts say it's far too soon to write off the powerful Republican-evangelical alliance that helped the party dominate in the 2004 election.

Conservative Christians have been here before — disappointed that Republicans they helped elect failed to enact the evangelical agenda — yet they have consistently returned to the GOP. Even as they question the current Republican leadership, evangelicals are far more supportive than other Americans of President Bush and the party, the Pew Center found.

"There's a lot of discontentment," said Marvin Olasky, editor of the Christian newsweekly World and a framer of the "compassionate conservative" language used by Bush. "But unfortunately for most conservative evangelicals, there's no alternative."

That doesn't mean the GOP can rest easy. Damage over the past two years could cost Republicans on Nov. 7 if disenchanted evangelical voters stay home. And tensions with a core constituency would muddy the run-up to the 2008 presidential race.

Evangelical frustration is apparent in their qualified endorsements of GOP candidates.

James Dobson of Focus on the Family said at a September "Stand for the Family" rally in the battleground state of Pennsylvania that Republicans have made no progress on issues important to Christians who helped put the GOP in control.

Still, he told attendees to vote.

"Whether Republicans deserve the power they were given," Dobson said, "the alternatives are downright frightening."

DOJ_NMG_0087814

The complaints are familiar. Through every Republican victory since the Moral Majority was formed in 1979, abortion remained legal, gay couples won greater acceptance and prayer was still barred from public schools.

In 1999, Cal Thomas and Ed Dobson, both veterans of the Moral Majority, examined these failures in their book "Blinded by Might," and concluded that politics was too corrupt to be used to spread Christian morality in America. A few other evangelicals suggested conservative Christians withdraw from politics and focus instead on faith.

The retreat never happened. Between 1999 and 2004, the share of white evangelicals identifying themselves as Republican grew from 39 percent to 49 percent, the Pew Center found.

It's unclear whether this campaign season will be different.

Like many other Americans, evangelicals are upset by U.S. strategy in Iraq, corruption in the Republican-led Congress, and the case of former GOP Rep. Mark Foley, who sent sexually explicit e-mails to pages.

But conservative Christian grievances go further.

Dobson and other evangelicals have accused Congress of ignoring their policy agenda on marriage and abortion. The Bush administration did give evangelicals what they wanted most — conservative U.S. Supreme Court justices — by appointing John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

Yet, even that victory was sullied.

Many evangelicals complained that Bush's pitch to Christians on behalf of his first choice for the seat now held by Alito, Harriet Miers, was based on her conservative Christian faith. Those who considered her unqualified for the post found the approach patronizing.

Disillusionment has led to a backlash. Some evangelicals are once again warning that lawmakers are using Christians for their votes and politics is corrupting the church.

In the book "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," author David Kuo, a former aide in the White House faith-based office, wrote that Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Kuo, a born-again Christian, said Republicans have failed to fulfill campaign promises to evangelicals, yet have kept Christians on their side by portraying Bush as "pastor-in-chief."

"So much of the support for his presidency comes purely on the basis of his Christian faith," Kuo said in a phone interview. "The biblical notion is to defer to your pastor. Christian political leaders have taken advantage of that — portraying themselves as spiritual leaders — but they're not. They're political leaders."

William Martin, author of "With God on Our Side, The Rise of the Religious Right in America," said Kuo's book may have an impact because it touches on the long-standing evangelical sensitivity to being marginalized by broader society.

But Martin said only a small minority of evangelicals believe they should abandon politics — leaving the Republican grip on the movement intact for now.

"The great advantage that conservatives have had within the evangelical community is that a consistent, coherent message has been repeated over and over and over to people who meet together one, two, three times a week," Martin said. "Liberals really have nothing comparable to that."

As Election Closes In, E-mail A Rapid-fire Political Weapon (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Every weekday at 8 a.m., right after President Bush meets with senior staff, his communications team huddles in a second floor West Wing office to plan new moves in the information war.

Rob Saliterman, the White House director of rapid response, fires salvos throughout the day.

His weapons: e-mails.

The White House digital war room blasts thousands of electronic messages each day, aimed at more than 2,000 targets. They include journalists, Republican staffers in government, radio talk show hosts, television bookers, Internet bloggers and what White House communications director Kevin Sullivan described as other “interested parties.”

Whether trumpeting a presidential speech or seeking to shoot down an unflattering news story, the Bush administration's “rapid response unit” is a place where politics grapples with the 24/7 news cycle — especially in an election year.

“We call it rapid response, but we look at it as being on offense,” Sullivan said. “We want to respond to things that are misleading before they become part of conventional wisdom.”

In recent months, many missives reflect what President Bush and GOP candidates discuss on the campaign trail: the record-breaking stock market, immigration and legislation authorizing a fence along the U.S.-Mexican border, and developments in Iraq.

“ 'Tis the season,” Sullivan said. “There have been more stories to respond to as we have gotten closer” to Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0087815

Democrats also take part. For every e-mail in which the Bush administration touts progress, the staff of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sends a response. A recent example criticized a speech on Iraq by Vice President Cheney with this headline: "Cheney stays the course. Alone."

"We don't want anything to slip by," said Rebecca Kirszner, communications director for the Senate Democratic Communications Center, which Reid created to counter the White House. Her group also keeps well-tended lists of e-mail targets.

Bush's digital warriors send several e-mails on a busy day. On Sept. 6, the day Bush proposed his plan for military trials of terrorism suspects, the White House sent at least seven missives. They included two "fact sheets" explaining the program, a list detailing myths and facts about the CIA's interrogations of these suspects, and another titled "Setting the Record Straight" addressed to critics of the plan.

A month later, the White House's rapid response team cranked out four e-mails covering the national intelligence estimate on Iraq, job creation, budget deficits, and Democrats and taxes.

War rooms in politics are nothing new. The term harks back to Bill Clinton's presidential campaign of 1992, when his advisers developed an aggressive strategy to fight attacks. Douglas Sosnik, a former Clinton political director, said e-mails weren't the tool of choice back then because "it was not nearly as ubiquitous in peoples' lives then as it is now."

The Bush White House began expanding its e-mail strategy in March 2004, according to Sullivan, in response to criticism of its terrorism policies by former National Security Council staff member Richard Clarke. Traffic ticked up in mid-November 2005, as Bush prepared a series of speeches on the Iraq war.

Robert Schmuhl, a professor of American studies at the University of Notre Dame, said the e-mail barrage reflects the fact that much of government has turned into a permanent political campaign. He called the result "spincraft, as opposed to stagecraft."

Sometimes the White House's message can get lost, however. "An e-mail avalanche leads to numbness," said Lanny Davis, an attorney who handled rapid response for the Clinton administration. "The effect of it is minimal."

Too Little, Too Late? (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

As the race for Congress enters the homestretch, the Republicans find themselves limping to the finish line, according to the new NEWSWEEK Poll. President Bush's approval rating continues a slow but steady climb—from an all-time NEWSWEEK-poll low of 33 percent three weeks ago to 37 percent today. But it may be too little, too late: if the midterm elections were held today, 53 percent of those likely to go to the polls would vote for the Democratic candidate in their Congressional district versus just 39 percent who would vote for the Republican.

But the poll is not all bad news for the GOP. President Bush declared this week that the administration was putting the Baghdad government on notice that it had to make progress in stemming sectarian violence and rebuilding the country. Otherwise, Washington would consider changes to its Iraq policy. And it worked—at the margins. Almost half of all Americans still believe taking military action in Iraq was a mistake, but the gap between those who say it was and those who say it was the right decision has narrowed: from 54 to 39 last week to 49 to 43 this week—from a 15-point margin to just six points.

Faith that the United States is making progress in Iraq is up slightly, too: from 25 percent of Americans last week to 29 percent this week. A solid majority still believes the United States is losing ground, but their ranks have decreased from 65 percent to 60 percent. The biggest change is among Republicans. Last week, 50 percent of Republicans said America was making progress in Iraq (35 percent said we were losing ground). This week 65 percent of Republicans say we're making progress and only 22 percent say we're losing ground.

That's good news for the GOP, relatively speaking. But relative is about the only kind of good news the Republicans get these days. (Sixty-one percent of Americans still say Washington should set a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. forces, including 39 percent of Republicans.)

When all Americans were asked which they would rather see happen: the GOP retain control of Congress or the Democrats win enough seats to take over one or both houses, 50 percent of adults said they want a Democratic takeover while 35 percent said they wanted the Republicans to hold tight the reigns of power; in last week's poll, 55 percent wanted the Democrats to take over and 32 wanted the Republicans to retain power.

And while 61 percent of Americans are still dissatisfied with the direction of the country, that compares to 67 percent who were dissatisfied in two NEWSWEEK polls earlier this month. The ranks of the satisfied have grown, if not swelled, from 25 percent to 31 percent.

On the issues, Republicans have staunched their own political bloodletting, pulling even with Democrats on signature GOP issues: for instance, 40 percent of Americans trust Republicans more on handling terrorism; 39 percent trust Democrats more—a statistical tie. And when it comes to which party voters trust more on moral values, Americans are evenly split at 38 percent. The GOP has slightly narrowed the trust gap on other issues, but the Democrats still lead—on Iraq (45 to 33); the economy (47 to 34); health care (53 to 26); immigration (40 to 32); federal spending and the deficit (47 to 31); and stem-cell research (48 to 26). They even tie, statistically, on what used to be bedrock Republican issues: 39 to 37, in favor of the Democrats, on guns; and 38 to 36 in favor of the Democrats on crime. On abortion, Democrats win 42 to 33 and on same-sex marriage, 41 to 33.

Most worrisome for the GOP? As a wave of negative political ads from both parties takes to the airwaves in the final days before the election, voters so far judge the Republican ads more harshly. Overall, about two-thirds of registered voters say neither parties' ads have made much difference in how they're going to vote. Just 9 percent of registered voters who have seen Republican advertisements say the spots make them more likely to vote for Republican candidates; 24 percent say the ads make them less likely. The Democrats seem to turn off fewer voters with their commercials and win more over, but it's still a wash. Fourteen percent of registered voters say they're more likely to vote for a Democrat because of the ads they've seen; 16 percent say they're less likely.

And the GOP seems to be risking a backlash with some of its most risqué advertisements. The most widely viewed of the commercials in the NEWSWEEK poll—the Michael J. Fox ad in support of stem-cell research, which aired in Missouri and Maryland (and is the only ad in the poll seen by a majority of Americans)—was considered acceptable by 62 percent of registered voters who saw it. But of the 24 percent of registered voters who said they'd seen the ad "critical of a Tennessee Senate candidate that shows a young woman who says she met him at a party," only 20 percent found it acceptable; an overwhelming 77 percent of those who had seen it said the ad was "too extreme."

Which begs a question: Just how scary will things get between now and Nov. 7?

The NEWSWEEK poll, conducted Oct. 26-27, has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. In conducting the poll, Princeton Survey Research Associates International interviewed 1,002 adults aged 18 and older.

In Key House Races, Democrats Run To The Right (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan And Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

ASHEVILLE, N.C., Oct. 28 — In their push to win back control of the House, Democrats have turned to conservative and moderate candidates who fit the profiles of their districts more closely than the profile of the national party.

One such candidate, Heath Shuler, was courted by Republicans to run for office in 2001. Mr. Shuler, 34, is a retired National Football League quarterback who is running in the 11th Congressional District in North Carolina. He is an evangelical Christian and holds fast to many conservative social views, like opposition to abortion rights.

"My guess is that if Democrats are in the majority, it's going to be because of these New Democrat, Blue Dog candidates out there winning in these competitive swing districts," Representative Ron Kind of Wisconsin, co-chairman of a caucus of centrist House Democrats, said in an interview.

But if candidates like Mr. Shuler do help the Democrats gain majority control of Congress, it could come at a political price, which may include tensions in the party between its new centrists and its more liberal political base.

While Democratic leaders have gone to great lengths to promote the views of these candidates, some, like Mr. Shuler, have views on issues like gun control and abortion that are far out of step with the prevailing views of the Democrats who control the party. On some issues, they may even be expected to side with Republicans and the Bush White House.

Democratic officials said they did not set out with the intention of finding moderates to run. Instead, as they searched for candidates with the greatest possibility of winning against Republicans, they said, they wound up with a number who reflected more moderate views.

That was especially true in suburban areas and some rural districts, said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "As a group, they are moderate in temperament and reformers in spirit," Mr. Emanuel said.

In Indiana, for example, Brad Ellsworth, a Democrat running to unseat Representative John Hostettler, brags about the "A" rating he has received from the National Rifle Association. In Kentucky, Mike Weaver, a Democrat who opposes abortion rights, is running against Representative Ron Lewis, a Republican. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat running for an open House seat in Arizona, is presenting herself as a fiscal conservative, saying she would oppose Congressional pay increases until the federal budget is balanced.

If this crop of moderate and conservative Democrats arrived on Capitol Hill as members of a Democratic majority, they would not have much power individually to change the face of Congress — an argument that has been used against Mr. Shuler by the incumbent, Representative Charles H. Taylor, who is chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on the Interior.

Instead, party veterans would remain in chairmanships and House leadership posts; several officials said they did not expect a moderate revolution to erupt or to threaten the position of Representative Nancy Pelosi of California as the Democratic leader in the House.

"But will they have an impact? Absolutely," Mr. Emanuel said. "They're going to have an impact on the Congress and the caucus." A prime example is Mr. Shuler, who addresses environmental conservation from the viewpoint of an avid hunter and speaks of health care for the poor as a moral responsibility.

Collectively, the group could tilt the balance of power within the party, which has been struggling to define itself in recent elections. The candidates cover the spectrum on political issues; some are fiscally conservative and moderate or liberal on social issues, some are the reverse. They could influence negotiations with Republicans on a variety of issues, including Social Security and stem cell research.

There are two main groups of moderate Democrats in the House: the Blue Dog Coalition, a caucus of socially conservative and moderate members formed in 1994; and the New Democrat Coalition, a caucus of centrists formed in 1997. While there are differences between the two — the Blue Dogs tend to be more rural and Southern, with occasional alliances with Republicans, while the New Democrats are more suburban and wealthy and place a premium on party loyalty — there are members who belong to both. Both, of course, have a stake in helping the centrist candidates succeed.

Representative Ellen O. Tauscher of California, a co-chairwoman of the 47-member New Democrat Coalition, said that 27 of the top 40 contested House seats were being pursued by Democrats who have pledged to become members of the group, which says its chief issues are national security and fiscal responsibility.

"I think there's tremendous agreement and awareness that getting the majority and running over the left cliff is what our Republican opponents would dearly love," Ms. Tauscher said, adding that this was something "we've got to fight."

The centrist movement was embodied by former President Bill Clinton, who rose to prominence through the Democratic Leadership Council, which embraced a so-called third way of politics and eschewed what it saw as outdated liberalism.

Yet since Mr. Clinton left office, Democrats have seemed to drift back in the direction of their liberal identity, nominating two presidential contenders who were seen as less committed to the moderate cause.

"The Democrats as a whole have begun to understand and recognize, as I did, that we have the extreme left and the extreme right, and 80 percent of America is in the middle," Mr. Shuler said on a campaign stop last week at the Asheville-Buncombe Technical Community College. "People need to start working together."

Mr. Shuler grew up in a Democratic family, the son of a mailman in Bryson City, N.C. He has set out to bring Democrats who have voted Republican, like Brenda Davis, back into the fold.

From behind the counter at the Spud & Deb's hunting and pet supply store in Enka, N.C., Ms. Davis, 41, said she voted Republican in the last election because of her religious beliefs, but this time is supporting Mr. Shuler.

"Considering my son is a marine and he's done two tours in Iraq," Ms. Davis said, "I'm with the Democrats."

In 2001, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to persuade Mr. Shuler, who was then living in Knoxville, Tenn., to run for Congress even though he had rarely shown interest enough in politics to vote.

But Democrats found Mr. Shuler an equally appealing candidate, for some of the same reasons. After intense recruiting, he agreed to run this year as a Democrat in the Blue Ridge Mountains of western North Carolina, where he was a high school football star. Despite his lack of political experience, polls indicate that he has pushed the Republican incumbent, Mr. Taylor, into a dead heat.

In this corner of the state, where the rivers churn with whitewater and the mountainsides brighten into rusty glory each autumn, second homes for the wealthy have driven up the cost of living even as manufacturing jobs have become scarce, and the social spending cuts that people associated with the Republican Party are no more palatable than the social liberalism of the Democrats.

Mr. Taylor, a wealthy tree farmer and banker, took office in 1991 and has held it since, and he has talked up his ability to bring federal money to the district.

Asked if he could envision a Democratic Party with, say, an anti-abortion platform, Mr. Shuler did not hesitate. "I'm pro-life and I'm part of the Democratic Party, so I hope it's part of the platform," he said. "Someone needs to lead."

In this election cycle, the Democrats' desire for a victory in Congress has overridden concerns that candidates like Mr. Shuler are too far right for the party base. But there are questions about what will happen down the line.

DOJ_NMG_0087818

"I don't think people like Shuler will be the core of the Democratic Party," said Mark Bloom, a writer who is a volunteer for MoveOn.org, the liberal advocacy group, at its storefront office in downtown Asheville. "If people like Shuler turn out to not be progressive enough for my tastes, I'll work to replace him."

In the view of Don Yelton, a Jupiter, N.C., resident, a decisive nationwide realignment is playing out in conservative districts like this one. Although the majority of registered voters are Democrats, President Bush won here by a comfortable margin.

Mr. Yelton, 59 and a lifelong Democrat, said he recently changed parties, in part because he believed that the Democrats had suppressed anti-abortion viewpoints. He is running as a Republican for clerk of court in Buncombe County.

"There's going to be a moderate party for Joe Blow, and whether that party is the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, that's the battle we're seeing," Mr. Yelton said. "I expect to see Hillary Clinton quoting Scripture before it's over with."

It's Lonely At The Top (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Mike Allen

Time, October 30, 2006

"Stay the course" is a time-honored rallying cry in politics. But it has always been more a slogan than a strategy, meant to show the steadfastness of the person who shouts it rather than what he actually intends to do. More telling is when staying the course turns into "constantly changing tactics to meet the situation on the ground." That is how President Bush is now describing the battle plan in Iraq. It also pretty neatly sums up what his presidency has come to as he reaches the eve of a midterm congressional election that has turned into a referendum on Bush himself--and on a policy in Iraq that has left him more isolated than at any other point in his presidency.

The last time control of Congress was up for grabs in a midterm election, it seemed Republican candidates across the country couldn't see enough of--or be seen enough with--George W. Bush. In the closing five days of 2002, Bush swooped through 17 cities, playing to tens of thousands of voters who packed tarmacs and arenas from Aberdeen, S.D., to Blountville, Tenn. This midterm election is also turning out to be all about Bush, but it's a much lonelier experience for him. He still fills smaller rooms, especially the kind where people are willing to write five-figure checks for the privilege of lunch with a Republican President. And he's welcomed warmly in places where having local reporters point out Bush's difficulties provides a diversion from the candidate's own. But when Air Force One touches down in tightly contested congressional districts these days, it often turns out that the G.O.P. candidate there has discovered a previous commitment elsewhere, the political equivalent of suddenly needing to have your tires rotated. Yes, it's true that Florida Congressman Clay Shaw has been running radio ads to boast of his record working closely with a President, but the one he's talking about is Bill Clinton.

THE IRAQ VERDICT

THE CAMPAIGN TRAIL IS NOT THE ONLY place where Bush is watching his friends scatter. Only 38% percent of Americans say they still believe his invasion of Iraq was a good idea, and 61% percent say they don't think he has a clear plan for handling the war. But Bush has lived by the political philosophy that when the crowd is against you, you just strut more boldly across the stage. That's why he held a news conference a few days ago to hug his war policy even tighter. It is there that he argued that staying the course means "constantly changing tactics" and that benchmarks (good) aren't the same as timetables (bad). But it was as if no one was listening. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki declared that he wouldn't abide by either one if it was imposed by Washington, and that morning's headlines had Bush's top general in Iraq, George W. Casey, breaking ranks to suggest he was thinking about asking for more troops. That was just about the last thing any Republican wanted to hear with less than two weeks to go before an election. Within 24 hours, therefore, Casey was back on message with a statement in which his office said he had given the "wrong impression." Al-Maliki and Bush took a few more days to get back in synch, by issuing a declaration that they had agreed to speed up training for Iraqi security forces.

Meanwhile, even as Bush was praising Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as "a smart, tough, capable administrator," endangered Republicans like Kentucky Representative Anne Northup and Ohio Senator Mike DeWine have been joining the increasingly loud chorus of calls for the Secretary's ouster. And pressure for change is not coming only from the desperate and the wobbly. Texas Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison--a Bush loyalist well ahead in her bid for re-election--is expressing regret for her vote to authorize the invasion and is advocating partitioning Iraq along ethnic lines. "We have to step back and stop trying to put our American ideas onto this problem," she told the Houston Chronicle.

Iraq is what has put the President on the eve of a possible rebuke by voters. And if Bush were a different kind of politician--if he loved political jawboning like Lyndon Johnson or could show political elasticity like Bill Clinton--this moment might be less significant. But Bush has perfected the art of governing from inside his razor-thin majority, and is proud above all of his ideological toughness. That's why the midterms could do more than change the balance of power in Washington, if current polls are right and one or both houses shift to Democratic hands. The election might also produce a different kind of presidential style. Bush has sounded wistful lately about his more bipartisan days as a Texas Governor. "As you know, in Austin I was able to work with Democrats and Republicans to get a lot done," he said in an interview last week with Texas-based Belo Broadcasting. That's a new tone for a leader whose confidence and convictions have given his party its backbone for the past six years.

IT'S THE PRESIDENT, STUPID

FOR THE MOMENT, HOWEVER, SILVER linings in the President's predicament are so scant around the White House that when a conservative commentator recently asked Bush to give him some good news, Bush replied, "You're talking to Noah about the flood." Even the President knows this election has become a national referendum on him and his performance. In the latest Washington Post--ABC News poll, 31% of those surveyed said they will use their congressional votes to register their opposition to Bush, which was almost double the percentage who said they felt that way before the last midterm. By comparison, only 17% said they plan to use their vote to show support for Bush. And Democrats are stoking that sentiment in ads like the one the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is running on television in Connecticut's Second District, in which an announcer intones: "Rob Simmons said he'd represent us, but George Bush always comes first." In fact, you are far more likely to see Bush in a Democratic ad this year than a Republican one. The President is now being featured in 89 separate TV commercials for Democratic House candidates nationwide. Says DCCC spokesman Bill Burton: "No other issue is that dominant."

Of course, the President and his party still have some built-in advantages. The gerrymandering of the past decade has turned the vast majority of congressional districts into fortresses for incumbents, to the point where the number of House seats in serious contention is only about three dozen, compared with roughly 100 in the 1994 landslide that brought the G.O.P. to power with a 54-seat pickup. And the Republicans retain their advantage in money and, most operatives on both sides agree, the pinpoint sophistication of their turnout operation among a conservative base in which Bush still has nearly 90% approval in most polls. But even Republicans fret their loyalists have been discouraged by the Mark Foley scandal, and can't match the Democrats in passion. That fervor is being fueled by the bare-knuckled veterans who are heading up their House and Senate campaigns--New York Senator Charles Schumer and Chicago Congressman Rahm Emanuel--who have been urging their candidates to punch back at Bush directly on national security. And they have. In Rhode Island, Democratic Senate nominee Sheldon Whitehouse has been running an ad in which he says, "We need to send a clear signal that, folks, we are really getting out" of Iraq. So upended is the political calculus that it is now Republicans like Senate majority leader Bill Frist who are urging their candidates to steer clear of the war in favor of pocketbook issues.

CAPITAL CONFLICT

SO WHAT DOES IT MEAN IF WASHINGTON does become a stage of sectarian conflict after Nov. 7? For one thing, most of Bush's legislative agenda could be bound for gridlock. White House officials still talk hopefully of expanding Bush's No Child Left Behind education legislation. Other issues for which they argue they could get some kind of bipartisan traction include moving toward energy independence, lowering health-care costs and measures to fight terrorism. Bush's advisers even talk of enlisting Democrats for some grand push for entitlement reform, although anything like Bush's disastrous effort to add private accounts to Social Security would seem out of the question, given his inability to get anywhere even with a Republican Congress.

One area in which the President and a Democratic Congress might be able to make common cause is the immigration bill that has been one of his signature issues. The Senate has gone along with Bush's comprehensive approach, which includes both tougher enforcement of the border and expanded legalization for immigrants who are already in this country. But the closest thing to an immigration policy to come out of House Republicans was a 700-mile "virtual fence" along the border--a politically expedient idea that, enacted on its own, leaves Bush with less to horse-trade in his efforts to get what he really wants, which is serious reform. With that in mind, White House officials resisted holding a signing ceremony on the fence bill. But House Republican leaders were so insistent that the White House finally agreed to a low-key event in the Roosevelt Room with just six minutes of presidential remarks.

As for what direction the Democrats are likely to take, much would depend on whether would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi decides the next two years are about revenge, or about governing--and whether she can keep her troops in line. "They listen to no one," she told TIME earlier this year. "They don't even listen to each other." Pelosi's initial goals, which she says she wants to accomplish in the Democrats' first 100 legislative hours in power, are modest and relatively uncontroversial. She would have the House pass bills aimed at raising the minimum wage, cutting student-loan interest rates, allowing the Federal Government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients, and reforming lobbying practices.

Pelosi needs 15 seats to become the next Speaker, but if her majority is only a vote or two, she's not likely to get much further than her 100-hour plan. More conservative Democrats, many of them newly elected from Republican-leaning districts, would hold the balance of power. If the Democrats have a more comfortable majority, however, the party's edgier, angrier side could emerge, especially on the question of whether or how quickly to withdraw from Iraq. One of the early tests of which direction Pelosi would take could be an expected fight for majority leader between the current whip Steny Hoyer and Pennsylvania's John Murtha, who has become a hero to the antiwar left.

If lame-duck Presidents are to achieve anything, they often have to look for ways to go around Congress, especially when it is in the hands of the other party. Clinton used Executive Orders and his bully pulpit to encourage school uniforms, impose ergonomic rules on employers and prevent mining, logging and development on 60 million acres of public land. White House press secretary Tony Snow says Bush may take the same bypass around Capitol Hill. "He told all of us, 'Put on your track shoes. We're going to run to the finish,'" Snow said. "He's going to be aggressive on a lot of fronts. He's been calling all his Cabinet secretaries and telling them, 'You tell me administratively everything you can do between now and the end of the presidency. I want to see your to-do list and how you expect to do it.' We're going to try to be as ambitious and bold as we can possibly be."

In fact, when it comes to deploying its Executive power, which is dear to Bush's understanding of the presidency, the President's team has been planning for what one strategist describes as "a cataclysmic fight to the death" over the balance between Congress and the White House if confronted with congressional subpoenas it deems inappropriate. The strategist says the Bush team is "going to assert that power, and they're going to fight it all the way to the Supreme Court on every issue, every time, no compromise, no discussion, no negotiation."

MR. OPTIMISM

AS FOR THE BIGGEST CHALLENGE OF ALL to Bush's presidency, some clarity on Iraq may come after the elections, when Bush receives a much anticipated report from the Iraq Study Group, the commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker (Jimmy, as the President calls the longtime family consigliere) and Lee Hamilton, vice chairman of the 9/11 commission. Administration officials say they expect the report no sooner than December, and they hope it includes recommendations they can embrace rather than a menu of options that would put the ball back in their court.

Baker has said he wants the panel of Republicans and Democrats to come to a consensus--which has some Administration officials skeptical about how much clarity will emerge. "I welcome all these efforts," Bush said at his news conference. "My Administration will carefully consider any proposal that will help us achieve victory." That gives Bush a lot of leeway for a real course correction without saying--perhaps even knowing--what is to come from the Baker-Hamilton group. A senior Administration official says, "The only things we've ruled out are getting out immediately, phased withdrawal without any reference to events on the ground and partitioning the country into three parts. Those are all nonstarters." That's a very narrow range of exceptions; even the Democrats, by and large, aren't advocating those approaches.

However bleak the President's situation may look to outsiders, aides say he appears to be reveling in campaigning, and was joking about Detroit Tigers pitcher Kenny Rogers' doing better in the World Series than he did when he played for Bush's Texas Rangers in the 1990s. "Sometimes he'll premise a point he makes by saying 'Call me Mr. Happy, but I think ...' or 'I know I'm Mr. Optimism, but ...,'" says an aide. A presidential adviser who has recently talked to Bush says he believes the President will finish stronger than most people think, largely because of the determination that critics call stubbornness. "This guy, at 11:59 and 58 seconds on the 20th of January 2009, in the moment before his successor is inaugurated, is still going to be trying to make it work in Iraq," the adviser says. "He really believes it can work, and he believes that his will can be part of a formula to make it work in Iraq, and that's a course for us to defeat radical Islamic terrorism."

Friends describe a President who knows he's the same person today that he was at his Gallup-poll peak of 90% approval after 9/11 and that he was in the depths of 31% last spring. In Journeys with George, her documentary about Bush's first campaign, former NBC producer Alexandra Pelosi--who, as it happens, is the daughter of the woman who has the most to gain in these elections--tells of being invited to Bush's private compartment on his campaign plane when she was having a low moment. "They can say what they want about me," she remembered him saying, "but at least I know who I am, and I know who my friends are." As Bush girds for tectonic change, that certitude will be tested as never before.

Fatter 401(k)'s Might Not Be Enough To Save The GOP (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

How will investors affect the midterm congressional elections November 7?

Political pundits want to know-and for good reason. Slightly more than half of all U.S. households own stock, either directly or through retirement accounts like 401(k)'s and IRAs, according to the Investment Company Institute. In the early 1990s, only about a third did.

DOJ_NMG_0087821

During the 2004 presidential election, about 46 percent of voters, according to polling by Zogby International, identified themselves as members of the "investor class." And this group voted for President Bush in a landslide over Sen. John Kerry, 61 percent to 39 percent.

Of course, the term investor class may just mean middle-to-upper-income white men, a group that typically votes GOP. But investors are now far more diverse than that. Some 91 million Americans owned mutual funds in 2005. In about a quarter of fund-owning households, women make the investment decisions.

"The investor class has been the great hope of Republicans," says Charles Gabriel, political analyst at the Washington research arm of Prudential Securities. "The theory was that if you turned voters into stakeholders, they would pay closer attention ... to legislation that would hurt companies." Yet Gabriel wonders how energetic investors will be, since the Dow Jones industrial average has only recently returned to levels last seen in 2000.

Surprise! A Zogby poll taken in mid-June, as the market rally was beginning, showed Bush with a 41 percent approval rating among investors. That's not so hot, but it was better than his 36 percent approval rating overall. Investors checking their financial statements this month will find a nice "October surprise." The S&P 500 gained 5 percent in the third quarter and is up about 13 percent since early June. "The economy is in very good shape right now," says David Gitlitz, chief economist at TrendMacrolytics. "Investors have every reason to be happy with what is going on."

All this seemed to be helping Bush and the congressional GOP-ratings for both were rising-until the Mark Foley page scandal broke.

Democrats will correctly point out that stocks have historically done better when their party has controlled the White House than when the GOP has. So why do investors keep favoring Republicans? A recent study offers this possible explanation: While past Democratic presidents may have pursued market-friendly policies, investors stubbornly expect future ones not to. One reason may be that the GOP tends to aggressively support more favorable treatment of capital gains and dividend income. Rates for both were cut in 2003.

By contrast, Kerry vice presidential candidate John Edwards, a possible 2008 White House contender, has advocated raising capital-gains rates for wealthier investors.

Turnout, Not Burnout (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

BLUE BELL, PA.-Here's Rick Santorum's plan to close his challenger's big lead in the polls and pull off a surprise win next week: a phone bank staffed with a half-dozen die-hard volunteers in this Philadelphia suburb. "The Republican Party is committed to protecting America in the war on terror and securing our borders," says Jack Posobiec, a Temple University senior, into a phone receiver on the second-to-last Tuesday before the election. "Can the party count on your vote?" Posobiec takes down the "Yes" response on a sheet of paper that will be scanned into the GOP's vast national voter database, then dials the next number on his list. It's the kind of person-to-person transaction, repeated millions of times over, that forms the grass-roots ground game credited with delivering the Republican gains of 2002 and 2004.

This year, facing its toughest political climate in over a decade (Santorum is just one of several Republican senators in a fight for their political lives), the GOP is counting on that get-out-the-vote machine more than ever. "Turnout in an off-year election is more important than in a presidential election because voters on both sides are less motivated," says a senior Republican adviser. Turnout this year is expected to be down by more than a third from 2004, which is why more than 20 GOP phone banks and volunteer centers across Pennsylvania have already contacted more than a million voters most likely to back Santorum-who is running up to 12 points behind challenger Bob Casey Jr. "The goal is to get [Casey's lead] to single digits by Election Day," says Santorum campaign manager Vince Galko. "The grass roots will take it from there."

Dispirited. With only days to go, however, achieving that goal appears iffy, at best. The revved-up Republican base that staffed the election-eve blizzard of phone calls and door knocks in 2002 and 2004 as part of the GOP's "72-hour plan" now appears dispirited. At the Blue Bell phone bank, one volunteer called a half-dozen Republicans who'd expressed interest in joining this year's "72-hour task force" before finding a taker. The Democrats, meanwhile, say they've improved their ground game since 2004, when the Democratic National Committee's voter file-the road map for turnout efforts-was so glitch-prone that Ohio's Democratic Party couldn't access it until a week before Election Day. In dozens of close races nationwide, the ability of the GOP turnout effort to deliver again, or the Democrats' ability to best it, will determine the outcome next week-and, with it, which party controls Congress.

The Democrats, by relying on organized labor, had historically maintained an edge on turnout operations-until President Bush was elected. But the GOP, under the direction of White House political chief Karl Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, began running its turnout operation like a business, giving state parties customized volunteer recruitment and voter contact goals. In this cycle, Mehlman received weekly reports from state parties that showed how well each was managing its "metric" goals, starting a full year before Election Day.

The Year The Democrats Punched Back (TIME)

By Joe Klein

Time, October 30, 2006

First, the Republicans tried to attack Democrats on national security, their old, reliable soft-on-terrorism gambit. But that didn't work, in part because George W. Bush's own National Intelligence Council issued a report that said the Administration's policies were probably adding to the sum total of terrorists in the world. Then the Republicans tried to accuse Democrats of being soft on illegal immigrants. But that didn't work because the President himself was notoriously humane on immigration—and it was the Republican Congress that had failed to produce a tough immigration bill.

In recent weeks, the Republicans unwrapped another moldy chestnut, advertisements proclaiming that Democrats will raise taxes. But that didn't seem to be working either because voters were focused on Iraq and Mark Foley. And so last week the Republicans unleashed a series of ads painting the Democrats as sex-crazed, homosexual-loving, porn-perusing—and in the case of the novelist and Virginia Senate candidate Jim Webb, porn-writing—perverts. It was vivid proof that the prospect of a hanging doesn't always concentrate the mind. Sometimes it leads to feral, piss-pants desperation.

Most of the media attention was centered on the Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate from Tennessee, Harold Ford Jr., and why not? He's young, attractive and black—and you know how dangerously sexy those people are. But there was enough other action around the country—the attack on the sex scenes in Webb's novels, sex-related claims against Democratic congressional candidates in New York and Minnesota—for the outlines of the new Republican strategy to become clear. Even President Bush leaped on a New Jersey court decision favorable to homosexual couples, calling it another case of liberal judicial activism.

Ford's crime was his attendance, along with 3,000 other people, at a Super Bowl party sponsored by Playboy magazine last year. This inspired the Republicans to run their now famous ad featuring a scantily clad white actress who claimed to have met Ford at the party and then, in the punch line, pooched her lips, winked and whispered, "Harold, call me." A second ad accused Ford of having "Hollywood values," for what it said was his support of gay marriage and the distribution of morning-after birth-control pills to teenagers.

Neither claim is true. It remains to be seen what, if any, effect these ads will have, but Ford responded immediately with a spot featuring average Tennesseans expressing their disgust with the Republicans. A woman named Maura Satchell says, "My son's life is on the line in Iraq, and they're putting out these ads just to distract us."

Rapid response to Republican attacks has been a key to Ford's unlikely strength in Tennessee. In early October, for example, the Republican candidate, Bob Corker, accused Ford of being pro-amnesty for illegal immigrants. Ford's response was immediate and lethal: an ad claiming that Corker's construction company had employed illegal aliens. In fact, a Corker work site had been raided by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. "Rapid response is a rule I set down for all our candidates this year," says Senator Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). "If you want [financial] support from us, you have to respond within 24 hours after you've been attacked."

Obviously, John Kerry's lamblike response to the attacks on his character during the 2004 presidential campaign, especially those emanating from the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, is very much on Democrats' minds in 2006. But Schumer learned the lesson in his Senate race against Alfonse D'Amato in 1998. "Fonzi attacked me for being soft on crime, and we came right back at him with a tough series of ads with the tagline 'Alfonse D'Amato: too many lies for too long.'" Schumer says that perhaps the most important ad run by a Democrat this year appeared in July in the Ohio Senate race.

The Republican, Mike DeWine, had put up a spot that called into question Democrat Sherrod Brown's record on national security, using a smudged, smoking, slightly distorted image of the World Trade Center terrorist attack. The thrust of the ad was accurate: Brown is a mortal dove who repeatedly voted against increases in the intelligence budget. And the attack had been expected. "Our candidates were really worried about how to counter the Republicans on national security," says J.B. Poersch, executive Director of the DSCC. "It's what worked against us in 2002 and 2004."

But Brown responded with a spot that began, "It's sad. Mike DeWine exploiting images of 9/11 to smear Sherrod Brown ..." and quickly pivoted to Brown's favorite issue: [DeWine] supported trade deals with China, even after thousands of lost jobs and the transfer of sensitive military technology ..." Polls show Brown well ahead now—and the ad also had a spillover effect. "Our other candidates saw Brown's success," says Poersch, "and they began to feel confident that they could survive Republican national-security attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0087823

As a result, the political-advertising phenomenon of 2006: almost all of the best ads this year, in both the Senate and House races, have been Democratic counterpunches. Of course, it is easier to strike back at an exhausted opponent, and 2006 may be remembered as the year that the Reagan Revolution finally crested and began to recede.

Battling For The Show-Me Moms (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, October 30, 2006

Call them the show-me moms. They may be this political season's equivalent of the soccer moms or the NASCAR dads--a slice of the electorate that turns out to be vital to one party's triumph, or either's. This year strategists on both sides are focused on a small subset of females: white women over 55 in the South who were raised as Democrats but tend to be culturally conservative. The group eschews party loyalty in favor of candidates offering practical solutions to problems like education, security and health care and is "very critical," says a top G.O.P. strategist, in the deadlocked Senate races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. To take the Senate, Democrats probably need to win at least two of the races in those red-state redoubts.

Women in general are more independent than men, decide later how to vote and--older women especially-- are more active in midterm elections, all of which means they are central to Democratic attempts to make up for the men the party can't win in the upper South. Democrats are optimistic about swaying older women, says pollster Celinda Lake, because they "were among the most supportive in the early days of the war in Iraq and now are some of the most critical." While 54% of Southern women voted for Bush in 2004, a recent Associated Press poll found that only 32% of them approve of his handling of the war, compared with 36% of all Southerners. Republicans argue that they can hold these show-me moms by stressing the good economy and the moderate popularity of President Bush's prescription-drug program.

The fight for the matron vote can get rough. Senator Jim Talent, the Missouri incumbent who faces a hard contest against state auditor Claire McCaskill, has spent heavily on ads accusing her of failing to investigate abusive nursing homes. And last week in Virginia, Republicans spent more than $1 million on TV ads attacking challenger James Webb for, among other things, a 1979 article opposing women in combat and his novels, whose raunchy sex scenes incumbent George Allen called "demeaning to women." This close to Election Day, there are still plenty of votes to scrap for: a recent Missouri poll found 5% of men are unsure but 9% of women still in play.

Politics: The Sleepers (NSWK)

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

All politics is local, except when it isn't. Next week Americans will head to the polls with national and international issues on their minds. Chief among them: Iraq, the top issue for 29 percent of voters in the NEWSWEEK Poll (the largest percentage for any issue, followed by the economy at 21 percent). Democrats, the party preferred by 53 percent of voters to control Congress, seem poised for big gains. But a host of sleeper social issues, including abortion, same-sex marriage and stem-cell research will keep campaign 2006 interesting to the end.

ISSUES 2006

STEM CELLS

In Missouri, the Fox Effect

When Michael J. Fox picked up the phone early last Tuesday morning he was greeted by his mother, in a fury. Two days before, Fox had appeared in a television advertisement for Democratic Missouri Senate candidate Claire McCaskill. Fox, the actor stricken with Parkinson's disease, was supporting McCaskill and other Democratic candidates because of their support for research on embryonic stem cells. Now Rush Limbaugh, the conservative talk-radio host, was accusing Fox of "exaggerating the effects of the disease" in order to secure sympathy. How could Limbaugh be so cruel, Fox's mother wanted to know. Fox told her Limbaugh wasn't getting to him. "I have four kids," he later told NEWSWEEK. "I have to set an example on how you deal with bullies."

For a moment last week, Fox and Limbaugh made stem-cell research the premier topic in campaign 2006, no small feat for any issue that isn't Iraq or a sex scandal. "We wanted to make sure [stem cells] were at the forefront in the campaign," he says. "That we're talking about this 11 days before the election is just phenomenal."

But back in Missouri, Fox's candidate claimed she hadn't been following the fracas. Were stem cells one of her top five priorities? "That [is] a mean question to ask!" she replied, indicating she'd rather not say. If she sounded a bit tepid, it's because no one in Missouri seems to know quite how stem cells are going to play this year. Next week, when voters choose between

McCaskill and Jim Talent, the Republican incumbent, they'll also vote on an amendment to the state's constitution guaranteeing protection for federally sanctioned stem-cell research. Critics say it creates a legal foundation for the cloning of human embryos and the destruction of innocent life. After Fox's ad hit the airwaves, opponents of the measure struck back with their own celebrity-filled ad. Most memorable: James Caviezel, the actor who played Jesus in "The Passion of the Christ," opening the ad in lilting ancient Aramaic. It was a day or so before Caviezel's words were translated as "You betray the Son of Man with a kiss." But his intended message was instantly apparent: conservative Christians, come and vote.

If they do, in large numbers, it could spell trouble for McCaskill, who has trailed Talent in recent polls. But Talent himself seems in no rush to step forward as the face of stem-cell foes, mindful that embryonic research splits conservatives—some of whom protest the use of human embryos, while others champion the prospect of cures. (Talent's campaign did not respond to requests for a comment.)

Missouri is a bellwether: a McCaskill win could push candidates in future races to champion stem cells on the stump. In the meantime Fox is doing plenty of pushing on his own. This week he'll travel to Iowa, Ohio and Virginia to stump for supporters of the research. The political arena exacerbates his Parkinson's symptoms, but Fox refuses to slow down. "I'm tired of having my hope qualified as false," he says. "We've reached a point where this can happen now if people get their votes right."

GAY MARRIAGE

A Wake-Up Call in New Jersey

The Republicans were clearly hoping for a little déjà vu. In 2004, they seized on 11 gay-marriage ballot initiatives to get fired-up conservatives to the polls. Though eight states will vote on similar measures this fall, the issue hasn't been nearly as electrifying. At least not until last week, when the New Jersey Supreme Court ordered the state legislature to grant gays the same marriage rights as straight couples. Though the court said lawmakers didn't have to call it "marriage," the semantics mattered little. "It's a gift to the White House and the Republican Party if they're smart enough to use it," says Gary Bauer, president of the conservative group American Values. President George W. Bush himself extolled the "sacred institution" of heterosexual marriage and complained about "another activist court issue."

In the past two years, says Family Research Council president Tony Perkins, conservatives have passed gay-marriage bans in 16 states (all but five states now have some kind of ban in place) and won eight court victories. "People were somewhat complacent," Perkins says, "but this clearly brings the issue of the defense of marriage back into focus."

With less than two weeks left before the polls close, social conservatives think gay marriage can make a difference again, especially in tight Senate races in Virginia and Tennessee, where marriage amendments are already on the ballot. Bauer says his group may run ads touting the New Jersey ruling in some battleground states.

Gay-rights advocates don't expect to win many—or maybe any—of the eight ballot initiatives. But, after two years of gay marriage in Massachusetts, they think voters might not be as alarmed about the idea as they were in '04. "An angry electorate is looking for real answers on the economy, the war in Iraq," says Human Rights Campaign president Joe Solmonese. "It's just not going to resonate this year." If it does, he says, gay-rights groups will press their case where they've had better luck—in court.

THE RIGHT TO DIE

Schiavo on the Hustings

The fireworks began before the candidates' debate even started. Last week Michael Schiavo took a seat only 15 feet away from Colorado Rep. Marilyn Musgrave—all the better to taunt her. She had been an outspoken advocate of what Schiavo considered government intrusion in his wife Terri's right-to-die case last year. When Musgrave's camp objected to Schiavo's presence, one of the event hosts tried, unsuccessfully, to have a cop force him to change seats. Though Musgrave wasn't asked about Terri during the debate, Schiavo had already met his goal—evoking his wife's case, and the privacy concerns it raised, for the press and the public. "What you went through is the epitome of what's wrong with the country," one man told him afterward.

The issues dominating this election season remain Iraq, terrorism and various scandals, but the Schiavo matter may prove to be a sleeper issue. It has cropped up in contests across the country—from the Florida governor's race to close congressional campaigns in Connecticut, Pennsylvania and points west. Schiavo himself has helped stoke the debate by campaigning for candidates who backed his position on Terri's case and lambasting those who opposed him. Using funds raised by TerriPAC, a political committee he founded last year, he has also given 15 candidates a total of $20,000. All of it is aimed at driving home his message: "Government should not interfere with personal matters," says Schiavo, who still seethes at the memory of Congress's and President Bush's attempts to block removal of Terri's feeding tube.

After mourning Terri's death, Schiavo had planned to move on with his life (he has a second wife and two kids). But in the course of writing a book about the case, he reviewed news footage that he'd never seen from the height of the controversy. He became incensed all over again—and decided to do something about it, teaming up with Democratic consultant Derek Newton.

Schiavo's hardly an electrifying speaker, and he mangles names on the stump. But he has an ordinary-guy appeal and a wrenching tale. Formerly a Republican, he's now a Democrat, though he has supported candidates from both parties. As Election Day nears, he's trying to squeeze in one more round of campaign stops, in response to requests from candidates in Georgia, Iowa and Virginia. And after Nov. 7? "On to 2008," he says. An activist has been born.

ABORTION

A Hard Line on the Plains

Tiffany Campbell had a serious problem. The ultrasound showed her 15-week-old embryos had twin-to-twin transfusion syndrome, an often fatal complication. Campbell, who lives in South Dakota, was rushed to Cincinnati, where she underwent a procedure that aborted one fetus in order to save the other. On the way home, says Campbell, she and her husband talked about a new South Dakota law that bans all abortions, except to save the life of the mother. "I'm not really for abortion," says Campbell, 30, still pregnant with the surviving twin. "But then you realize it's not all black and white."

Opponents of South Dakota's abortion ban hope such stories will persuade voters to overturn the law on Election Day next week. Pro-life forces see South Dakota as the beachhead of a new campaign to challenge Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court case that established abortion rights. Pro-choice advocates say that defeating the measure will send a signal to the 14 other states considering abortion bans, including cases involving rape and incest, to abandon their efforts.

The law was driven by Leslee Unruh, a Sioux Falls activist who shared with lawmakers her regret over her own abortion. "I bought the feminist line 'It's my body'," said Unruh. Polls show opponents of the ban with a slight lead. Last week the South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, a grass-roots organization opposed to the ban, signed up a new volunteer: Tiffany Campbell. "As long as I'm on bed rest, I've got plenty of time to stuff envelopes," she says. For Campbell, a registered Republican, this is her first political campaign.

Was Politics Always Such A Contact Sport? (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

It's back-and just in time, too. Gay marriage, the campaign stalwart that pulled such a star turn in the presidential election two years ago, had been unaccountably missing in the previously torpid midterm elections. But thanks to what President Bush called that "activist court" in New Jersey, the old guy is back in the game and ready, it seems, to play for keeps. Less than 24 hours after the New Jersey Supreme Court announced its ruling that gay couples are entitled to the same legal rights as heterosexuals, the president slipped a nifty reference to gay marriage into the top of his stump speech (tossing in, for good measure, that Democrats would raise taxes and leave America unprotected), and suddenly he had something to talk about besides Iraq that actually might help his reeling Republican brethren at the polls next week. Well, hope, as the saying has it, does spring eternal.

Say what you will, using the gay marriage issue is good politics. And compared with some of the other shenanigans on the hustings the past few weeks, it looks almost Jeffersonian. Every election year has its share of below-the-belt ads and barroom brawling. But with a turbocharged Internet, the explosion of YouTube and other social-networking sites, and the profusion of so many rabidly partisan blogs, Election '06 has already set new standards for incivility, mendacity, and a bunch of other 75-cent words your faithful Webster's has for generally churlish behavior. The Washington Post called it "kitchen-sink time" in the campaign, and that just about gets it, because it's hard to imagine any unspeakable thing one candidate hasn't thrown at another during this potential power-shifting year. Sexual perversion, moral bankruptcy (the details of the precise charges cannot be shared in a family magazine, sorry)-they've all taken pride of place in campaigns from one end of the nation to another.

In kinder days, Alfred E. Smith said of campaign speech: "No matter how thin you slice it, it's still baloney." This year, you'd have to amend Smith's adage with another term that can't be used in a family publication.

A Bitter War's Latest Front (USNEWS)

SIOUX FALLS, S.D.-There were only about a half dozen of them, but it was the first time they'd shown up at the state's single abortion clinic: veteran protesters in the abortion wars, carrying placards depicting bloody fetuses and aiming cameras at people headed for the clinic run by Planned Parenthood, a simple one-story structure on busy West 41st Street. One protester, in a hooded sweatshirt and camouflage jacket, called a woman leaving the lot a "baby killer" and when asked whom he represented, responded, "Jesus Christ."

DOJ_NMG_0087826

Their arrival in this sparsely populated state, a little more than two weeks before voters here will decide whether to overturn a nearly complete ban on medical abortions, infuriated none other than Leslee Unruh, a leader in the state's journey to the March passage of the most restrictive law in the nation. In the process, she has earned a national name by helping to rewrite the antiabortion playbook. "I can't stand the way they do things," Unruh said last week about the protesters' in-your-face strategy. "The anger approach doesn't work because they have no compassion for the women going in there."

During an interview at the Sioux Falls headquarters of Vote Yes for Life, the organization she heads that's campaigning to uphold the state ban, Unruh spoke about her own abortion years ago and her campaign to focus not on confrontation but on the personal stories of women like her who have had or considered abortions. But activists on both sides are riveted by the bottom-line question voters here will answer next week: Can Unruh's new sell persuade South Dakotans to endorse a state law that ignores a U.S. Supreme Court precedent and makes no specific abortion exceptions in cases of incest or rape, or when a mother's health is threatened?

If the answer is no, then the probable conclusion-pending litigation of some sort-is that even abortion opponents aren't willing to so dramatically limit the rights of the mother. But if the answer is yes, then similar legislation is likely to move forward in other states, and so is a legal challenge that could reach the Supreme Court. National abortion-rights groups, alarmed by that possibility, have been working with a state coalition of medical workers, abortion-rights activists, and others to convince voters that the law should be repealed. The group, South Dakota Campaign for Healthy Families, gathered enough signatures earlier this year to get a challenge to the law on the ballot, arguing that it is unconstitutional and will compromise women's health. "This is not just a ban; it also jeopardizes doctors who even want to talk to their patients openly and honestly," says Jan Nicolay, 64, a former educator and GOP state legislator who speaks for the coalition.

The law, on hold pending next week's vote, makes abortion a felony unless the woman's life is in danger. It also bars anyone-physicians and pharmacists included-from providing emergency contraception, except in cases where a pregnancy has not yet been determined by "conventional medical testing." Unruh argues that the law's minimal emergency contraception allowance provides a rape and incest exception. Planned Parenthood State Director Kate Looby calls that an "inane argument" because emergency contraception is only effective up to 72 hours after sexual contact and is already difficult to access in many parts of the state.

Why I Would Vote No On Pot (TIME)

By Sanjay Gupta

Time, October 30, 2006

Maybe it's because I was born a couple of months after Woodstock and wasn't around when marijuana was as common as iPods are today, but I'm constantly amazed that after all these years--and all the wars on drugs and all the public-service announcements--nearly 15 million Americans still use marijuana at least once a month. California and 10 other states have already decriminalized marijuana for medical use. Now two of those states--Colorado and Nevada--are considering ballot initiatives that would legalize up to an ounce of pot for personal use by people 21 and older, whether or not there is a medical need.

What do voters need to know before going to the polls?

The first is that marijuana isn't really very good for you. True, there are health benefits for some patients. Several recent studies, including a new one from the Scripps Research Institute, show that THC, the chemical in marijuana responsible for the high, can help slow the progress of Alzheimer's disease. (In fact, it seems to block the formation of disease-causing plaques better than several mainstream drugs.) Other studies have shown THC to be a very effective antinausea treatment for people--cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy, for example--for whom conventional medications aren't working. And medical cannabis has shown promise relieving pain in patients with multiple sclerosis and reducing intraocular pressure in glaucoma patients.

But I suspect that most of the people eager to vote yes on the new ballot measures aren't suffering from glaucoma, Alzheimer's or chemo-induced nausea. Many of them just want to get stoned legally. That's why I, like many other doctors, am unimpressed with the proposed legislation, which would legalize marijuana irrespective of any medical condition.

Why do I care? As Dr. Nora Volkow, director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, puts it, "Numerous deleterious health consequences are associated with [marijuana's] short- and long-term use, including the possibility of becoming addicted."

What are other health consequences? Frequent marijuana use can seriously affect your short-term memory. It can impair your cognitive ability (why do you think people call it dope?) and lead to long-lasting depression or anxiety. While many people smoke marijuana to relax, it can have the opposite effect on frequent users. And smoking anything, whether it's tobacco or marijuana, can seriously damage your lung tissue.

The Nevada and Colorado marijuana initiatives have gained support from unlikely places. More than 33 religious leaders in Nevada have endorsed the measure, arguing that permissive legalization, accompanied by stringent regulations and penalties, can cut down on illegal drug trafficking and make communities safer.

Perhaps. But I'm here to tell you, as a doctor, that despite all the talk about the medical benefits of marijuana, smoking the stuff is not going to do your health any good. And if you get high before climbing behind the wheel of a car, you will be putting yourself and those around you in danger.

Does Barack Really Rock? (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, October 30, 2006

I know: you're sick of politics. That's because we're a week away from the midterm elections, and all you seem to be seeing are nasty TV ads. And if you're going to vote (and please do), chances are you're casting your ballot as a way to register your disgust. You probably want to record your feelings against something-whether it's the war, the president, a Democratic congressional takeover. Most of you think Congress is corrupt, you worry that the situation in Iraq is getting worse, not better, and you don't like the direction in which the country is heading. No wonder you're cranky.

We're all cranky. Which is why, when someone like Barack Obama writes a book called The Audacity of Hope, we perk right up. As cynical as we've all become, we still like the sound of his call for a new kind of politics-rooted in faith, inclusiveness, and bipartisanship. When Obama allowed that he just might be considering a presidential run, some positively jumped for joy: A young (45) African-American with no political baggage, the first-term Democrat from Illinois is full of optimism. He may even be authentic. "A vessel for people's hopes," is how Chicago political consultant and Obama friend David Axelrod puts it. "Someone who can bring some wisdom to the table."

Obama has a great story to tell: half-Kenyan, half-Kansan, born in Hawaii, Harvard law school grad, first black president of the law review, state senator, U.S. senator. Charming, self-effacing, a family man. And as far as Democrats are concerned, he's two more things: first, someone who took an early stand against the Iraq war (unlike, say, John Kerry and Hillary Rodham Clinton). And second, he's not Clinton. "He's not the vehicle for a stop-anybody movement," says Axelrod. "If he runs, it won't be because he's an alternative to anybody."

That may be true-in his own mind. But in the case of just about everyone else, Obama is an alternative-not only to the lightning rod that is Hillary Clinton but also to a generation of boomers who may need to finally cede the stage. In his new book, Obama-born in 1961, which makes him a very late boomer-writes that in watching the Newt Gingrich-Bill Clinton saga play out a decade ago he felt as if he were watching a couple of old generals fight the last war. "I sometimes felt as if I were watching the psychodrama of the baby boom generation-a tale rooted in old grudges and revenge plots hatched on a handful of college campuses long ago-played out on the national stage." He's right-and he's also right to point out that the fights continued right up through the last election, and even into this one. So Obama, his friend Axelrod says, will be able to relate to those younger voters and bring them into the Democratic fold.

Wishy-washy? Maybe, but there's a flip side to Obama's youth: his inexperience. Sure, you say, there's an easy way to handle that problem. After all, the folks with experience are the ones who messed up Iraq. But maybe it wasn't their experience; they could just have been the wrong people. (Paging Donald Rumsfeld.) In a post-9/11 world, it's hard to see how we elect someone without the important national security cred: If terrorism remains the big issue it is now, inexperience won't cut it with the soccer moms. There's no giving anyone the benefit of the doubt, not now. George W. Bush may have chosen-and stuck with-the wrong team. Trouble is, he was too green to understand when they were wrong.

All Politics Is Local? New Mexico Is Test (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Albuquerque — Fighting for control of the House, Democrats and Republicans have cast the midterm election in starkly different terms. To Democrats, it is a national referendum on President Bush; to Republicans, a contrast between local candidates.

The outcome Nov. 7 will probably depend on whether those who turn out to vote are more like Anne Campbell or Don Natvig.

DOJ_NMG_0087828

Campbell, a 45-year-old nurse, had trouble deciding between Republican Rep. Heather A. Wilson and her Democratic opponent, state Atty. Gen. Patricia Madrid, until she watched them debate last week. Although Campbell is a Democrat, she was impressed with Wilson's crisp performance and now leans toward the incumbent.

"I think it needs to be a local election," Campbell said, loading groceries into the back of her gray minivan at a big-box mall on the north side of town. "I certainly wouldn't vote against Heather Wilson because of President Bush."

Natvig, who teaches biology at the University of New Mexico, has met Wilson and believes "she's an OK person" and "fairly sincere." But the lanky 54-year-old Democrat plans to vote for Madrid — even though he's no big fan. "I don't want to support the Republican administration," he said, adding, "I see my vote as being in support of a [Democratic] Congress."

New Mexico's 1st Congressional District is high on both parties' target lists in these final campaign days, as Democrats fight for the 15 seats they need to take over the House. More than $11.5 million has been raised and spent here by the candidates and their allies, a state record, and couch potatoes have been bombarded with more than 11,500 TV spots since July.

The district, which takes in Albuquerque and part of its suburbs, is odd in some ways.

Although Democrats outnumber Republicans, the GOP has held the congressional seat for its entire existence, nearly 40 years. No incumbent has ever been defeated, not even in the big Democratic elections of 1974 and 1982.

Still, few places are better to watch the fight for control of Congress. The district, at the intersection of Route 66 and the Rio Grande, is home to a liberal college community, conservative military retirees, and social moderates whose defense and high-tech jobs depend on fat Pentagon budgets. About one in three voters is Latino.

Moreover, as they run neck and neck, the two candidates personify the broad strategy of their respective parties.

Consider the first words each uttered in their televised debate.

"Elections are about choices, and the differences between my opponent and I are many," Republican Wilson said, a line she repeated through the evening. "If you want higher taxes and a weaker national defense, you should vote for Mrs. Madrid."

"I'm running for Congress because it's time for a change in this country," Democrat Madrid responded. "George Bush has been an unmitigated, abject failure, and Heather Wilson has been with him every step of the way."

A political panorama

The issues and advertisements that have played across this high-desert district offer a panorama of the year in politics. There has been scandal, with cameo mentions of former Reps. Tom DeLay, Randy "Duke" Cunningham and Mark Foley. Stem-cell research, soaring gas prices and rising healthcare costs have been discussed, along with the sway of special interests in Washington and Santa Fe, the state capital.

But the war in Iraq has dominated the campaign above all and presented the starkest contrast between the two candidates, just as it has in many races across the country.

Wilson has carefully sculpted an image of independence from Bush and GOP leaders in Congress, parting ways at various times on budget, healthcare and ethics issues.

But the Air Force Academy graduate has been unflagging in her support of the war, casting Madrid as inexperienced and dangerously naive when it comes to Iraq and terrorism.

In the debate, Wilson characterized her opponent's position this way: "Bring the guys home. Quit. Surrender." Madrid, who favors a withdrawal of U.S. troops but has offered no clear timetable, retorted: "Staying the course is not a plan. Paralysis is not a plan."

In terms of public opinion, the Democrat would seem to have the upper hand on the issue. An Albuquerque Journal poll published this month found that 52% of New Mexicans thought the U.S. should have stayed out of Iraq.

More often than not, they believed the administration cherry-picked and sometimes manipulated intelligence, a charge Madrid has used against Wilson, who serves on the House Intelligence Committee.

Wilson rejects the allegation.

But the poll also found considerable ambivalence about the war — only 15% supported an immediate withdrawal — a sentiment that surfaced in a series of voter interviews in the district last week.

Shanna Chavarria, a 49-year-old homemaker and a Democrat, said she wished the U.S. had not invaded Iraq and was eager "to get us home, get us out."

But, she went on, "We're there. I think we need to finish the job."

She plans to vote for Madrid, however, because Wilson is "just too party-line. Whatever the Republicans did, she did."

The Bush factor

That strong, almost reflexive anti-GOP sentiment poses the greatest threat to Wilson, a smart and nimble campaigner who has weathered several tough reelection fights since going to Congress in 1998.

She won thanks to strong Democratic and Latino support, but surveys suggest many of those voters are straying this time.

DOJ_NMG_0087829

"That's where Iraq comes in," said Brian Sanderoff, the state's leading political pollster. "That's where Bush comes in."

With the president at a lackluster 36% approval rating in Albuquerque, Wilson has tried hard to distance herself from Bush and the White House.

She has been hammered for skipping a vote on Iraq this year to attend a presidential fundraiser.

So when strategist Karl Rove came to town in late September, Wilson's campaign announced she would skip the event, which was closed to reporters. Party officials would not even say where Rove planned to appear.

During last week's debate, Wilson twice refused to answer when asked whether she though Bush had been a good president.

The next day, at a news conference at her campaign headquarters, Wilson was asked four more times and again would not offer an opinion.

"History will judge," she said.

The campaign here typifies the broader national contest in other ways.

Both parties have spent millions of dollars on TV spots — mainly attack ads — as have labor unions, trial lawyers, Realtors and other interest groups, according to TNS Media Intelligence/Campaign Media Analysis Group, a national firm that tracks campaign advertising.

The race has been nasty, like so many others in this corrosively negative campaign season.

Madrid calls her opponent a liar and says Wilson, who served on the board overseeing the congressional page program, "looked the other way and didn't protect our children" from Foley's behavior. Wilson said she had no way of knowing what the ex-Florida lawmaker was saying in private e-mails.

Wilson says Madrid is "willing to cheat to win" and aired a TV spot accusing Madrid of allowing a man to "walk" after an attempted rape. A state prosecutor said the ad distorted the facts of a case involving a fictitious teen in an Internet chat room.

The two camps even quibbled over who got the better spot in the State Fair parade, and the politics behind their placement.

Campbell, the nurse who leans toward a Wilson vote, said all of it was enough to make a person stay home on election day.

"They're just awful," she said of the ads, which are inescapable for anyone watching Albuquerque TV.

"You feel bad about both of them."

In Minnesota, 'Everyman' On The Ballot Political Novice Battles Republican Incumbent, With Iraq And Immigration At Forefront By DAVID ROGERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

ROCHESTER, Minn. -- If there is one House race that captures the struggle between Republican power in Congress and a grass-roots demand for change, it is here in Minnesota's First District.

Twelve-year incumbent Rep. Gil Gutknecht is a political survivor and force for the dairy industry as a senior member of the House Agriculture Committee. But in a district President Bush carried twice, the Republican Party and corporate allies are spending heavily to fend off Democrat Tim Walz, a high-school teacher and political newcomer.

Three possible 2008 presidential contenders -- Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Barack Obama -- are all due here this week. Mr. McCain's appearance, which his camp says is to help re-elect Gov. Tim Pawlenty, not Mr. Gutknecht per se, touches a nerve since Mr. Walz -- a retired National Guard master sergeant -- is a fellow veteran and has been attacked by Mr. Gutknecht for supporting immigration policies akin to the Arizona senator's.

"It's been, 'Holy smokes, the First District can elect a guy who woke up one morning and said let's change this country and let's do this together,' " Mr. Walz laughs.

The heart of his campaign is just that: Everyman running for Congress. With his former National Guard artillery unit deployed in Iraq, Mr. Walz emphasizes the need for change in the war's strategy. But most of all, given the House's low standing in opinion polls and voter anxiety about America losing its way, he sees his candidacy as a wake-up call for Congress and the nation.

REPRESENTATIVE RACES

"When you wake up Nov. 8, it can be a brand new world," he told supporters last week in Owatonna. "It's not vindictiveness. It's not us saying all our Republican neighbors are wrong. It's us saying this Congress is broken. This rubber-stamp Congress is not giving this country the ability to move forward and compromise.

"If you know how good we are going to feel, picture for a moment how the rest of the world is going to feel. When they wake up Nov. 8, they're going to look and say, 'The Americans are back.' "

Up and down the ballot, Minnesota is a battleground this fall with a Senate seat and the governor's mansion also up for grabs. Early in the nominating process during the spring, Mr. Walz -- who bears a resemblance to another high-school teacher and coach: House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois -- showed promise but was overlooked nationally because of his lack of political experience. He and his fellow Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party candidates are their own cast of characters, less a political party than a repertory company for modern America.

The DFL's field includes a black Muslim; a former Federal Bureau of Investigation agent who was an early outspoken critic of the agency's 9/11 performance; and a child-safety advocate whose son was abducted years ago. But just as the party is seeking change in Washington, it is also struggling to deal with change among its own ranks.

Women and minorities have demanded more of a voice. The retirement of Rep. Martin Sabo, a Democrat, has forced the Fifth District -- made up primarily of Minneapolis and close-in suburbs -- to confront how much it has changed from the working-class neighborhoods that first sent Mr. Sabo to Congress 28 years ago.

Keith Ellison, an antiwar state legislator who would be the first Muslim ever in Congress, won the primary last month with the help of a relatively new Somalian immigrant population. Supporters praise the young African-American attorney as a new voice for the party, but Mr. Ellison's history of parking tickets and tax liens have caused his candidacy to divide longtime allies such as former Vice President Walter Mondale and Mr. Sabo.

The Fifth District is more gentrified but still Democratic. Mr. Mondale says it has changed significantly, "and Keith is part of that change and he will be a good congressman." But Mr. Sabo, whose favored candidate lost in the primary, hasn't made any endorsement. Instead, he has permitted his photograph to be used in campaign literature for independent candidate Tammy Lee, who hopes for an upset and is drawing support from disaffected Democrats as well as conservative bloggers who feel Republican Alan Fine has no chance.

"I'm the palatable alternative to Keith Ellison," says Ms. Lee. "He has a lot of baggage. ... You have a lot of Democrats, lifelong Democrats, who are very uncomfortable sending Keith Ellison to Washington."

Mr. Ellison says of his critics: "When I'm talking about health care and getting out of the war, they are talking about me. The image that's being created is Keith's careless. Maybe I have been careless and I am wrong for it. The voters will decide if I am too careless to go to Congress."

Minnesota's Sixth District, which stretches from the Twin Cities suburbs to St. Cloud, is another open seat -- held by a Republican. Both parties rejected more moderate nominees last spring, and the result has been a nasty, costly contest that has largely eclipsed others in the state.

Democrat Patty Wetterling is proving more resilient than Republicans expected against state Sen. Michelle Bachmann. In recent days, the St. Cloud Times and a suburban newspaper chain, both of which opposed her candidacy two years ago, have endorsed Ms. Wetterling, and polls show a tight race in a district Mr. Bush won with 57% of the vote in 2004.

In the First District, both national parties have entered the fray's home stretch with attack ads focused on the race's top issues: immigration and the war in Iraq. Labor unions are helping Mr. Walz; Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and first lady Laura Bush made back-to-back appearances with Mr. Gutknecht, and, led by agribusiness interests, political action committees have contributed almost $200,000 into the contest since Labor Day.

In an interview during the spring, Mr. Gutknecht played down the political threat posed by the war. But after traveling to Baghdad this summer, he began expressing doubts about the direction of U.S. policy. "The American people are incredibly patient, but their patience is almost at the end," he says.

The congressman faults the Mark Foley page scandal for a drop in his own polls during the first week of October, but says he has recovered. The first lady puts "more of a human face" on the administration and, he says, will help him reach out to swing voters. "They don't wake up in the morning angry at George Bush," he says. "They wake up frustrated and ask themselves, are we doing the right thing?"

Mr. Walz began running a new Iraq war TV ad last week, showing him standing before empty football bleachers intended to represent the number of dead U.S. troops, now approaching 3,000. "Serving right now are kids I taught, coached and trained to be soldiers," he says to the camera. "They deserve a plan for Iraq to govern itself so they can come home."

To blunt the war issue, Republicans have attacked Mr. Walz on illegal immigration. The challenger has proposed that undocumented workers be put on a path toward earned citizenship, but only if they first return to their native country and legally re-enter the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0087831

This is a position akin to one championed by prominent House conservative Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.) and to the right of Mr. McCain, but Republicans are spending heavily on spots accusing Mr. Walz of supporting a sweeping amnesty.

Mr. Walz says he hopes voters will see the attacks as another aspect of Washington they want changed.

Liberal Republican Suburb Turns Furious With G.O.P. (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash., Oct. 24 — The M.B.A.'s have had it. The engineers are fuming.

For as long as anyone here can remember, Bellevue has been a stronghold of socially liberal Republicanism. First, it was a prosperous Seattle bedroom community, then a technological boomtown, where employees of Microsoft and Internet start-ups consistently voted for fiscal restraint and hands-off government.

But now, voters here are accusing the party in power of overspending and overreaching — and when they do, they sound like people who write manifestos, not software code.

"I'm a mild-mannered guy," Michael Mattison, a partner in a software venture development firm, said as he stabbed a piece of halibut in the sunlit dining room of a local bistro. "But we can no longer be subdued."

Bellevue has been growing more Democratic for several years, thanks to an influx of liberal voters and a professional class that is changing teams. This year, Bellevue may send its first Democrat to Congress. Darcy Burner, who even supporters admit is inexperienced, may unseat Representative Dave Reichert, a well-liked, longtime public servant, simply because constituents want Democratic control of the House of Representatives.

"I am a Republican and have traditionally voted that way," Tony Schuler, an operations services manager at Microsoft with a Harvard M.B.A., said as he sat with his wife, Deanna, in their home above Lake Sammamish. But Mr. Schuler abhors what he sees as a new Republican habit of meddling in private affairs.

"The Schiavo case. Tapping people without a warrant. Whether or not people are gay," he said. "Let people be free! It's not government's job to interfere with those things."

In Bellevue, the professional is political. Rather than religion or culture, what unites the diverse population — a quarter of residents are foreign born — are the values of their workplaces: technological innovation, accuracy, efficiency.

And this year, one issue incenses them above all others: restrictions on embryonic stem cell research.

It is a matter of concern across the country, even across parties. But for many engineers and their ilk, restriction of stem cell research is what gay marriage is to conservative Christians, a phenomenon so counter to their basic values that they cannot vote for any candidate who supports it. After all, for Bellevue's professionals, science is not only a means of creating wealth but also an idealistic pursuit, the most promising way they know of improving the human condition.

"For hundreds of years, science has had its own jurisprudence over the truth. It's called peer review, and it works pretty well," said Mr. Mattison, whose father had Alzheimer's and his uncle Parkinson's disease. "I'm outraged that a mere politician would interpret science for me."

Voters like Mr. Mattison should be "natural constituents of Republicans," said Robert E. Lang, a professor of urban planning at Virginia Tech who did research on Bellevue for a coming book on fast-growing "boomburbs," which have city-size populations but suburb-like atmospheres. "They're golfers," Mr. Lang said. (Actually, Mr. Mattison prefers fly-fishing with private guides.)

Voters here also describe themselves as "obsessed" by the mounting national debt, which Mr. Mattison calls a "greater threat than terrorism" to the nation's health.

Lara Peterson, a single mother who markets hardware for Microsoft, said, "It makes me insane to know that we had this huge budget surplus, and yet we've run up such debt in a six-year period."

Ms. Peterson has adopted two daughters from China and is working on a third. As Gwen, her eldest, considered whether biting into an apple would dislodge her dangling front teeth, Ms. Peterson acknowledged that her fixation was personal.

China gains "so much power and control by carrying so much of our debt," said Ms. Peterson, who described herself as a Democrat who often crosses party lines. If the United States one day resists repayment, she said, her girls will "never have an ability to have a relationship with their country."

The politics of Microsoft employees is a subdrama unto itself. In the 2000 presidential election, many voted for President Bush, who was expected to curtail the Clinton administration's antitrust case against the company. But now "the vibe is pretty Democratic," Ms. Peterson said, and many employees who cursed the Democrats just a few years ago now plan on voting for the party.

Microsoft looms so large here, it influences the views even of those it does not employ. Several members of the First Congregational Church of Bellevue, speaking over home-pressed apple cider, said they were mortified by America's role abroad in a way they had not been since the Vietnam War.

They do have one source of global pride, though: Bill and Melinda Gates' work in Africa, which they see as a kind of alternative to official foreign policy and an example of how the United States should be helping the most troubled spots on earth.

When she travels abroad, said Mary Nassif, a school psychologist, "I may not take pride in being American, but I love saying I'm from Seattle."

On a recent evening, immigrants gathered at the Crossroads Mall, where the food court's attempt at internationalism — a pad Thai vendor here, some trays of tandoori there — seemed bland compared with its mix of Eritrean, Laotian and Somali patrons. These immigrants, many from conservative religious backgrounds, are among the Bellevue Republicans who feel the strongest connection to their party on social issues.

Take Pia and Bong Bernadino, who moved here in 2002 from New Jersey, boarding a train without jobs or even acquaintances awaiting them. Ms. Bernadino had been scheduled to meet a friend in the lobby of the World Trade Center at 9 a.m. on Sept. 11, 2001; both she and the friend were late. Later, she taught at a kindergarten on Canal Street, where the students were so traumatized, they used their coloring time to draw babies falling out of the sky.

The Bernadinos moved west to escape their shock and to pursue Mr. Bernadino's long-held dream of working for Microsoft. Now Mr. Bernadino spends his days there as a game developer and his evenings running a Web design business with his wife; they also plan to start an online store for novels signed by their authors. They are saving for a house and sending money home to family in the Philippines.

This year, as always, they are voting for candidates "with a strong family orientation," Mr. Bernadino said. "We're very devout Catholics. If someone is promoting pro-choice it may be questionable for us."

Their other concern is diversity. To their delight, the ballot they received in the mail this year had translations in seven languages, including their native Tagalog. "This is paradise, the land of opportunity," Ms. Bernadino said of Bellevue.

Sheraz Malik, 29, is a Pakistani Muslim who came to the United States alone 10 years ago and became a citizen. Mr. Malik co-founded a long-distance Internet telephone service, which he used to court his fiancée, a Pakistani woman in Dubai. (It is not exactly an arranged marriage, he explained between bites of a hot dog; his parents shortlisted candidates, and after a year of online conversations, he chose one.)

Though Republican policies are generally favorable to his native country and his religious values, Mr. Malik said, he has drifted toward the Democrats since Sept. 11. "When the U.K. had the train blast, they didn't go out and start bombing people," he said. "They examined what they were doing wrong, both in terms of security and why a British-born Pakistani would do that."

Soon he will cast an even more profound vote than the one in November, deciding whether to bring his bride here or move with her back to Pakistan. If he leaves, it will be partly because of post-Sept. 11 changes, like immigration registration measures and what he sees as a general erosion of due process.

"If you're fighting for freedom outside the U.S. and then you suppress freedom at home," he said, "then what are you fighting for in the first place?"

With The House In The Balance, Pelosi Serves As A Focal Point For Both Parties (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

ATLANTA — The young women on the porch were whispering, their tittering just audible over Bill Clinton's remarks to the 300 or so Democratic donors gathered here for lunch.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, mindful that some guests had paid $10,000 for a plate of chicken and bread pudding, shot a frown — the sort a grandmother gives when someone arrives at Christmas dinner in a wrinkled shirt — and in a split second, the whispers ceased. Ms. Pelosi's face resumed its trademark molar-baring smile.

There it was in one brief moment, the three essential elements of Ms. Pelosi's campaign to bring Congress under control of her Democratic Party, preferably with her favored alliteration: message, money, manners.

With the Republican ascendancy in Washington in peril and Ms. Pelosi in line to become the country's first female speaker of the House, she has emerged as a searing symbol of the country's deep partisan divide.

For Republican strategists laboring to maintain control of Congress, she is the personification of liberal lunacy, an Armani-clad elitist who will help push lawmakers toward an agenda of multicultural, tax-raising appeasement.

To many Democrats, Ms. Pelosi embodies their raw antipathy for a Republican Party that has held them largely to the margins for more than a decade, and their hope that a Democratic Congress could make trouble for a president with whom they are at bitter odds.

DOJ_NMG_0087833

"I wouldn't say I'm tough," Ms. Pelosi, 66, said in an interview at the home of Representative John Lewis of Georgia, who was host for the luncheon. "I think I am firm and strong."

Indeed, her smile-while-she-gnaws-at-you style and her legislative prowess have gained her respect, if not good wishes, from colleagues and foes.

Aided by a highly partisan House, she has overseen the most uniform voting record of any Democratic caucus since the 1950s. Her steely strategy for sinking President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security succeeded.

She has raised more money for Democrats in this election cycle than any other candidate except Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton — just over $50 million. In September, her party's House campaign raised $14.4 million, outpacing Republicans.

"I am a big fan," said Dick Armey, the former Republican majority leader of the House and co-architect of his party's coup in the 1994 election. "She is an able person and serious about her work and a very pleasant person with whom to work."

Conceding that he disagreed with Ms. Pelosi on everything that matters — "She's misguided" — Mr. Armey added: "You don't get to be minority leader without being intelligent. I'm no longer in office, so I am free to be a nice person. If I had been majority leader and said, 'I like Nancy Pelosi,' I would be crucified."

In her stump speech, Ms. Pelosi has been laying out an agenda for what a Democratic-led House would do in its first 100 hours. Her planning has unnerved Republicans, some of whom are taking aim at her in campaign advertisements.

"I don't take it personally," Ms. Pelosi said, "nor should they."

She arrived at the luncheon here from the airport (she had been raising money in New York, and would go on to Florida to raise more) in a signature lilac suit and strolled into the racially mixed crowd of Atlanta's Democratic elite.

She made her way through the crowd greeting many people by first name, smiling. "How was Paris?" she asked Ann Cox Chambers, a billionaire former ambassador, clutching her hand.

Ms. Pelosi ate nothing and even in casual conversation seemed to be reading from a script. One woman complained to her about Republican advertisements. "The Republicans are unconcerned about money, truth or decency," Ms. Pelosi said, staring into the woman's eyes while delivering one of her standard speech lines.

In her formal remarks over lunch, she forgot one line and stuffed it awkwardly into her close. "Thank — Are you ready for a Democratic victory? — you!"

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, said of Ms. Pelosi, "She smiles too much in public." Mr. Frank attributed her image problems with some people to "sexism, partly."

"She is an attractive woman who dresses very well and is soft spoken, from a generation that has a certain kind of softness," he said.

Ms. Pelosi was uninterested in talking about why some people seem angry that she wears expensive suits or make fun of her speaking style, and she said she found her sex an asset.

"Women are very excited about the prospect of a woman speaker," she said, sitting in the Lewises' living room.

Her campaign aides play down her ambition, denying that she ever planned to lead anything — an assertion Ms. Pelosi repeated in the interview.

But current and former associates describe her as infused with political aspirations almost from birth.

"She has always wanted to be speaker," said Tony Coelho, a former House Democratic whip. "She told me so 10 or 15 years ago."

Born and raised in Baltimore, Ms. Pelosi is a lifelong Democrat raised at the till of the "favor bank" developed by her father, Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., a congressman in the 1940s and the mayor of Baltimore during most of Ms. Pelosi's childhood.

Ms. Pelosi often mentions learning from her father's practice of keeping note of people he had helped and calling in stamp-licking, envelope-stuffing favors from them at election time.

Her family's fierce partisanship is legendary. When President Ronald Reagan was running for re-election against Walter Mondale, the president went to Baltimore to dedicate a monument. White House officials called Ms. Pelosi's mother to ask if they could collect Mr. D'Alesandro on the way.

Her mother replied, "After what he has done to poor people, he should not come to our house," Ms. Pelosi said in the interview here. "She made it clear that would not be happening."

Ms. Pelosi's version of the favor bank involves seeking money and support from Democratic officeholders, donors and organizations around the country. She makes it clear in phone conversations that she knows what their individual wishes may be, and that if they hope to see them attended to should "her candidates" take back the House, they need to pay upfront, several people whom she has contacted said.

"She's relentless," said a national union official, who said Ms. Pelosi had been calling in recent months, looking for money for campaigns and volunteers. The official, an admirer who spoke on the condition of anonymity because getting on Ms. Pelosi's bad side "ain't pretty," added, "She can really smell the goal line."

Ms. Pelosi married her husband, Paul, a millionaire real estate investor, in 1963. They moved to Mr. Pelosi's hometown, San Francisco, and had five children. From early in her married life, she began holding fund-raisers, for which she cooked the food and her children served it.

She rose quickly in the party, becoming chairwoman of the California Democratic Party. In 1983, when Phillip Burton, the congressman for the Fifth District in California, died, his wife, Sala, won an election to complete his term. But in 1987, Ms. Burton became ill with cancer, and she summoned her politically-powerful family to her deathbed to suggest Ms. Pelosi — who had recently lost a bid to become chairwoman of the national Democratic Party — to take her place.

"She saw a lot more than I did at that point about Nancy's leadership potential," said John Burton, a former state senator and Phillip's brother. "And she was more than right."

Ms. Pelosi's victory in that election came in part by coloring her competitor in the primary, Harry Britt, as too liberal. In every election since, she has been derided by her district's most liberal activists as not liberal enough.

That constituency is furious that she has been largely absent from the same-sex marriage fracas, voted to pay for the Iraq war and has refused to move to impeach Mr. Bush.

Code Pink, an antiwar group, has picketed her town hall meetings. "She represents one of the most progressive districts in the country," said Medea Benjamin, co-founder of the group. "We keep pulling her back to what we hope are her real roots."

That first campaign also presaged Ms. Pelosi's proclivity for sticking to her message, her ability to avoid being disarmed by her critics and her taste for retribution.

"The first time she ran for Congress, I was angry about people supporting her opponent," Mr. Burton said. "I was yelling and screaming and she would just go to another church bingo game. She said, 'Don't worry about it; some day they will realize how unimportant they really are.' And after it was over, she didn't do much for them."

Her voting record is among the most liberal in Congress. She gets an "A" from the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League and an "F" from the National Rifle Association. She favors alternative sentencing over prison construction, schools without prayer and death with taxes. She voted against the use of force in Iraq, though after the war started she voted to finance it.

In Ms. Pelosi's vision for those first 100 hours, a Democratic-led veto-proof majority would "drain the swamp of Washington," create a new rules package that would include pay-as-you-go budgeting, immediately adopt the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, increase the minimum wage to $7.25 and broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal money.

She also imagines cutting the interest rate on student loans and "ending tax giveaways for big oil."

Still, she has risen in the ranks by being not a voice of her party, but its able banker. When she campaigned for whip, she filled the Democratic Congressional war chest with $3 million, and she continues to curry favor by flipping through her Rolodex of the rich.

"She has the best personal fund-raising base of any candidate outside of a president," Mr. Burton said.

Ms. Pelosi seemed at her most comfortable — and polished — at a fund-raiser recently in the wealthy Bel Air section of Los Angeles, where she was introduced by the actress Annette Bening, serenaded by a folk guitarist and surrounded by the sort of women who know better than to wear high heels to a garden party.

Before walking into the backyard, Ms. Pelosi went to greet one young volunteer, the granddaughter of the hostess, and took her face gently into her hands and thanked her.

She then emerged, beaming at the crowd, largely female and many of a certain age, and announced, "At last we have a seat at the table."

Lobbyists Won't Like What Pelosi Has In Mind (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Odds are that lobbying in the House of Representatives is about to get harder.

If Democrats gain the 15 seats they need to win control of the House -- and most analysts think they will -- one of the first things the new House will do is restrict or end outright a slew of lobbying practices.

In a little-publicized statement, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the House Democratic leader, has promised to change the chamber's rules to reflect the provisions of her not-so-modestly-named Honest Leadership and Open Government Act of 2006. The months-old measure would, among other things, prohibit House members from accepting gifts and travel from lobbyists or from organizations that employ lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0087835

The Pelosi bill includes changes not only to House rules but also to federal laws. Any changes in law would have to be approved by the Senate and the president before they could take effect. But the House can alter its own rules anytime, and that's precisely what Pelosi proposes to do as the House's first official act next year -- after it selects her as speaker.

Congress has come close to reining in lobbyists before, and it wound up doing nothing of the kind. Several of the proposals in Pelosi's bill (H.R. 4682, for you wonks out there) were wending their way through the system but died after lawmakers concluded -- incorrectly, it turned out -- that voters didn't care much about congressional "corruption." Pelosi's bill, with small modifications, was tested in the House and lost by just three votes.

Now, spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said, Pelosi is committed to passing "the elements within the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act that are within the House rules." Any variations from the original, Crider said, would be "slight."

That would be a major development for K Street. If the House rules were altered in ways that even came close to Pelosi's preferences, lobbying of House members would be changed significantly and immediately. The new rules would apply as soon as they were approved by a simple majority.

The Senate would be trickier. Election analysts say it's a tossup whether Democrats will control the Senate next year. If it does, Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid, said, "Ethics reform will be a priority." But he noted that a two-thirds vote of the Senate is needed to modify its rules, which would make a quick assault on lobbying difficult.

Not so in the House. The biggest change proposed by Pelosi would be the ban on gifts and travel. Pelosi would prohibit House members and their staff from using corporate jets for travel taken as part of their official duties. She would also prevent them from taking anything of value from lobbyists, including meals, tickets and entertainment.

The ban would apply not just to lobbyists' gifts but also to gifts from nongovernmental groups that hire lobbyists. House members and their aides would also be barred from accepting transportation or lodging for any trips that are funded, arranged, requested, planned or even attended by lobbyists.

These are all reactions to the Jack Abramoff scandal. Abramoff infamously took Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) on a golfing trip to Scotland on a private jet. The result was a series of convictions on fraud and public corruption charges against Ney, Abramoff and others in federal court this year.

In an attempt to slow the revolving door between the public and private sectors, Pelosi would deprive lawmakers-turned-lobbyists of a few of their congressional perks. She would eliminate the House rule that gives access to the House gym, the House floor and its cloak rooms to former members of Congress who are registered to lobby -- access that was temporarily taken away earlier this year.

Pelosi would also require House members and their aides to disclose to the House ethics committee whenever they are negotiating for jobs in the private sector. The disclosure would have to be made within three business days after the talks begin.

Because of the notorious Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska and other controversial pork barrel projects, reform-minded lawmakers have been pressing to make it more difficult to slip narrowly focused spending provisions into legislation. Taking up their cause, Pelosi would end the practice of adding such measures to bills after House-Senate negotiators have completed their work. She would also insist that bills be made available to the public at least 24 hours before they could be voted on by the full House; some types of bills would have to be available for three days.

In addition, Pelosi would broaden a rule change adopted by the House this year that would force lawmakers to disclose the sponsors of "earmarked" spending and tax measures -- and to reveal their details -- before the bills that contain them can become law.

The Pelosi bill would crack down on lobbyists directly by creating an Office of Public Integrity. The new agency, which would be overseen by the House inspector general, would audit and investigate lobbyists' periodic filings and refer any problems they find to the U.S. attorney's office. Currently there is little if any serious enforcement of lobbying-disclosure laws.

The Pelosi measure would also make it tougher for Congress to spend public money in ways that widen the budget deficit. She would bar the House from taking up major budget bills that increase the government's deficit, at least compared to the latest estimate from the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Pelosi would even stop the Democrats from doing what Republicans did to help solidify their majority -- at least when it comes to dealing with lobbyists. Republican leaders pressured major lobbying offices and trade associations in town to hire former Republican staffers and lawmakers in senior positions. That effort, known as the K Street Project, was designed to increase the flow of campaign contributions to Republican candidates and causes.

Pelosi would specifically prohibit House members from using their official actions to influence any employment decisions "on the basis of partisan political affiliation."

None of the provisions would be implemented until early next year, when the new Congress convenes. And if history is a guide, lobbyists and their lawmaker friends will probably manage to water down at least some of them before they come to a vote.

DOJ_NMG_0087836

But if Democrats win a congressional majority in next week's elections, a leading reason will be the public's disgust with congressional ethics, or lack thereof. It would only make sense for the new leadership to respond by loosening the links that bind lawmakers and lobbyists.

Pelosi's Liberal Label Is All Relative (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — To much of the country, Nancy Pelosi is the liberal embodiment of a city as crazy as its near-vertical hills. But here at home, the Democratic House leader is seen as something else: sober, centrist and very much a part of the political establishment, for good or bad.

For five years, ever since she entered the congressional leadership, Pelosi has balanced the interests of 200-plus colleagues of varied philosophies with the demands of a district about as far left politically as it is geographically.

Now she is within hailing distance of history; if Democrats win control of the House on Nov. 7, she would be the first woman ever to serve as speaker.

Her success is all the more striking given the persistent through-the-looking-glass quality of San Francisco politics. Where else would Willie Brown be elected as the moderate candidate for mayor? Or dignitaries clamor for a place among the drag queens and genitalia celebrated in the annual Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Parade?

In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry won 62% of the presidential vote at home in Massachusetts. Here, he garnered 85%.

"If there's a stereotype of California as the 'Left Coast,' San Francisco is the epicenter," said pollster Mark DiCamillo.

"Many 'moderates' in San Francisco would be burned as witches elsewhere," agreed Alex Clemens, a local media and campaign consultant.

It is easy to lampoon San Francisco as the world's largest open-air asylum, as conservatives, in particular, are wont to do. On Nov. 7, the day the nation decides control of Congress, voters here will weigh an initiative making it official city policy to seek the ouster of President Bush and Vice President Cheney. This after the pair ignored a ballot measure two years ago demanding an immediate U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

But San Francisco is also a tough political town, more like New York or Boston than any West Coast city. Campaigns, a widely appreciated form of civic theater, are personal and often vicious.

The first time Pelosi, a longtime Democratic activist, ran for Congress, billboards across the city mocked her as "the party girl of the party." She squeaked to victory — thanks, in an exquisite footnote, to the crossover support of San Francisco's Republicans, who found Pelosi less objectionable than her even more liberal opponent.

Since that 1987 race, Pelosi has routinely won reelection with 80% or more of the vote, freeing her to travel the country and pay the dues needed to climb the congressional ladder — and, she hopes, elect enough Democrats in November to make her third in line to the presidency.

Not that everyone here welcomes the prospect. Even as Republicans across the country vilify Pelosi as the face of the lunatic left, here she faces the enmity of the fire-breathing liberals she supposedly represents. Only in San Francisco would Pelosi be picketed as a right-wing warmonger, as she was at a January town hall meeting overrun by protesters who jeered her refusal to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq. There is "always a group that you don't go far enough with," Pelosi said with a shrug a few days later.

Given the intensity of political combat, it is probably no accident that so many of California's elected leaders — from Hiram Johnson to Pat Brown to Dianne Feinstein — emerged from San Francisco's 47 square miles of volatility. (Sen. Feinstein, a liberal by most standards, is another politician seen by the San Francisco left as too cozy with business and a bit of a prig.)

"Every two blocks has its own special-interest group or political club or advocacy organization," said Clemens, exaggerating only slightly. "Those who survive tend to have thick skins, quick minds and a halfway decent sense of humor."

San Francisco, with its seafaring roots in the Gold Rush, has long been a harbor for those of a different ilk: the beatniks of North Beach, the hippies of Haight-Ashbury, the gays and lesbians who transformed the Castro district. But it was not always a Democratic fortress. Just about 30 years ago, a staunchly conservative city supervisor named John Barbagelata came within a whisker of being elected mayor in a brutal election widely viewed as a political watershed. He was defeated by liberal George Moscone, who threw City Hall open to women, gays and other disenfranchised minorities.

That, in turn, hastened the city's leftward shift, which continued even after Moscone's November 1978 assassination by Supervisor Dan White, an avenger of the city's fading old guard. "His mayoralty was the critical break point," said Richard DeLeon, an author and political scientist at San Francisco State University.

Pelosi, a Democratic fixture for nearly 40 years, represents everywhere but the southwest corner of the city. Chinatown, Nob Hill, North Beach and other landmarks are all part of her domain. Even as she built a national profile, her staff worked hard on the nuts and bolts of constituent service — chasing tardy Social Security checks and the like — helping secure Pelosi's hold on the district.

Pelosi has compiled a reliably liberal voting record over the years, supporting legal abortion with few restrictions, stiffer gun control, gay rights and a needle-exchange program to prevent the spread of AIDS. She opposed welfare reform and voted against the 1991 Persian Gulf War and the October 2002 resolution authorizing the invasion of Iraq.

But to critics on the left, Pelosi is a sellout who "can talk the talk [but] doesn't walk the walk," as her Green Party challenger, Krissy Keefer, states on her campaign website. Among the particulars: Pelosi's support for trade deals, commercial activity in the Presidio (part of Golden Gate National Recreation Area) and legislation cracking down on rave parties. On the war, Pelosi is faulted for endorsing an immediate pullout from Iraq but not pushing her view as the party's position — a move that would have surely jeopardized her leadership job.

"From Ohio, Pelosi looks liberal," Keefer said in an interview. But San Francisco has "a completely different paradigm and idea about how things should be."

If that perspective seems loopy to some, Eric Jaye — a consultant on Pelosi's first campaign — offered this: "While you have a certain component of San Francisco that a nation loves to fear, take comfort, America, in the fact those people don't like Nancy Pelosi either."

Menendez Has A Narrow Lead, But It's Kean N.J. Trusts (BCR)

By Herb Jackson

Bergen County Record, October 30, 2006

AP New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez addresses the crowd at a morning East Orange Democratic Fall breakfast at Nanina's in the Park in Belleville, N.J.

Complete results: The Record voter poll

Democrat Bob Menendez holds a six-point lead in the race for U.S. Senate even though more New Jersey voters like and trust Republican Tom Kean Jr., a poll by The Record found.

That may be because New Jerseyans, by a wide margin, want Democrats to control Congress in January, the poll also found.

"Any other political year, I think the Republicans win that seat," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, the Rockville, Md., firm that conducted the survey. "The only thing saving Menendez is the climate out there."

Menendez led Kean 48 percent to 42 percent in the survey of 600 likely voters taken Monday through Wednesday. Just 10 percent said they were very or somewhat likely to change their minds by Election Day.

The poll found the electorate sharply split by gender. Women preferred Menendez 52 percent to 37 percent, while Kean had a three-point edge among men. Kean also held a five-point lead in South Jersey, while Menendez had a 10-point lead in the more populous northern part of the state.

The poll's margin of error was plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Menendez was appointed to the Senate in January after serving 13 years in the House, and has cast the campaign primarily as a referendum on President Bush and the war in Iraq, which he voted against in 2002. He has depicted Kean as a rubber stamp for Bush and countered attacks on his ethics by questioning Kean's fund-raising practices and votes in the state Legislature.

Kean, a state senator from Union County, has accused Menendez of lining his pockets with taxpayer money by collecting more than $300,000 in rent over nine years from a federally subsidized non-profit organization in Union City. Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed information about the lease, but Menendez says it was approved by House ethics attorneys.

The poll found voters believe Kean is more trustworthy by a 49 percent to 36 percent ratio, and they personally like Kean more than Menendez, 48 percent to 33 percent.

But even among people who consider Kean more trustworthy, 35 percent are voting for Menendez, apparently because other factors are more important.

Thirty percent of voters said the Iraq war was the most important issue in deciding their vote, compared with 10 percent who said corruption. Voters also want to see Democrats rather than Republicans control Congress -- by a margin of 18 percentage points, 53 percent to 35 percent.

To control the Senate, Democrats need to pick up six seats nationwide and not lose any. Menendez occupies the only vulnerable Democratic seat, political handicappers say, and both parties have spent millions of dollars on ads here in recent weeks.

Bush is very unpopular. In the poll, 37 percent said Bush was doing an excellent or good job as president, while 31 percent said he was doing a fair job and 32 percent said he was doing a poor job.

DOJ_NMG_0087838

Early in the campaign, Republicans had hoped that raising the state sales tax would make Governor Corzine unpopular and voter anger at Trenton Democrats would drag Menendez down.

But the poll found that while Corzine is not popular, he's faring far better than Bush. Forty-four percent said Corzine is doing an excellent or good job, 38 percent a fair job and 10 percent a poor job.

Voters see both Senate candidates as flawed. The poll found 41 percent have a favorable opinion of Menendez while 38 percent have an unfavorable opinion. Kean's favorable/unfavorable ratio of 40 percent to 32 percent was slightly better.

When asked how they felt about the choice of candidates, 45 percent said they were very or somewhat satisfied, while 44 percent said they were not very satisfied or not at all satisfied.

"I don't think voters are crazy about either man," Ali said. "It's like voting for the lesser of two evils. They really want Democrats to take over, but really don't like Menendez."

Menendez spokesman Matthew Miller said voters "understand the stakes are high in this campaign.

"They're rejecting Tom Kean Jr.'s smears because they want a candidate who is talking about issues that matter to them, and who they know will stand up to George Bush and change the direction of the country."

Kean spokeswoman Jill Hazelbaker said it continues to be a tight race, and argued Menendez should be doing better given the way voters feel about his party. She noted that until this weekend, Menendez had been spending more heavily than Kean on TV advertising, but the two candidates' airtime is going to be closer down the stretch.

"I think you're going to see numbers move a bit," Hazelbaker said. "We just started running some positive advertisements. As people are given more reasons to vote for Tom Kean, as they see him as a moderate, as independent, you're going to see numbers change from Menendez to Kean."

The poll found voters consider both candidates to have run equally negative campaigns, and most said TV advertising had not affected their choice. But among those who said their vote was swayed by the depictions in the ads of Menendez as corrupt and Kean as a rubber stamp, slightly more said they were inclined to vote against Menendez than against Kean.

That difference could be critical if the spread between the candidates was one or two percentage points, Ali said, "but you have to give the edge to Menendez.

"In spite of all his problems, his unfavorables, he's still ahead. If voters were going to make the jump to Kean, you'd think he'd be ahead by now," Ali said.

Poll: N.J. Democrat Leads Senate Race (AP-Y)

By Rebecca Santana

AP, October 30, 2006

Sen. Robert Menendez holds a slight lead over Republican Tom Kean Jr. in their Senate race with just over a week left before election day, a poll published Sunday found.

Democrat Menendez leads Kean 48-42 percent, according to a poll of 600 likely voters published Sunday in The Record of Bergen County.

Thirty percent of voters said the Iraq war was the most important issue in deciding their vote. Voters also want to see Democrats rather than Republicans control Congress, 53-35 percent.

President Bush remains unpopular, with only 37 percent saying he was doing an excellent or good job. Menendez's campaign strategy has been dominated by efforts to tie Kean to Bush administration policies, while Kean has painted Menendez as a corrupt politician.

"Any other political year, I think the Republicans win that seat," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, the Rockville, Md., firm that conducted the survey. "The only thing saving Menendez is the climate out there."

The poll said voters found Kean more trustworthy by a 49-36 percent ratio, and they personally like him more than Menendez, 48-33 percent. But of those voters who consider Kean more trustworthy, 35 percent are voting for Menendez because they feel other factors, such as the war in Iraq and putting Democrats back in control of Congress, are more important.

The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points. It was conducted by phone Oct. 23-25.

Gay Ruling May Boost N.J. Values Vote (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Last week's New Jersey Supreme Court decision granting recognition to same-sex couples could energize concerned values voters, some activists say, in a heavily Democratic state where Republican Tom Kean Jr. is making a strong challenge to Sen. Robert Menendez.

DOJ_NMG_0087839

"There'll be a backlash," predicted Len Deo, president of New Jersey Family Policy Council. "I've been talking to friends, and they're bewildered by this decision. They're upset."

New Jersey's state Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that same-sex couples were treated unequally by the state and ordered the Legislature to correct this -- leaving open the question of whether the new status would be called "marriage." Richard J. Codey, Democratic president of the state Senate, told the Philadelphia Inquirer that the state will stop short of calling it "marriage."

But Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs at the Family Research Council, said the decision "could make a difference" for Mr. Kean, who said last week that he'd support a state constitutional amendment to protect traditional marriage. The amendment is being pushed by conservative groups.

But Larry Cirignano, executive director of CatholicVote.org said that both Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean are "hedging" on the complex issue and that values voters won't be energized unless they see a "champion" against same-sex "marriage" -- which neither candidate is.

"Unless the candidates make it an issue ... I don't see that it will have a huge impact," Mr. Cirignano said.

The hard-fought contest between Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean is one of the few Senate seats that Republicans think they can wrench away from Democrats next week. The National Republican Senatorial Committee recently purchased $3.5 million in ad time to help Mr. Kean in the final days.

Both candidates have said they support traditional marriage as between a man and a woman but oppose amending the federal Constitution to ban same-sex "marriage."

After last week's decision, however, Mr. Kean wasted no time in saying he'd support amending the state constitution to clarify that marriage should be between a man and a woman.

"I still believe that marriage is and should be between one man and one woman, and I would support an amendment to the state constitution reaffirming that definition," he said.

Mr. Menendez reiterated that he also believes marriage is between a man and a woman, but supports civil unions that afford same-sex couples full legal benefits.

"The Supreme Court affirmed those rights today, and it is now up to the Legislature to decide how they are to be administered," he said. "I will not support any constitutional amendment that takes away people's legal rights."

Mr. Cirignano said that neither of the candidates' positions are crystal clear and that "neither campaign is going to be out touting" the marriage issue with a little more than a week until the election, especially because it's difficult to gauge where the state electorate stands.

Indeed, both camps quickly shifted focus to other topics, with the Kean camp returning to corruption accusations against Mr. Menendez and Mr. Menendez attacking Mr. Kean over the Iraq war.

Democrat state lobbyist Rick Thigpen said Republicans have used same-sex "marriage" to rally their base in other states, but won't be able to do that in liberal New Jersey because Mr. Menendez's position doesn't present "a clear target for them to shoot at."

A Rutgers-Eagleton poll in June found that 49 percent of New Jerseyans support legalizing same-sex "marriage" and 44 percent oppose it.

New Jersey's Senate Race (NYT)

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

One of the first big decisions Jon Corzine had to make as governor of New Jersey was the appointment of a new senator to take his place in Washington. Mr. Corzine chose the less-than-charismatic Representative Robert Menendez, and as a result, New Jersey has the only Senate race this fall in which a Democratic incumbent seems to be in any danger of defeat. Nevertheless, in his race with State Senator Thomas Kean Jr., there is no question that Mr. Menendez is the better choice.

The 38-year-old Mr. Kean, a son of the former New Jersey governor and co-chairman of the 9/11 commission, is the latest in what has become a very long line of second- and third-generation politicians hoping to achieve high office on the back of their parents' reputations. Many of his positions seem to come from a campaign playbook rather than conviction. He has called for the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld while failing to criticize President Bush for keeping Mr. Rumsfeld on.

Mr. Kean supports both balanced budgets and all of the administration's tax cuts. Except for vague promises to vote against pork and to be tough against corruption, he fails to suggest any budget reductions to deal with the deficit. He wants voters to believe he would practice his father's moderate brand of politics, but there is little to suggest he is much more than a conservative Republican who opposes drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Mr. Menendez, 52, shows a much better grasp of the issues. In the House, where he was the third-highest ranking Democrat, he was an accomplished legislator. He opposed the resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq, and he has been outspoken in criticizing the administration's conduct of the war.

Mr. Menendez has a history of ethical lapses that have been all too common for Democratic officials in New Jersey, especially for those, like him, who continue to take an active part in local party politics. If re-elected, the senator should make it clear he is giving up any role in the Hudson County Democratic organization. But Mr. Kean has gone so far overboard in criticizing the senator that he has attempted to use an episode in which Mr. Menendez actually fought corruption early in his career as an example of unethical behavior.

Mr. Kean actually has a couple of ethical blemishes of his own. In one case, he accepted thousands of dollars of campaign donations last year from executives of the Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance companies while on the same day voting with his party in the State Senate to maintain a tax exemption for the companies.

New Jersey voters have a choice between a lawmaker who has done a good job of representing the state's concerns and the nation's interests in the House and the Senate and a state legislator with a shallow grasp of the issues and a famous name. Our unqualified endorsement goes to Robert Menendez.

Kennedy Targets Klobuchar's Character In U.S. Senate Debate (KCS)

By Patrick Condon

The Kansas City Star, October 30, 2006

ST. PAUL - Republican U.S. Senate candidate Mark Kennedy questioned the honesty of his Democratic opponent Amy Klobuchar during a debate Sunday night, scaling up his rhetoric against her with ten days to go until the election.

Kennedy several times brought up the flap over a possibly stolen Kennedy ad that was leaked to the Klobuchar campaign, suggesting that Klobuchar waited several days before reporting the incident to the FBI; and what he claimed was the refusal of the Klobuchar-led Hennepin County Attorney's office to fully respond to Republican Party requests for information about the office's prosecution of criminals.

"If you won't give Minnesota voters straight answers on these issues, why should they trust you in the U.S. Senate?" Kennedy asked Klobuchar.

Klobuchar hit back by contrasting her response to the stolen ad to the response of Republican congressional leaders in the scandal surrounding disgraced U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, who recently resigned amid allegations of improper contact with underage House pages. Kennedy is a Republican U.S. House member, though he's had no connection with the Foley incident.

"When I found out someone not from our campaign had improperly taken an ad, I immediately reported it to the FBI," Klobuchar said. "That's more than I can say about the leadership of this Congress when they found out someone was soliciting pages."

Klobuchar fired her chief spokeswoman after she viewed the content of an unreleased TV ad for Kennedy that had been sent to the Klobuchar campaign by a liberal blogger.

Klobuchar said Kennedy's tack illustrated that his campaign is one of "attacks instead of ideas."

With the Foley affair and other congressional scandals generating headlines this election season, Kennedy also was asked during the debate if the Republican Party still represents American values.

"Yes, Republicans I believe do represent the values of Minnesotans," Kennedy replied. "Yes, there have been scandals, and some have been horrifying. Those involved need to be held accountable, and they are being held accountable. Some are in jail, and they deserve to be."

The televised debate, held at the University of St. Thomas, touched most often on the war in Iraq and homeland security. Kennedy, as he has in recent days, touted his support for the U.S. effort in that country, saying that mistakes have been made but that drawing down resources now would create a breeding ground for future terrorist attacks on American soil.

Klobuchar and Independence Party candidate Robert Fitzgerald both called for new strategies in Iraq. With Kennedy criticizing Klobuchar's calls for diplomacy as naive, she pointed out that even Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said recently that the solution must be "a political one. This country is in civil war," Klobuchar said.

Fitzgerald seized on his first opportunity to bring his upstart candidacy to TV viewers, having been excluded from the first TV debate two weeks ago on NBC's "Meet the Press." Fitzgerald said both candidates are too reliant on support from corporate donors and their own political parties.

"To think that either of these two is going to achieve meaningful reform is ludicrous," Fitzgerald said. "You don't put replacement parts into a broken machine."

The candidates are set for two more debates between now and Election Day, the next this Thursday in Rochester and the final one the following Sunday at the Fitzgerald Theater in downtown St. Paul.

Allen Credo Is Put To The Test (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

When Virginia legislators gathered around Gov. George Allen's kitchen table in 1994 and told the Republican they thought eliminating parole would never work, he dismissed their skepticism in plain terms: "Nothing's impossible."

It was that attitude and his work as governor that made national Republicans take notice and begin considering Mr. Allen, now a U.S. senator, as a 2008 presidential contender.

Mr. Allen, seeking a second term on Nov. 7, had hoped accomplishments such as parole abolition would define his candidacy and secure an easy re-election. Instead, calling an Indian-American staffer for Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. "macaca" this summer thrust the race into the national spotlight and made it a neck-and-neck contest.

"All this stuff he did as governor, it's absolutely unbelievable," said Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax Republican, who recalled the kitchen meeting. "But no one ever knows anything about that because all they hear about is 'macaca.' "

Mr. Allen has apologized and says he made up the word, adding he never would have used it had he known it was considered a racial slur in some cultures.

Still, the incident set in motion a chain of events that have kept the cowboy-boot-wearing Mr. Allen below 50 percent in the polls, despite his past popularity in Virginia and a more-than-20-year political career.

Some of Mr. Allen's former football teammates at the University of Virginia told reporters that as a young man he regularly used racial slurs to describe blacks, but Mr. Allen, 54, says the "N-word" was never part of his vocabulary, and most teammates say they never heard him use the term.

The tobacco-chewing senator is often teased for making too many football references during legislative speeches, but says the game has shaped his governing philosophy.

Mr. Allen says his father, the late famed Redskins coach George H. Allen, taught him the four "F's" -- faith, freedom, family and football.

Among those football lessons: "Get knocked down, get back up," and a player's ability to "catch, kick, punt or long snap" is more important than his background.

"You don't care about [players'] race, religion, their ethnicity, what college they went to," Mr. Allen says. "You care about whether they can help the team win. [Football is] a true meritocracy, where everyone has that equal opportunity to compete and succeed, based upon their own hard work, diligence and capabilities. That's what we should aspire to in our society."

That theory has led to Mr. Allen's own trademarked brand of politicking -- "commonsense Jeffersonian conservatism."

He says the ideals include limited government, low taxes and improving education to keep the United States globally competitive.

This year is the first time Mr. Allen, a former state lawmaker and congressman, has had to run a major race as the establishment candidate instead of as a reformer. That style helped him unseat two-term Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

Most Virginians remember Mr. Allen for his gubernatorial record -- parole abolition, welfare reform and working with a Democrat-controlled state legislature to create nationally recognized education standards.

His good-natured public disposition and record have attracted national attention and prompted 215 Washington insiders to choose him in an April 2005 National Journal poll as the most likely 2008 Republican presidential nominee.

Supporters lauded his "Reagan-like" appeal and said he was one of few Southern politicians with "the experience and charisma to become a national candidate."

But 177 Republican and Democratic insiders in a recent National Journal poll agreed that he has run the worst campaign of any Senate candidate this fall.

"This one-time presidential wannabe has ushered himself off the national stage, and he will be lucky to win re-election," one Republican said. "Should have been a slam dunk in Virginia."

Mr. Allen further complicated his re-election bid when he said a reporter asking about his Jewish heritage was making "aspersions." The next day, he acknowledged his maternal grandfather was Jewish.

Mr. Allen says he learned to be tough by spending summers on a cattle ranch as a young man. While there, he learned the Western way with horses, "breaking them fast and hard in the mud and sand," and an Eastern way, with "a cube of sugar and an apple."

He was employing the Western way when he said of the Democrats who controlled the legislature in the 1990s: "Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whiny throats."

DOJ_NMG_0087842

Mr. Allen's younger sister, Jennifer, in her 2000 book "Fifth Quarter," portrays her oldest brother as a bully unafraid of roughing up his siblings.

Passages from the book are often cited as examples of Mr. Allen's character, but critics usually don't mention his sister's depiction of him as a star student, or that he set out a chair in honor of his late father at his gubernatorial inauguration.

Mr. Allen has dismissed the questions of his character as a liberal smear and says if the election is decided on the issues and his record, he will beat Mr. Webb, 60, a decorated Vietnam veteran and former secretary of the Navy under President Reagan.

Webb Of Deception (WT)

By Milton R. Copulos

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

In this age of political cynicism, it is unremarkable that a politician would change his position on an issue, or even take conflicting positions. But Jim Webb's transformation from the nominally conservative Republican who served as the Reagan administration's secretary of the Navy to a left-wing Democratic Senate candidate rivals St. Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus. Divine intervention, of course, is one possibility. A more likely explanation, however, is that the public persona Mr. Webb presents is actually a fabrication, as carefully crafted as any character in the novels he has penned.

The shift is truly remarkable. He once refused to shake John Kerry's hand, and in a 2004 USA Today editorial wrote that his 1971 Senate testimony had "defamed a generation of honorable men." Now he trumpets Mr. Kerry's endorsement. He once called the Clinton Administration among "the most corrupt" in modern history in one of many attacks aimed at the former president. Now he has Bill Clinton host a fundraiser. Mr. Webb served in one of the most conservative administrations in American history. Today, he has embraced the entire agenda of the Democratic Party's far-left wing.

In fairness, Mr. Webb has remained extremely consistent on some issues. One example is his disdain for women in military service. When his 1979 article "Women Can't Fight" and its impact on the treatment of women at the United States Naval Academy became a major campaign issue, Mr. Webb quickly countered with claims that when serving as Secretary of the Navy he "opened up more billets" (e.g. military specialties) to women than any of his predecessors. What he fails to note in heralding this accomplishment was that it occurred under duress.

The truth is that Sens. William Proxmire, William Cohen and John McCain had all informed Mr. Webb that legislation forcing the Navy to open more billets to women would be forthcoming if the action was not taken independently. Moreover, Maryland Rep. Beverly Byron had already introduced legislation (H.R. 3786) that would mandate just such changes. So, the expansion of opportunities for women was not the result of some epiphany, but rather an instance of Mr. Webb simply yielding to congressional pressure.

A perhaps more revealing indication of his true feelings at that time was his attempt to forestall construction of a Vietnam Women's Memorial. In 1987, the addition to the existing memorial of a statue to recognize the service of women in Vietnam had become a matter of controversy. Jim Webb, then Secretary of the Navy, contacted Interior Secretary Don Hodel, saying that as a member of the administration, he wanted to discuss the proposed change. A Hodel undersecretary, Earl Gjelde, was given the job of responding to the query.

I found out about this when Mr. Hodel, who was inclined to approve the addition, called me to ask my opinion. He also asked that I call Mr. Gjelde about Mr. Webb's call. I explained that since my mother had held ID card #1008 in the Women's Auxiliary Army Corps in World War II, and my mother-in-law had been in the nurse cadet corps, I could hardly object to recognizing the wartime service of any woman. Besides, having spent several years in military hospitals, I deeply appreciated the contribution of women in uniform, particularly nurses.

When I reached Mr. Gjelde, I understood why I had been asked to make the call. He was appalled at Mr. Webb's attitude and comments. First, Mr. Webb was incensed that Mr. Hodel had not called him back personally, arguing that since he was a service secretary, the secretary of the interior, not his deputy, should have responded. After mollifying Mr. Webb, they got to the real issue. Mr. Webb listed his reasons for opposing the change.

First, he argued, "only" (his characterization) 10,000 women served in Vietnam. Moreover, "Only" eight died. Finally, women did not serve in combat. In his typically understated fashion, Mr. Gjelde said he found the comments "inappropriate." The question on both our minds was: Where was Mr. Webb's arbitrary line? Would it be 25,000 serving? Or would it be 50,000 or 100,000? Would it require that at least 50 have been killed, or 100 or 1,000? While it was true that women did not carry rifles in the jungle, they dealt daily with the carnage that came with combat. This included broken and torn 19-, 20- and 21-year-old bodies, some of which would never again be whole. Further, the field hospitals and bases they served in were just as vulnerable to rocket attack as any other post. Perhaps in the macho world according to Jim Webb that sort of stress didn't warrant recognition, but in mine it certainly did.

Ironically, Mr. Webb often noted that his second wife, a remarkable and accomplished woman, had been a military nurse in order to refute charges that he was disdainful of women in uniform. This fact makes his opposition to the women's memorial even more revealing, and even more shameful.

Milton R. Copulos served as one of the four members of the sculpture selection panel that chose the statue added to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

Md. Senate Rivals Spar On Iraq, Abortion (MERCN)

By Kristen Wyatt

The San Jose Mercury News, October 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rivals in Maryland's closely watched Senate race sparred over Iraq, abortion and stem cell research on Sunday, with the Republican saying the war is "a mess" and states should decide abortion rights.

Michael Steele, the Republican lieutenant governor, said the situation in Iraq was not President Bush's fault and he faulted the Pentagon for poor planning.

"There's not a great deal of confidence on the ground that we can get this thing done," Steele said. "The Department of Defense did not give the president the kind of strategy to win this war." Asked where the war stood now, he replied, "I think the war in Iraq stands with a mess we have to fix."

Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin repeated his opposition to the war - he voted against authorizing the use of force - but said he opposed a deadline for withdrawal.

Cardin has said he thinks U.S. troops could be withdrawn by 2007, but said during the debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the date is a goal, not a deadline.

"I don't believe in a time schedule," Cardin said. He said some troops should come home immediately while the U.S. regroups and tries to find other countries as partners in stabilizing Iraq.

"It is reasonable to believe our troops could be out by the end of 2007," he said.

Steele and Cardin are competing for the seat left open by retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes in predominantly Democratic Maryland. Democrats must gain six seats to take control of the Senate.

A poll released Sunday by The Washington Post had Cardin leading Steele by 11 percentage points.

Steele, a conservative Catholic, would not say whether he would vote for a constitutional amendment banning abortion, saying abortion was not an issue for the federal government to decide.

"I think Roe v. Wade is a matter that should've been left up to the states," Steele said.

Cardin said abortion should remain legal and that he would have opposed the nomination of the newest Supreme Court justice, Samuel Alito. While Alito worked in the Reagan administration, he wrote a memo that said there was no constitutional right to an abortion.

The candidates also clashed on embryonic stem cell research. Steele defended his television ad in which his sister, who has multiple sclerosis, calls a Cardin ad tasteless because it airs an endorsement from actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease.

Steele repeated that he opposes funding for stem cell research that kills a human embryo and said he would like to see unused embryos at fertility clinics be used in adoptions rather than discarded.

"We could set up adoptions for those embryos," Steele said. He said embryonic stem cell research is "not fully developed" and should not be funded.

Cardin repeated his support for federal funding of the research. It holds promise for advocates of patients with a variety of illnesses because of the cells' potential to transform into any type of human tissue, perhaps leading to new treatments.

Meanwhile, Steele was questioned about whether he tries to distance himself from the president.

"I'm not running away from George Bush. I'm not running toward George Bush. I'm running for the United States Senate," Steele said.

Cardin said Congress should have investigated whether the president overstepped the law with his domestic wiretapping program. "Congress needs to exercise its oversight function," Cardin said.

An independent candidate in the race, Kevin Zeese, was not invited to the debate. The Cardin-Steele debate, their fourth meeting, may be the last before election day, though Cardin's camp said it was possible they would meet again Friday.

Debate Puts Steele On Defense (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087844

Republican Michael S. Steele struggled to soften his long-held views on touchstone social issues yesterday after being challenged repeatedly on his conservative beliefs during his final televised debate in the campaign for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat.

The debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" put on display the stark differences between Steele and Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin as they enter their final week of campaigning.

The two spent half the debate clashing on the war in Iraq -- with Steele saying the conflict "has been worth it to the extent that what we're trying to establish there is a beachhead of democracy." Cardin called it a "tragedy" and urged a gradual pullout of troops.

But the most dramatic exchanges came when host Tim Russert pressed Steele about his opposition to abortion and embryonic stem cell research, and about his long-standing support for President Bush. Such views don't typically sit well in heavily Democratic Maryland, and they have gone largely unmentioned by Steele during his year on the campaign trail.

The lieutenant governor responded by telling Russert that he would not support a constitutional amendment to ban abortion and would support research conducted on embryonic stem cells, so long as the embryo is not destroyed.

When Russert asked him, "Are you running as a proud Bush Republican?" Steele replied pointedly, "I'm a proud Republican."

This marked the first time in a series of debates that Steele has appeared on the defensive. During a televised forum last week, it was Cardin who was put on the spot about the route of Metro's proposed Purple Line and, more broadly, his knowledge of key issues in the Washington suburbs.

Cardin, a 10-term congressman from the Baltimore area, appeared nervous at times yesterday but stuck to a series of talking points about his consistent opposition to the president and the war.

Steele's answers showcased what has been a slow drift from his conservative moorings. It's a shift that in part owes to the realities of campaigning in a state where two-thirds of all voters support abortion rights and only one-third approve of President Bush's job performance, according to a Washington Post poll published yesterday.

"Steele got caught between his base and the deep blue sea," said Walter Ludwig, a Democratic consultant who advised Kweisi Mfume in the primary. "It's tough for him because he knows that if he says what he really thinks, that's not what voters of Maryland really want."

Steele acknowledged after the debate that he has undergone something of a transformation. In February, he likened embryonic stem cell research to Nazi experimentation, later apologizing for the remarks. And he campaigned fiercely for Bush in 2004.

"Have I moved off of my philosophical orientation on these issues? The answer is no," Steele said. "But I have learned to listen to the people. . . . In that sense, I have grown."

Carol Hirschburg, a GOP political consultant, said Russert's selection of such topics -- abortion and stem cell research rather than taxes or homeland security -- "were not designed to favor a Republican." She said it highlighted the difficulty Steele faces, especially when Cardin consistently tries to link him to the unpopular president. The Post poll showed Steele trailing Cardin by 11 percentage points.

"The challenge Michael faces, which I think he has handled extremely adroitly, is that he has to make the campaign about him and what kind of human being he is, and that he can be trusted by the people to do what he thinks is the right thing," Hirschburg said.

If the race were merely a contest of personalities, the Post poll shows, Steele would fare better. By 2 to 1, likely voters said they found the lieutenant governor more appealing than Cardin. Even Democrats said that was clear during the debate, with Steele appearing engaging while Cardin was sober and restrained.

When pressed, Steele tried to use humor to diffuse awkward moments, as when Russert played a clip of Steele forcefully endorsing Bush at the 2004 Republican National Convention and read news clips saying Steele was recruited to run by Bush strategist Karl Rove and Vice President Cheney.

"I've been outed," Steele said, laughing. "Okay, everybody, I'm a Republican."

Russert was undeterred, holding up a Steele bumper sticker that read, "Steele Democrat."

"That's not truth in advertising," Russert said.

"You've never heard of 'Reagan Democrats?' " Steele responded.

"It doesn't say, 'I'm a Steele Democrat.' It says 'Steele Democrat.' "

At times, Steele attempted to take on the role of moderator, directly challenging Cardin, for instance, on a vote against stem cell research. The bill would have required the National Institutes of Health to conduct the research without destroying embryos.

DOJ_NMG_0087845

In the House, all of Maryland's Democrats and Republican Wayne T. Gilchrest joined in voting against the measure. In the Senate, though, the bill was passed with the support of both of Maryland's Democrats.

"What do Senator [Paul S.] Sarbanes and Senator [Barbara A.] Mikulski not know that you know, that caused them to vote for it, and you against it?" asked Steele, who sat elbow-to-elbow with Cardin.

Cardin responded that the vote "would do nothing at all to advance embryonic stem cell research," and that the Senate backed it as part of a compromise bill.

On the same topic, Russert asked Steele whether his opposition to destroying embryos for research would extend to fertility clinics that routinely discard embryos not used in pregnancies.

"I won't close down the fertility clinics," Steele said, but would "pursue options that would allow us to look at adoption."

Among the most jarring moments came when Russert confronted Steele on contradictions from past statements.

For instance, Russert asked Steele whether he still considers Clarence Thomas a hero. Steele replied that he has disagreed with the black Supreme Court justice on a number of issues, including affirmative action.

"I strongly support affirmative action," Steele said, an assertion Russert quickly disputed.

"No, I've always supported affirmative action," Steele said sternly.

"Well, if we go back in 1991, we've got a program here called 'Affirmative Action That Doesn't Work,' 'Affirmative Action's Become a Race-Based Quota Formula,' " Russert said.

"That's -- but that's not the same as saying, 'I don't support it," Steele responded.

Russert also pressed Steele on whether he would support a constitutional amendment to outlaw abortion. At first, Steele said, "I don't think that's been proposed."

When Russert corrected him, Steele said he would not and believes laws on abortions should be left to the states.

After the debate, Steele said, "Everyone knows I'm a pro-life Roman Catholic. The idea of tinkering with the constitution goes against my sensibilities."

Douglas Stiegler, executive director of the socially conservative Family Protection Lobby, said Steele's answers did not concern him. "It sounds like he's trying not to get into that debate," Stiegler said. "From a political standpoint, I don't blame him."

Russert also pressed Cardin on abortion, asking about his vote against requiring minors to consult parents about the procedure.

"Parents should be involved in their children, absolutely," Cardin said. "The problem is you don't want it to become an obstacle, particularly where there has been family abuse. . . . You don't want it used as a way of preventing a child from getting the necessary medical attention."

Half of the one-hour show was devoted to the public's growing unease with the Iraq war.

Russert opened the show with a litany of Steele's shifting statements on the war and later asked Cardin to defend his suggestion that he would consider cutting off money for the war to force President Bush to withdraw troops.

Steele acknowledged that the war has "frustrated the American people" but said that even knowing what he knows today, "I would think we'd still prosecute the war."

Russert then presented Cardin with his own words from a newspaper article that suggested he would be willing to cut off money for troops in Iraq.

"You would vote to cut off funding for our troops while the war is going on?" Russert asked.

"No, I will never support turning our backs on our troops," Cardin said, adding that he would consider using the appropriations process to put pressure on the president to present a detailed war plan.

Steele Regrets The Race Issue Not Mentioned In Cardin Debate (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin debated yesterday on national television about the Iraq war, the Republican Party and stem-cell research, but the decisive role that black voters will play in Maryland's U.S. Senate race was not mentioned.

"I would have liked to spent a little more time on ... an attitude in this campaign, where race has come into play," Mr. Steele, a Republican, said after appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," the country's top-ranked Sunday morning political show.

Mr. Steele, who in 2002 became the first black person elected to a statewide office in Maryland, must win over black Democratic voters to overcome the Democrats' 2-to-1 advantage in registered voters. That's possible, say the state's black leaders, because Democrats have taken their vote for granted.

"Meet the Press" host Tim Russert asked pointed, detailed questions about plans for U.S. troops in Iraq, stem-cell research, abortion, judicial nominees and whether Mr. Steele was a "proud Bush Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0087846

But Mr. Russert did not ask about the prospect of black Democrats, who make up about 40 percent of the state party, crossing party lines to vote for Mr. Steele.

"I don't do horse-race questions," Mr. Russert told The Washington Times. "Black voters have the same concerns as white voters, when it comes to the war in Iraq, stem-cell research, abortion, Supreme Court."

Mr. Russert also said it was important to know "whether this was a referendum on George W. Bush, and whether Michael Steele was running away from him."

He asked Mr. Steele about "Steele Democrat" bumper stickers and whether he was "running away" from President Bush.

Mr. Steele, 48, said he was not running away from the president.

"That's exactly what Ben Cardin wants this race to be about," he said. "When this race is about Democrats and Republicans ... all they have to say is, 'The bogeyman is Republican.' "

Mr. Cardin's two-pronged campaign strategy has been to portray Mr. Steele as an ally of President Bush and to run on his record as a 10-term congressman to prove he knows how to "get things done" in Congress.

A Democratic memo last spring advised Maryland Democrats to "knock Steele down" by tying him to President Bush, turning Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Mr. Cardin's primary win over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was by a small margin because Mr. Mfume overwhelmingly won in Prince George's County and Baltimore city, where black Democrats make up most of the electorate.

The televised debate was a more favorable setting for Mr. Cardin, 63, than a debate Wednesday in which Green Party candidate Kevin B. Zeese, 51, and a free-for-all atmosphere put Mr. Cardin on the defensive.

Mr. Cardin declined to appear at a debate Thursday with Mr. Steele and Mr. Zeese before the Charles County NAACP, citing previously scheduled events.

Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin may debate one more time this Friday before the Collective Banking Group, a group of black pastors in Prince George's County.

Some Democrats thought Mr. Steele received favorable treatment from Mr. Russert.

"Russert treated you very unfairly," Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski told Mr. Cardin before a rally in Montgomery County. "He let Steele go on these monologues and he cut you off too many times, but you held your own."

On Iraq, Mr. Russert asked Mr. Steele whether he had a firm position, pointing out statements he has made that have contradicted one another.

Mr. Steele said the U.S. government should pressure the Iraqi government to take responsibility for its country. If that does not work, he said, then in 60 to 90 days, the U.S. should "evaluate whether it is ... worth sacrificing another American life for a cause that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi people do not themselves believe in."

Pulling U.S. troops out "would be on the table, absolutely," Mr. Steele said.

Mr. Russert pressed Mr. Cardin on a comment he made in the Baltimore Sun this month that he would be open to cutting off funding for U.S. troops.

Mr. Cardin said he would "never support turning our backs on our troops."

Mr. Cardin also said the war in Iraq is a civil war and "not a war on terror." He denied ever calling for a timetable to withdraw troops, though he has said "it is reasonable" to expect all U.S. troops to be out by the end of 2007.

Mr. Steele said the war "has been worth it to the extent that what we're trying to establish there is a beachhead of democracy." He also said that he would have voted to invade Iraq, even knowing all he does now.

Mr. Cardin reiterated his support for embryonic stem-cell research, while Mr. Steele again said he supports all types of stem-cell research except for embryonic.

Mr. Cardin said he has "supported" anti-cloning legislation. However, Douglas Johnson, legislative director of National Right to Life, said Mr. Cardin has twice voted against bills that would have banned cloning, in 2001 and 2003.

Mr. Russert asked Mr. Steele whether he would vote for a constitutional amendment to ban abortion, and Mr. Steele said he would not.

A Washington Post poll released yesterday showed Mr. Cardin leading Mr. Steele by 11 points. However, two polls in the last week have shown the race to be a dead heat, and the Cook Political Report on Friday switched the race from a likely Democratic retention to a tossup.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele are vying to replace retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat.

O'Malley, Party Try To Stir Base Vote (WP)

By Steve Vogel And John Wagner

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087847

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley looked at the sea of enthusiastic Democratic supporters at a Silver Spring high school yesterday and was quick to lay claim to his roots.

"It's great to be back in Montgomery County, my home county," O'Malley, who grew up in Bethesda and Rockville, said at the outset of his remarks at a rally at Montgomery Blair High School.

Both Democrats and Republicans are pouring time and resources into capturing votes in Maryland's most populous county, and any hometown claim a candidate can make cannot hurt.

With 273,234 registered Democrats in Montgomery -- more than twice the 125,534 Republicans -- it is a battle the Democrats can feel comfortable about winning. But the margin of victory will probably play a large role in determining the outcome of both O'Malley's gubernatorial race against Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and the U.S. Senate race between Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Ehrlich and Steele appeared in the county last week and say they hope to improve on their performance in 2002.

Yesterday's rally -- held before several hundred cheering and sign-waving supporters -- was part of an effort to mobilize the Democratic base and to reach out to Democratic voters who do not normally vote in non-presidential election years. O'Malley was joined by all of the statewide candidates, including Cardin, as well as a large roster of county Democrats.

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan, appearing with O'Malley for the first time since he dropped out of the Democratic primary for governor in June citing depression, was given a rousing welcome. In his remarks, Duncan criticized a new television ad for Ehrlich that includes disparaging remarks the county executive made about O'Malley before dropping out of the race.

Duncan called the ad an attempt to "mislead the public" into believing he supported Ehrlich. "If they got quotes from me about Ehrlich, you couldn't print them," Duncan added.

Ehrlich, who was shown to be trailing O'Malley by 10 percentage points in a Washington Post poll published yesterday, said his campaign was making a vigorous play for the Montgomery vote.

"People tend to look at Prince George's County and Montgomery County as places a Republican is just not going to win," Ehrlich said Thursday during a visit to a Wheaton police station, where he announced funding for programs to track sexual predators. "However, you still need to hit your targets in order to win."

Although Republicans acknowledge that it is impractical to expect to win a majority of votes in Montgomery, they want to do better than in the last election, when Ehrlich won 38.3 percent of the vote against former lieutenant governor Kathleen Kennedy Townsend (D).

"We've picked up," Ehrlich said. However, the Post poll of 1,000 likely voters yesterday showed Ehrlich with no greater support in the Washington suburbs than he had in 2002.

But Ehrlich said the endorsement he received last week from the Washington Post might help him win over voters in the Washington suburbs. The governor said his positions on the environment, education and transportation -- including the intercounty connector -- have won him support.

"Last time, it was a very tough thing," Ehrlich said. "I was a Baltimore area congressman, unknown around here, running against Bobby Kennedy's daughter in the Washington suburbs. This time, I've spent a lot of time here."

O'Malley portrayed the governor yesterday as out of touch with the Montgomery electorate, hammering Ehrlich for saying two years ago that multiculturalism is "bunk."

"Anybody who doesn't think multiculturalism is good for America, come to Montgomery County," O'Malley said.

Democrats are hoping the presence of two Montgomery candidates on the statewide ticket -- State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, the nominee for attorney general, and Del. Peter Franchot, the nominee for comptroller -- will bring out voters who will also support O'Malley and Cardin.

In an effort to blunt the impact of the Post poll, Ehrlich's campaign sent a memo to supporters via e-mail suggesting the contest was much tighter. It said the most recent survey conducted by Ehrlich's pollster found O'Malley leading Ehrlich 46 percent to 45 percent. One percent favored third-party candidates, the memo said, and 8 percent were undecided.

"We are sending this information to you because we are convinced that recent public polls have been wildly off the mark and run counter to what we have been seeing," the Ehrlich campaign e-mail said.

Meanwhile, O'Malley won the endorsement of the Baltimore Sun yesterday. The Democratic candidate also touted the results of the Post poll. In an appearance in Arbutus, Ehrlich's home town, O'Malley acknowledged that polls are only "snapshots in time."

"The nice thing about this snapshot is it's only nine days out and we're 10 points up," O'Malley said.

His comments came at an event where O'Malley won the endorsements of two former leaders of Democrats for Ehrlich, a group formed in 2002 to support the then-congressman.

"I am ashamed, embarrassed and feel very foolish for what I did," said Wayne Frazier, the group's former chairman.

Unregulated Groups Wield Millions To Sway Voters (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

— Unions, corporations and wealthy individuals have pumped nearly $300 million this year into unregulated political groups, funding dozens of aggressive and sometimes shadowy campaigns independent of party machines.

The groups, both liberal and conservative, air TV and radio spots, conduct polls, run phone banks, canvass door-to-door and stage get-out-the-vote rallies, with no oversight by the Federal Election Commission. Set up as tax-exempt "issue advocacy" committees, they cannot explicitly endorse candidates. But they can do everything short of telling voters how to mark their ballots.

Because they can accept unlimited donations from any source, the committees — known as 527s — have emerged as the favored vehicle for millionaires and interest groups seeking to set the political agenda.

"It's become the new way to do business in politics," said Pete Maysmith, a national director of Common Cause, a nonprofit that lobbies for more transparency in campaign finance.

Named for a section of the IRS code, 527s have been around for years but became a political force in 2004 after the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 — also known as the McCain--Feingold Bill — limited donations to political parties. Groups such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth on the right and America Coming Together on the left contributed $600 million that year, with a heavy focus on the presidential race.

The cash flow is lower this year because it's a midterm campaign, but 527s and a related type of organization known as 501(c)s have expanded their reach. With the Nov. 7 election days away, the groups are flooding the airwaves in state and local races as well as congressional contests.

By far the largest chunk of unregulated money — nearly $60 million — comes straight out of union treasuries and is used mostly to benefit Democratic candidates and causes. Conservatives are fighting back with multimillion-dollar donations from a California TV executive and the Texas developer who financed the Swift Boat ads.

In California, unregulated funds — mostly donated by New York developer Howard S. Rich — are bankrolling the campaign for Proposition 90, which would limit the government's ability to seize private property. In Missouri, such money paid for a celebrity-studded TV ad opposing a ballot initiative on stem-cell research.

In Ohio, a 527 has run some of the most provocative radio spots of the campaign season, with an African American announcer accusing Democrats of "decimating our people" by promoting abortions of "black babies." Another group funded by black Republicans has bought airtime on radio stations in Maryland and Florida to assert that Democrats "have bamboozled blacks" and want to keep them in poverty.

'Yeah, right'

Here in eastern Colorado, a 527 called Coloradans for Life has raised more than $1 million to oppose Republican Rep. Marilyn N. Musgrave — spending nearly as much on the race as the Democratic candidate. A radio ad championing "the unborn" gave many voters the impression the group was an anti-abortion organization attacking Musgrave from the right. In fact, it's funded by three millionaire liberals.

At a recent reception for rural Republicans, chiropractor Philip Pollock rushed up to Musgrave to complain about what he called the "underhanded, back-door" tactic.

"I just heard those ads. Coloradans for Life — totally ridiculous," he said. "What happened to ... campaign finance reform?"

"You mean getting the big money out of politics?" Musgrave asked.

Pollock shook his head in disgust. "Yeah, right."

The campaign finance reforms that took effect for 2004 limit individuals to about $100,000 in total contributions to all candidates, parties and political action committees per election cycle. Parties and PACs remain extremely influential. PACs, for instance, are expected to funnel more than $1 billion to candidates this year by bundling contributions from trial lawyers, beer wholesalers, pharmaceutical makers and other groups.

But more than 70 individuals have maxed out their PAC and party contributions; If they want to pump more cash into the election, they must donate to 527s and 501(c)s. Many prefer that approach because they can control how the money is used.

The 501(c) groups do not have to disclose donors or itemize spending. The 527s must report donors and expenses, but the groups are often ephemeral, forming under a generic name for a few months and then dissolving. That makes it all but impossible to sort through IRS filings and pick out which organizations will get involved in which races. By law, these groups cannot coordinate their activity with candidates.

"The first warning you have is often when you see their ad on TV," said Robert Duffy, a political scientist at Colorado State University who tracks the groups. "These 527s throw a whole lot of unpredictability into campaigns."

DOJ_NMG_0087849

In 2004, Democrats dominated 527 fundraising, led by financier George Soros and insurance magnate Peter B. Lewis, who each contributed more than $23 million. This year, Soros and others are focused instead on long-term party-building efforts, such as strengthening liberal think tanks and building a national voter database.

Two Republicans now top the donors' list compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonprofit research firm based in Washington.

Homebuilder Bob Perry, who financed the Swift Boat ads, has pumped $5 million into TV ads attacking Democratic congressional incumbents in Georgia, Iowa and Oregon as tax-and-spend liberals. GOP backer A. Jerrold Perenchio, who owns the Spanish-language television network Univision, has spent $5 million on ads in Missouri and Ohio featuring images of terrorism and warnings about those who would "cut and run" in Iraq.

Here in Colorado, the 527 targeting Musgrave is funded by siblings Patricia Stryker and Jon L. Stryker, billionaire heirs to a medical-supply fortune, and by Tim Gill, a software developer.

They bankrolled a similar effort in 2004, with TV ads that portrayed Musgrave picking soldiers' pockets as an announcer accused her of voting to cut veterans' benefits.

Their TV campaign this year has been far less dramatic but still controversial, accusing Musgrave of cutting a program that protects clean drinking water. In fact, Musgrave did not vote on that issue, though she has cast other votes that environmentalists say would weaken water protection.

Thanks, but no thanks

Musgrave's Democratic challenger, Angie Paccione, watched the water ad with a sinking heart. Like many candidates, she regards 527s as a mixed blessing. The independent group has undoubtedly given her campaign a boost; when the national Democratic Party canceled $630,000 worth of TV ads in the district, Patricia Stryker wrote a check for $720,000 to keep anti-Musgrave spots on the air.

But Paccione has no control over the message. Attacks such as the pickpocket dramatization could alienate voters. She considers ads like the one on water a waste of money.

"Clean drinking water?" Paccione said. "Holy smokes! There's a litany of things you could do against Marilyn Musgrave. Clean drinking water is not one of them."

Paccione's own ads portray Musgrave as a conservative ideologue.

A lawsuit pending in federal court aims to rein in 527 activity. But political analysts say they don't expect much to change, even if the case succeeds.

"Political money is like water. It will find an outlet," said Jeffrey M. Berry, a political science professor at Tufts University. "If 527s are banned, will another vehicle pop up? Absolutely."

Party Chiefs Debate Voter Motivation (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

Democratic and Republican party leaders continue to debate which issues -- and scandals -- will drive voters to the polls next week for midterm elections.

"I think that there will be different issues in different districts," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation." "There are two kinds of overriding issues that seem to be applying in most districts, and one is the question of whether Americans want to see their taxes go up. ... The other question is, 'What do we do in the war on terror?' "

During his own CBS appearance, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said his party would not raise taxes on all Americans and promised to fight a "smarter" war on terrorism.

"We have no intention of raising taxes except on the people who have got enormous tax breaks, like the oil companies, from the Republicans," Mr. Dean said. "We need a minimum wage [increase]. America needs a raise. The Congress has gotten their raises, but the American people haven't gotten theirs."

Mr. Dean denied Republican accusations that his party would try to impeach President Bush if it wins control of Congress.

"I think that is also a scare tactic," he said.

Meanwhile, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said he doesn't think the Mark Foley congressional page scandal will hurt Republicans at the ballot box.

"The House ethics committee is doing a very good investigation in a bipartisan way. I was happy to meet with them, and I believe that they'll have a report coming soon," the Ohio Republican said on ABC's "This Week." "What the American people want to know is who is going to take care of them when it comes to lowering their taxes, securing our borders and providing the president with the tools to fight the terrorists?"

DOJ_NMG_0087850

Mr. Boehner acknowledged that Iraq is a prominent issue but said it won't work in the Democrats' favor. "We don't have a national election. And all these big national polls that show the trends don't mean anything because what we have are 435 individual races all around the country, local candidates running on local issues."

The two sides also debated the motives behind a campaign advertisement run in the U.S. Senate race in Tennessee. Critics said the ad, run against Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a black Democrat, has racist overtones. The ad was pulled after criticism from both parties.

"The ad that you are talking about is an ad that is being run independently of the Republican National Committee," Mr. Mehlman said.

Mr. Ford told "Fox News Sunday" that he thinks the ad is racist and is glad it was pulled. "I think it was smut. I don't think race had anything to do with that ad," he said. "The party of family values should not have run that in Tennessee, or anywhere for that matter."

The System's Broken (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

Greencastle, Ind.

The middle-aged woman filling her gas tank on a day of endless rain laughed when a reporter asked her about the coming elections. "Politics," she said, "are for silly people. Those ads come on television and I reach for the remote."

I asked if she was planning to vote on Nov. 7.

"No," she said. "That stuff really turns me off."

If you pay close attention to the news and then go out and talk to ordinary people, it's hard not to come away with the feeling that the system of politics and government in the U.S. is broken. I spent the past week talking to residents in Chicago, southern Michigan and Indiana. No one was happy about the direction the country has taken, but not even the most faithful voters were confident that their ballot would make any substantial difference.

"I vote," said Angela Buehl, who lives in a suburb of Indianapolis, "but I don't think anybody in Washington is listening to me." She mimicked talking into a telephone: "Hello ... Hello ...?"

The politicians, special interests and the media are in a state of high excitement over next week's midterm elections. They are addicted to the blood sport of politics, and this is a championship encounter. But that excitement contrasts with what seems to be an increasing sense of disenchantment and unease that ordinary Americans are feeling when it comes to national politics and government. For far too many of them, the government in Washington is remote, unresponsive and ineffective.

Voters and nonvoters alike expressed frustration with the fact that we are stuck in a war in Iraq that hardly anyone still supports but no one in government knows how to end.

Several people mentioned that their families were struggling financially at a time when the stock market had soared to all-time highs and the Bush administration was crowing about how well the economy was doing.

Nearly all said they were repelled by the relentless barrage of tasteless and idiotic campaign commercials. "Talk to me," said a woman in Mishawaka, Ind. "Don't assume I'm an imbecile."

A pair of front-page articles in The Times last week showed the stark contrast in the way that insiders and outsiders view the off-year elections. Corporations, reacting to the possibility that the Republicans might lose control of one or both houses of Congress, are hedging their bets by pumping up campaign donations to Democratic candidates. One way or another, they will be in the loop. That story ran on Saturday.

A day earlier, The Times reported on Democratic concerns that black voters, disillusioned by voter suppression efforts and a pervasive belief that their votes will not be properly counted, may not turn out in the numbers that the party was hoping for.

The system is broken. Most politicians would rather sacrifice their first born than tell voters the honest truth about tough issues. Big money and gerrymandering have placed government out of the reach of most Americans. While some changes in the House are expected this year, the Brookings Institution and the Cato Institute tell us (in a joint report) that since 1998, House incumbents have won more than 98 percent of their re-election races.

Millions of thoughtful Americans have become so estranged from the political process that they've tuned out entirely. Voters hungry for a serious discussion of complex issues are fed a steady diet of ideological talking heads hurling insults in one- or two-minute television segments.

DePauw University held a two-day conference last week on issues confronting the U.S. I was struck by the extent to which the people who attended the forums were interested in seeking out practical, nonpartisan, nonideological solutions to the wide range of problems discussed.

The frustration with the current state of government and politics was palpable. One man, Ned Lamkin, asked me if it wouldn't be a good idea to create some sort of national forum for a serious extended discussion of ways to fix, or at least improve, the system. He's on to something. Among other things, I'd love to see a nonpartisan series of high-profile, nationally televised town hall meetings that would explore ways of making government and politics fairer, more open and more responsive to the will of the people.

American-style democracy needs to be energized, revitalized. The people currently in charge are not up to the task. It's time to bring the intelligence, creativity and energy of the broader population into the quest for constructive change.

The Decline Of Trust (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

In 1995 Francis Fukuyama came out with a book called "Trust," in which he argued that a society's capacity for cooperation underpins its prosperity. The same year, Robert Putnam's famous article, "Bowling Alone," lamented that the United States was depleting its stock of precious social capital. The question of trust -- in government and also in communities -- preoccupied politicians too. "It Takes a Village," Hillary Rodham Clinton urged in the title of her 1996 book, which became a best seller.

You don't hear much about trust these days. Instead, we want accountability.

You see this most viciously in politics. In the mid-term campaigns, nobody has time for trust. The name of the game is to hold opponents accountable by attacking their records -- for failings real or imagined. If the Democrats capture one or both chambers, it will be largely because they promise to hold the president accountable.

This reflects a shift somewhere around 2003 or 2004. In the 1990s, after academics and pundits began talking about trust, the nation did actually become more trusting. The share of Americans saying they trust government "most of the time" or "just about always" rose from 21 percent in 1994 to 56 percent in 2002. Equally, elections became less abrasively focused on accountability. In 2000, according to John Geer of Vanderbilt University, a relatively low 40 percent of the messages in presidential TV spots were negative, down from 47 percent four years earlier.

But some time after the Iraq invasion, these trends reversed. In 2004 the share of Americans saying they trusted government fell to 47 percent, and this month a CBS News-New York Times poll put it at a rock-bottom 28 percent. Meanwhile Geer's measures show that in the 2004 election negative messages jumped to 50 percent of the total, and he guesses that this year's congressional races are the most negative in history.

There's been a similar change in corporate America. In the late 1990s, the new thing for corporate managers was to trust ordinary employees. Company hierarchies were flattened so that people in the middle could demonstrate initiative rather than suffocating under bureaucratic controls. In 1999, the Harvard Business Review reported that 30,000 articles on trusting and empowering middle managers had appeared in the business press over the previous four years.

That paradigm ended in 2002 with Enron, WorldCom and dozens of lesser corporate scandals. Suddenly nobody wanted to trust managers; they wanted to audit them. Instead of the era of management empowerment, we entered the era of mandatory online ethics training. Meanwhile private-equity firms are raising record sums to take over companies on the premise that incumbent managers need to be kicked rather than trusted.

What to make of this shift? Holding people accountable is a good thing:

This season's negative campaigning

can be seen (admittedly, with many despicable exceptions) as a healthy reaction to poor congressional performance. Equally, the 2002 scandals justified the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms of corporate governance. There are reasons we hold teachers accountable for failing schools and put travelers through metal detectors.

But trust, when not abused, is nonetheless an asset. Accountants, lawyers and online training sessions impose costs on businesses; it would be cheaper to trust people if that were possible. Likewise, as Marc Hetherington of Vanderbilt University has demonstrated, government is constrained if nobody trusts it. The Great Society programs were possible because Americans trusted government in the 1960s; the creation of the Medicare prescription drug program arguably reflected the peaking of trust in government in 2003. But Bill Clinton's health care reform was thwarted in the low-trust early 1990s, and nobody now trusts government to modernize entitlements. Meanwhile President Bush had enormous foreign policy momentum in 2002-03 because Americans trusted him. Thanks to the Iraq mess, Americans are now focused on holding Bush accountable, and his options are limited.

There are powerful reasons trust tends to decline and accountability advances. Mobile societies tend to have weak bonds; the Internet makes it easier to hold people accountable and encourages acerbic negativity. And the absence of trust can feed on itself. Leaders function under stifling oversight; this causes them to perform sluggishly, so trust continues to stagnate. But occasionally there is a chance to escape this trap: A shock causes trust to rise, leaders have a chance to lead and there's an opportunity to boost trust still further.

We've recently had a double opportunity. The boom of the 1990s boosted trust in business; the 2001 terrorist attacks boosted trust in government. But CEOs and politicians abused these gifts with scandals and incompetence. Such is the cost of corporate malfeasance and the Iraq war: Precious social capital is destroyed by leaders' avarice and hubris.

Out Of Work In Michigan? Wyoming Wants You. (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 30, 2006

WRIGHT, WYO.

When Zeb and Sharon Goodrich look out their front door these days, they see antelope, sweeping treeless plains, and dozens of jack rabbits - a far cry from the view at their previous home in Lake Odessa, Mich.

"I miss the trees," Mr. Goodrich admits. "I was in shock when I [saw] how many trees there weren't." On the other hand, he likes that "you feel like you have room to breathe."

More important: He has good work, and lots of it.

Goodrich's job as a welder for a mine- services company pays far better than the welding he was doing back in Michigan, especially when he factors in the opportunity for overtime. And unlike the jobs in Michigan, it's not in danger of disappearing any time soon.

The Goodriches are at the vanguard of a small, new migration westward. As a result of aggressive recruiting on the part of job-rich and labor-poor Wyoming - and their family's willingness to leave roots and relatives behind in search of a more secure future - Zeb, Sharon, and their two young boys moved more than 1,000 miles this spring to a region in the throes of an oil, gas, and coal boom.

Employers in Wyoming are hoping that many more follow. For nearly a year, several county economic development councils and companies have targeted Michigan, with its large pool of skilled blue-collar labor and dwindling jobs, to try and fill the state's thousands of job openings. They've conducted three job fairs and placed a huge billboard outside Flint, Mich: "Live and Work in Wyoming!" And they're having some success.

"The Michigan folks are really fitting in," says Ruth Benson, director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corporation, just back from a recent recruiting trip.

Few of the Michiganders who move let Ms. Benson know they've done so, but she knows of at least 65 who have moved to her county in recent months, and hears of many more. Her county's website, www.jobswyoming.net, has been getting thousands of hits. "It's not for everyone," she says of the move, "but it's good for some."

Campbell County - which produces more than 35 percent of the coal used for the nation's electricity - is filled with evidence of the boom. Lines of trucks and cars - especially at shift changes - wind through roads in an otherwise barren landscape. Gas wells dot scrubland near the highway. Houses are going up all over.

Unemployment in the county is 1.7 percent - compared with 3.6 percent in the state and 7.1 percent in Michigan. And the mineral industry has given Wyoming a budget surplus of nearly $2 billion - evidence of which is seen in the new schools, civic centers, and infrastructure springing up.

In tiny Wright, for instance, where the Goodriches live, the population of 1,500 has four or five new playgrounds, a stocked fishing pond for kids, a new library, and a recreation center with an indoor pool.

"They're not burning the desk to heat the school," Zeb says with a laugh.

Such a boom has a downside too, though, as many families learn when they try to find a place to live - especially if they also need to sell a home in a depressed market like Michigan's.

The growing population has sent housing prices soaring, and many newcomers have to wait months just to find a place that's available. Motels are filled with laborers, and many companies need to offer temporary housing to lure workers. The lower-paying service sector has also had a hard time finding and keeping workers, with so many better-paying jobs available.

Benson is hoping that once the county is able to lure more skilled workers for the high-paying energy-related jobs, their "trailing spouses" will follow, and hopefully fill some of the many service and part-time positions. Sharon, for instance, has already bought a day-care center in Wright, which serves 51 kids.

She's enjoying her work, especially since it keeps her with 4-year-old Zeb Jr. and 3-year-old Jacob.

But the main change for the better has been for her husband. Back in Michigan, Zeb was doing welding on water heaters, bored by the monotonous work and making some $30,000 to $40,000 a year. Now, he works at P&H MinePro Services, repairing and building the massive coal mining equipment. The only thing that keeps him from overtime is the need to spend time with his family, and he loves the work - even when it means 14-hour nighttime shifts.

DOJ_NMG_0087853

"I call my friends and ask how their job is, and then say, 'Oh, I worked on the world's largest electric shovel last night,' " he says, grinning. "It's not hard to make six figures here if you don't mind working."

He remembers an ethanol plant back in Michigan that got 10,000 applications for 35 jobs. Here, he jokes, "you've got 35 people applying for the 10,000 jobs."

Still, despite his best efforts, none of his friends have followed him. And even Benson admits it can be an uphill struggle to get people to leave their extended families to come to an area they may never have heard of.

When she and officials in several other counties first realized what a labor shortage they had, they tried recruiting from Texas and the Gulf states, encouraging those displaced by hurricane Katrina to move to Wyoming.

"It was late fall, and they'd call and ask about the weather and all but hang up on you," she remembers.

Michigan, with its own tough winters and outdoorsman culture, has been a better fit, but it's still a challenge. Also, the area's employers don't want just any workers - they need heavy equipment operators, electricians, welders, mechanics, and other skilled laborers.

The growing population, though, is creating some need for a few other professions too. Richard Andriaens, Gillette's chief of police, moved here from Royal Oak, Mich., nearly two years ago. Budget cuts forced him to take an early retirement from the police department there, and as he scanned Michigan for police chief openings, he happened across an advertisement for Gillette, Campbell County's largest town.

"I thought, if we're going to move an hour, why not 20 hours?" he remembers. Since then, he's brought three more Michiganders to the department, and is going back on another recruiting trip in November.

The lack of shopping has been a bit tough for his wife, but mostly he says it's been a welcome change.

"I used to commute to work with half the number of people in this entire state," he says. His oldest son shot his first antelope and mule deer a few weeks ago, and his other three kids have all adapted quickly. "The best kept secret out here is the weather," he laughs.

As with the Goodriches, Chief Andriaens says the hardest part has been being away from family, but he's never looked back.

"I'm from a blue-collar family, and the blue-collar orientation makes you set strong roots," he says. "But if you have even a little bit of an entrepreneurial spirit, then the opportunities here are just incredible."

Fewer Teens Are Giving Birth, But Cost To Taxpayers Still Steep (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 30, 2006

Teen childbearing has declined sharply since the early 1990s but remains costly to U.S. taxpayers, incurring a tab of least $9.1 billion in 2004, according to a report released today.

The children of teen mothers have higher health care, foster care and incarceration costs than those of older parents, says the report commissioned by the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, a non-profit advocacy group. Like their parents, they earn less as adults and pay less in taxes.

“It's important to remind people the problems are very serious and expensive,” says Sarah Brown, the group's director. She welcomes a one-third decline from 62 births per 1,000 teen girls in 1991 to 41 births in 2004. She attributes the drop to social changes that have led teens to use contraception or abstain from sex.

The abortion rate dropped even more, from 37 abortions per 1,000 teen girls in 1991 to 22 in 2002, the last year for which figures are available, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a non-profit organization that studies sexual and reproductive health policy.

Still, Brown says, the teen birth rate is four to five times the rate in much of Europe and more than twice that of Canada. “We can't let this nation think everything's been done,” she says, noting the rate of decline has slowed.

The report, By the Numbers: The Public Costs of Teen Childbearing, looks only at costs clearly linked to a teen birth rather than associated risks such as poverty. Written by Saul Hoffman, an economics professor at the University of Delaware, it is based largely on 2004 data that have not been publicized.

Most of the costs in 2004 — $8.6 billion — were incurred by mothers 17 and younger. Compared with women who have a first child at 20 or 21, those girls are more than twice as likely to have a child placed in foster care, to be reported for child abuse or neglect, and to have a son sent to prison. Their kids are far more likely to drop out of high school and their daughters to become teen mothers themselves, the report states.

“Teen birth rates drive a lot of negative social indicators,” says Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Health and Human Services Department.

DOJ_NMG_0087854

The report says the 2004 costs of teen childbearing include $1.9 billion for health care, $2.3 billion for child welfare, $2.1 billion for incarceration and $2.9 billion in lower tax revenue. That federal, state and local tab is offset slightly by family support for younger teens. The cost to government averages $1,430 per child per year.

The price tag varies by state, depending on the number of births and benefit levels, from $12 million in Vermont to $1 billion in Texas.

Teen birth rates generally have fallen since 1957 but rose in the late 1980s. The subsequent drop saved taxpayers an estimated $6.7 billion nationally in 2004, the report says. The savings ranged from more than $1 billion in California to $5 million in Wyoming.

The report updates a 1996 study on the costs of teen childbearing but is the first to provide state-by-state costs.

A Case For Strengthening Marriage (WP)

By Leah Ward Sears

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

For the first time in history, less than half of U.S. households are headed by married couples. And on Sept. 29, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released data showing that almost 36 percent of all births are the result of unmarried childbearing, the highest percentage ever recorded.

In family law, as in the rest of American society, there is an intensifying debate about how we should respond to this kind of news. Should law and society actively seek new ways to support marriage? Or should family law strive to be marriage-neutral by providing more rights and benefits to its alternatives, such as cohabitation and single parenthood?

Some family law experts argue that our most pressing need is to find ways to equally support a wide variety of family forms. For example, the respected American Law Institute, an organization of judges, lawyers and legal scholars that periodically drafts model laws and other proposals for legal reform, has proposed a new set of laws that promotes this "family diversity model." In "Principles of the Law of Family Dissolution," some ALI scholars argue that family law should focus less on trying to channel people into marriage and more on being "fair" to people in different relationships -- in other words, that it should take families as it finds them.

I am not a law professor. But from where I sit as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia, a family law that fails to encourage marriage ignores the fact that marriage has long been associated with an impressively broad array of positive outcomes for children and adults alike. Experts who contend that we need to move "beyond marriage" say they are only responding to the facts. But here is one major fact: High rates of family fragmentation hurt children.

For example, studies have consistently shown that children raised outside marriage suffer disproportionately from physical and mental illness; are more likely to drop out of school, abuse drugs or alcohol, and engage in violence or suffer it in their homes; and are less likely to attend college. Child Trends, a nonpartisan research organization summed up the evidence in 2002: "Children in single-parent families, children born to unmarried mothers, and children in step-families or cohabiting relationships face higher risks of poor outcomes."

Of course, many hard-working single parents do an excellent job of raising children, and they need our support, too. But I believe that building a healthy marriage culture in America is a legitimate concern for family law.

I am not alone. For example, "Reconceiving the Family," a new book published by Cambridge University Press critiquing the ALI's "principles," has contributions from 27 family law scholars, including two other state supreme court chief justices. The Institute for American Values recently published a statement, signed by many legal and family scholars, that concluded that "a prime goal of family law should be to identify new ways to support marriage as a social institution so that each year more children are protected by being raised within the marital unions of their parents." Moreover, the supreme court in my state just established a Commission on Children, Marriage and Family Law with an important goal: to find ways to reduce unnecessary divorce and unmarried childbearing.

Why are state judges such as myself so concerned about strengthening marriage? Start with the basics: Fragmenting families are flooding our court dockets. Since I became a trial judge in 1989, the percentage of domestic relations cases has risen sharply; they now account for 65 percent of all cases in Georgia at the Superior Court level. Last year more than 14,000 children were in the care of the Georgia Division of Family and Children Services, and nearly 24,000 were admitted to a youth detention center. One out of every four Georgia children under 18 has a case with the Office of Child Support Enforcement.

These figures are typical of what is happening in every state. For judges, they represent a difficult workload. For families, they represent an astonishing level of necessary but intrusive government oversight. For government, they represent a mountain of resources that could be used for other purposes. For children, they are a tragedy.

As a judge I am often frustrated that I must work within a system designed only to pick up the pieces after families have already fallen apart or failed to come together. We must work to prevent family fragmentation, because the consequences for children and society are severe.

If we look for solutions, we will find them. What we do not yet know how to accomplish, we can learn. Americans believe that problems, no matter how difficult, should be addressed and not merely endured. Whether it is racism, crime or poverty, Americans believe that we can find ways to make a difference. Accepting the decline of marriage as inevitable means giving up on far too many of our children. They deserve better than that.

Supply Side The Sanford Model By STEPHEN MOORE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

Just when you thought that there weren't any small-government conservatives left in the Republican Party, along comes South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who may be the only politician in America this year under assault for governing as a fiscal tightwad. What's really unusual about Mr. Sanford's bid for re-election is that some of his most formidable adversaries are the old bull politicians in his own party.

The state's Republican Senate Finance Committee chairman Verne Smith, for example, has just cut a campaign ad for Tommy Moore, the Democrat running against the governor. The ad slams Mr. Sanford for his attempts to squeeze too much grease from the state budget. Mr. Smith has evidently never forgiven him for dramatizing the legislature's overspending by holding a press conference inside the state Capitol in Columbia with two squealing pigs: one named "Pork" and the other "Barrel."

"Hey, it worked," Mr. Sanford says unapologetically of this stunt, which attracted nationwide attention. The legislature went back and cut $16 million in earmarks. He has vetoed hundreds of spending bills, including the entire budget in 2004 and 2006 -- although almost all of these vetoes were overridden by -- who else? -- the state Republican House and Senate. "If I weren't fighting the legislature on overspending, I wouldn't be doing my job," he says about this intraparty squabbling. Then he adds: "Frankly, I wish there were more of this budget strife in Washington." Words for George W. Bush to live by.

Despite the turmoil Mr. Sanford has stirred up during the past four years, he's racked up some pretty impressive accomplishments. Though his effort to phase out the state income tax was killed in the senate, he chopped the personal income tax rate on small businesses, to 5% from 7%, for the first time in South Carolina history. He took a state that was labeled a "judicial hell hole" and passed reforms, despised by trial lawyers, that will penalize frivolous lawsuits. He even cut the average wait time to get a driver's license renewal to 15 minutes from over an hour.

Mr. Sanford's real passion is school reform -- which is urgently needed in a state that ranks 48th, 49th or 50th in almost all measures of student performance. He openly ridicules the "failed monopoly" school system and for this the left has accused him of being virulently anti-public education (although school spending rose 20% in his first term). He also persuaded the legislature to approve charter schools and a private school tax credit bill -- and might have gotten more done if it weren't for his prickly personality.

This is the lingering complaint about Mr. Sanford (which he readily concedes): He "doesn't play in the sandbox well with others." Even some of the governor's first-term supporters, who at first liked the idea that this former three-term congressman would shake up the stuffy political establishment in Columbia, have come to regard Mr. Sanford as too abrasive and self-righteous.

Just last week South Carolina's largest newspaper, The State -- which endorsed him four years ago -- published a scathing denunciation charging among other things that the governor "doesn't want government to be more effective as much as he wants it to be cheaper," and that his first term has been all about "tax cuts and privatizing everything he could -- even the schools." The fiercest indictment: "He had run as a conservative . . . but [is] as close to an ideologically pure libertarian as you can get." Egads!

But with qualifications like his, it is no wonder that a number of leading conservatives across the country, disgusted with GOP gorging on pork and deficit spending, are looking at Mr. Sanford as a potentially attractive new entrant into the 2008 presidential race.

First, however, there is the little matter of re-election. Opponent Tommy Moore -- a man who boasts that he has spent half his life (28 years) in the state legislature -- is predictably attacking the governor for slashing vital services like education. Mr. Sanford is certainly vulnerable to the Democratic tide that could oust many GOP incumbents next week, but he remains admired by most voters. The latest Clemson University poll has him leading the race 58% to 31%.

Those good numbers may seem surprising, given the budget wars in Columbia and the drubbing he has taken from the media for being so aggravatingly uncompromising. But Mr. Sanford has a gift for turning liberal complaints against him into virtues with voters. After Time magazine rated him one of the three worst governors in America, Mr. Sanford openly scoffed. "All the top grades went to the tax and spenders," he laughs. "Believe me, I'm never going to win that kind of beauty contest, nor do I want to." He points out that in the same issue Time rated Ted Kennedy one of the top 10 senators in America. In South Carolina, that's enough said.

Mr. Sanford is still criticized to this day for the piggies stunt -- the House speaker claimed that he "defiled" the state capital -- but the governor says the voters have a different attitude. Breaking into a pronounced Southern drawl he says: "They tell me: 'You go bring some more pigs up there, governor. We're tired of the way they're spending our money.'"

That's the way many conservative Americans feel about Washington these days -- and why Republicans may fare so poorly next Tuesday. Political commentators such as the Washington Post's David Broder may write glowingly about how California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has discovered the new formula for GOP governance: Toss aside ideology and sprint to the 50-yardline. But the Sanford model -- holding firm on limited government principles -- is a far more compelling lesson for how Republicans can recapture the good graces of their conservative voting base.

Big-Name Anger On Behalf Of The Little Guy (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

WAR ON THE MIDDLE CLASS

How the Government, Big Business, and Special Interest Groups Are Waging War on the American Dream and How to Fight Back

By Lou Dobbs

Viking, 251 pp., $24.95

Lou Dobbs is one of the professional angry men of cable television news.

The host of CNN's "Lou Dobbs Tonight" has carved a niche as a self-styled former Republican who refuses to sit by while big corporations, Congress and the Bush administration repeatedly take aim at the little guy in America.

On his show and in his book, "War on the Middle Class," the financial reporter-turned-pundit rails against "elites," globalization, illegal immigrants, the outsourcing of U.S. jobs, lobbyists, politicians, health-care costs and exorbitant CEO pay.

"I can't take seriously anyone who takes either the Republican Party or Democratic Party seriously," writes Dobbs, 61, "in part, because neither party takes you and me seriously; in part, because both are bought and paid for by corporate America and special interests. And neither party gives a damn about the middle class."

Dobbs sees an America with failing public schools, increasingly unaffordable health care, timid news media, politicians who serve the interests of lobbyists and corporations, and big companies that pay executives far too much while laying off workers and sending their jobs overseas in pursuit of cheap labor. And don't get him started on the "dysfunctional" federal government's failure to stop the entry into the country of illegal immigrants, whom he views as a threat to American culture, security and wages.

Dobbs details his displeasure in 12 easily digested chapters, each taking on a different subject but all replete with overheated prose.

"Each night, as I conclude my nightly broadcast on CNN, I have the gut-sick feeling that we have chronicled another twenty-four hours in the decline of our great democratic republic and the bankrupting of our free enterprise economy," he writes in a typical passage.

Still, millions of Americans share his anger, and it is not hard to see why. From 1992 to 2004, average pay for corporate chief executive officers rose from $1.8 million a year to $9.6 million. The heads of some bankrupt companies continue to collect millions of dollars in compensation even as workers are sent packing. Big businesses and other organizations spent $2.14 billion -- more than $5.8 million a day -- lobbying Congress and federal agencies in 2004. Ordinary Americans would be forgiven for suspecting that most of those efforts were not to benefit them.

The United States has lost millions of manufacturing jobs in recent decades. Increasingly, companies are shedding U.S.-based software programmers, call-center employees, aircraft maintenance personnel and accountants and replacing them with cheaper labor in countries such as India. Corporate profits have nearly doubled since 2000, while U.S. workers have seen little or no increase in real wages, their pension plans have disappeared, and employers have shifted health-care costs to them.

"[H]ow prosperous a nation are we when working Americans aren't being allowed to share equally in what we glibly call 'prosperity?' " Dobbs asks.

The book is well packaged but does not break new ground. The outrages Dobbs chronicles, such as the influence-peddling of lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the nominal relocations overseas by U.S. companies seeking to evade taxes, have been well documented in the same media that Dobbs complain have "turned away from the hard work and expense of fact-finding and investigation to the reporting of what is easy and convenient."

Speaking of easy and convenient, Dobbs seems to have done no new interviewing and instead quotes most of the people in his book straight from their appearances on his show. Even the book's title is a rip-off of the name of an ongoing series on his broadcast, making it essentially an exercise in brand extension. The inclusion of the full texts of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution may be patriotic, but they also add bulk to what otherwise would be a modest volume of 212 pages.

There are a few sloppy errors: "California congresswoman Dana Rorhbacher," a Republican, is, in fact, a man whose last name is spelled "Rohrabacher." Democratic Sen. Byron L. Dorgan is from North Dakota, not North Carolina. And Dobbs's critique of national media organizations as being out of touch with Middle America because they are headquartered in New York and Washington falls flat coming from a man whose television show is based in New York.

Like many pundits, Dobbs is better at identifying problems than at solving them. Urging people to be more engaged in the political process and to vote the bums out is a sensible suggestion, if not a novel one. But if voters drop their party affiliations and register as independents, as he recommends -- and has done himself -- the result will be major-party candidates more tied to the views of the hard-core primary voters who remain.

Dobbs proposes "complete public financing" of federal elections, an idea that would not curtail outside political spending by people such as billionaire George Soros and groups such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. Dobbs would make members of Congress wait five years to become lobbyists, rather than the current one year. But earlier he points out that such waiting periods do not work because former politicians immediately land lucrative jobs advising big firms on lobbying matters anyway.

Dobbs advocates inspecting every cargo container bound for the United States, rather than the 5 percent currently examined, a sound idea from a security standpoint but a policy so logistically difficult and costly that it would probably bring ports to a standstill.

Dobbs would fine employers $50,000 for every illegal immigrant they hire. He would establish a national core curriculum and standards for classroom size and teacher pay, effectively removing schools from the control of the local and state officials -- and taxpayers -- who provide most of the funding.

"No one will give us our country back, not without a fight," he writes.

Dobbs, a well-compensated television personality, is not a member of the middle class that he defends so vigorously. He has the kind of national profile that led his publisher to put his face on the book's cover to sell more copies. While outsourcing, illegal immigration and high CEO pay may be bad for the middle class, they have been pretty good for Lou Dobbs's career.

For Congress In Virginia (WP)

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

AFTER SIX terms in Congress representing Northern Virginia's 11th District, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III , a one-man political whirlwind, is a force to be reckoned with. Energetic, practical and astute, he is a deal-maker's deal-maker who has used his considerable clout as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee to good effect.

One example is his bill to give the District of Columbia's delegate in Congress full voting rights -- a proposal that would, at last, enfranchise the District's mostly Democratic residents while placating the GOP by adding a second new congressional seat for mostly Republican Utah. Another example is his important proposal to ensure Metro's future with $1.5 billion in federal funding over a decade -- a fat carrot conditioned on Maryland, Virginia and the District together dedicating an equal amount to the transit system. The bill, which still faces hurdles in the Senate, is a smart and creative bit of legislating.

Mr. Davis is a partisan Republican but also a moderate and a pragmatist who knows how to strike deals with Democrats. That alone makes him part of a small fraternity and an important one for a congressional district that is itself politically moderate -- and increasingly Democratic.

His Democratic opponent, Andrew Hurst, is a thoughtful, articulate lawyer. He has bruised Mr. Davis by spotlighting his partisanship and fundraising -- voting with the Bush administration the great majority of the time and sharing his own campaign cash with right-wing Republican candidates for Congress elsewhere. However, Mr. Hurst, whose own local civic involvement has been slight, concedes he is no match for the incumbent on local issues.

In Virginia's 8th District, we have been critical of Rep. James P. Moran Jr. , a Democrat whose past bouts of hot temper, atrocious judgment and ethical bumbling cast doubt on his fitness for office. Nor have we forgotten his pernicious remark that Jewish Americans bore special responsibility for leading the nation into war in Iraq.

However, neither major party has come up with a viable alternative to Mr. Moran, and after more than two decades in public office, including five years as mayor of Alexandria and 16 years in Congress, he appears unlikely to be dislodged. Mr. Moran has broken with his party in backing sensible free-trade measures and is pressing for infrastructure improvements to help absorb the 20,000 new military employees whose jobs are to be relocated to Fort Belvoir. He had a decent record in the past two years in Congress. He is well liked by many of his constituents, who have been willing to overlook his missteps because he remains conscientious about his duties in office and attentive to local concerns. There is something to admire in all that, and it is the basis for our endorsing him this year, with the above-stated reservations.

By contrast, his Republican opponent in this year's race, attorney Tom M. O'Donoghue, is a blank slate on issues of special concern to the 8th District. Mr. O'Donoghue, a major in the Army Reserve and a veteran of Iraq and Afghanistan, is intelligent and eager to serve. But having all but ignored local questions during the decade-plus he has lived in Northern Virginia, he is ill-equipped to represent the area in Congress. An independent candidate, James T. "Jim" Hurysz, is running a hard-line anti-growth campaign; he has little local support.

In Virginia's 10th District, we endorsed Rep. Frank R. Wolf , a Republican, in a previous editorial.

Two Top Jobs In Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

HAVING ALREADY endorsed Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) for a second term in office, we turn our attention to the other two top jobs in state government: attorney general and comptroller.

Democrat Douglas F. Gansler and Republican Scott L. Rolle, two tough-minded, able and experienced prosecutors, are running to be Maryland's attorney general. The race is one-sided: no Republican has been elected attorney general of Maryland since 1919, and Mr. Gansler enjoys an enormous edge in campaign cash, name recognition and organization. That's a good thing, since it is also the case that he is the better pick to be the state's top law officer and run an office of nearly 400 lawyers.

Mr. Gansler, Montgomery County's top prosecutor since 1999 and a federal prosecutor before that, is a fine lawyer and administrator who has set himself an ambitious agenda for the job he seeks. He has pledged to focus on the environment, particularly cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay; he plans to employ underutilized state and federal enforcement tools to crack down on agribusiness polluters that he believes have evaded the law.

As we noted when we endorsed Mr. Gansler for the Democratic nomination, he is an unusually brash, outspoken public official whose appetite for publicity has earned him detractors. Still, if he sticks to the law and learns the art of understatement, he may easily win allies, for he has the energy and intellect to be a first-rate attorney general.

Mr. Rolle, the chief prosecutor in Frederick County, has run a campaign stressing tougher treatment for child sex predators, including abolishing parole for them. On a range of other issues -- including abortion, which he opposes -- his views are well to the right of what most Marylanders believe. We don't doubt his legal acuity, but his experience is no match for Mr. Gansler's.

The race for Maryland's comptroller, the state's chief tax collector, is even more one-sided. Del. Peter V.R. Franchot , a Montgomery County Democrat, is a 20-year veteran of state politics whose independent-mindedness and broad familiarity with state finances make him easily more qualified than Anne M. McCarthy, the Republican candidate. Ms. McCarthy, a former business school dean, is a novice in state politics who has lived in Maryland just four years.

Yemen Arrests 8 It Links To Plot By Al Qaeda (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Oct. 29 — Security officials in Yemen have arrested eight men, including several Europeans and Australians, as well as a Somali, in what was described as a plot linked to Al Qaeda to smuggle weapons from Yemen to Somalia, Yemen's official news agency reported Sunday.

Security officials said the men, who were arrested Oct. 16, include three Australians, a Briton, a German, a Dane, a Somali and an eighth suspect of undisclosed nationality.

"Preliminary investigations indicate that they are members of Al Qaeda," an Interior Ministry official said in a statement carried by the state-run news agency, Saba.

If the men are convicted, it may offer the most concrete link of a growing Qaeda presence in Somalia, where the Islamic Courts Union, an Islamist group, has struggled to consolidate its position after taking control of Mogadishu, the country's capital, in June.

Officials said the men, who were not identified, had converted to Islam and had received religious instruction in Yemen. They were arrested trying to smuggle light arms, presumably across the Gulf of Aden, a common smuggling route for refugees escaping Somalia and for drugs and contraband brought into Africa.

Yemen, where tribal wars and revenge attacks claim up to 1,200 lives every year, has one of the largest ratios of guns per capita in the world, with thriving arms markets in most major towns and cities.

U.S., Allies Practice Intercepts In Gulf (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087859

The United States and five other countries will begin an exercise in the Persian Gulf today simulating the interdiction of a ship carrying nuclear materials to a state of "proliferation concern" -- most likely Iran.

U.S. officials said that Muslim countries will take part for the first time in a Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI) exercise, part of Washington's global effort to disrupt traffic in weapons of mass destruction and related materials.

"From news reports, we know that the exercise has gotten the attention of the Iranian government," said Robert G. Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security. "This is an exercise that will test our capability to intercept illicit traffic."

The West suspects Iran of trying to build a nuclear weapon, but Tehran insists that it seeks nuclear energy only for civilian purposes.

Vessels, aircraft and special teams for the live phase of the exercise will be provided by the United States, Britain, France, Italy, Australia and the host, Bahrain. Preparations have involved 25 countries, including South Korea, which has not formally joined the PSI, Mr. Joseph told reporters.

"The United States appreciates the leadership of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates to ensure that the Gulf states will actively prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, their delivery systems and related materials," the State Department said.

The PSI began in 2003 with 11 countries and has grown to 80, Mr. Joseph said.

The Bush administration plans to apply some of the program's interdiction practices in carrying out a U.N. Security Council resolution imposed this month that bans imports and exports of nuclear and other illicit cargo to North Korea.

China and South Korea, however, are reluctant to intercept North Korean ships. Seoul has said it is thinking of joining the PSI, but a senior State Department official said China ruled out membership during a visit last week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Also today, the United States and Russia will head the first meeting of an initiative to combat nuclear terrorism, announced by Presidents Bush and Vladimir Putin in July.

The session will be held in Morocco, which the senior official said has "very strong nonproliferation credentials" and whose participation will "send the right signal" that this is not just a Western effort.

The other participants will be Britain, China, France, Australia, Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan, Kazakhstan and Turkey, the official said.

Report Assails N. Korea Rights Record (AP)

By Edward Harris

AP, October 30, 2006

A Nobel prize-winning Holocaust survivor, an anti-Soviet dissident and a former European leader called Sunday for U.N. Security Council action on North Korea over its "egregious" human rights record.

Elie Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camp at Auschwitz and later won a Nobel peace prize, commissioned a 123-page report detailing North Korean atrocities with dissident playwright turned Czech President Vaclav Havel and a former prime minister of Norway, Kjell Magne Bondevik.

In the report, the three said the dispute over the country's nuclear program should not eclipse deadly political repression there, but rather the council should open another path to influence North Korea by taking on leader Kim Jong Il's regime over its treatment of the country's 23 million people.

While a unanimous October Security Council resolution imposed sanctions on North Korea over its Oct. 9 nuclear test, the report is "urging the United Nations to get involved in the North Korea issue also from the human rights perspective," Bondevik said by telephone from Norway.

"Nowhere else in the world today is there such an abuse of rights, as institutionalized as it is in North Korea," Bondevik told the Associated Press. "The leaders are committing crimes against humanity."

The report argues that Security Council action is warranted under a resolution unanimously approved in April by the 15-nation council that endorsed a 2005 agreement aimed at preventing tragedies like the 1994 Rwanda genocide.

North Korea's actions toward its people — like food policies that helped fuel a late-1990s famine that killed as many as 1 million people and a prison system holding some 200,000 political prisoners — present a nontraditional threat to international peace, which the report argues is covered by the recent resolution.

The report, written by law firm DLA Piper and the non-governmental organization U.S. Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, urged the Security Council to adopt a non-punitive resolution that would demand unhindered access to North Korea by humanitarian workers, the release of all political prisoners and the admission of U.N. human rights investigators.

The report envisions a diplomatic process parallel to the one dealing with North Korea's nuclear program.

"Although in recent weeks the international focus has been on North Korea's nuclear weapons test, the situation in that country is also one of the most egregious human rights and humanitarian disasters in the world today," the report said.

Reached Friday, the North Korean mission to the United Nations said no officials, including U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon, were available for comment.

Bondevik acknowledged that a resolution on North Korea over its internal policies could be a hard sell for some council members — like China, which is also accused of holding political prisoners.

But he said the threat to international peace posed by North Korea would trump such considerations.

"I hope this report will describe in detail the abuses — and this will encourage the member countries, even China, that we have to act," he said. "We can't wait any longer."

Nuclear Test Should Prompt Action On Human Rights In North Korea: Experts (AFP-Y)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, October 30, 2006

North Korea's defiant nuclear weapons test paves the way for UN Security Council action to combat the country's perennial human rights and humanitarian problems, an expert report says.

The 142-page report, commissioned by former Czech president Vaclav Havel, ex-Norwegian prime minister Kjell Bondevik and US Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel, said the human plight in the reclusive nation deserved to be treated on a parallel track with the security threat.

The trio commissioned the report because they felt that "for far too long, the security threat posed by North Korea has relegated the human rights concerns in the impoverished country to a second-class status."

The October 9 nuclear weapons test "demonstrated the fallacy of the argument that not antagonizing its government on human rights concerns would promote successful engagement on security issues," said the report prepared by DLA Piper LLP, a global legal firm, and the US Committee for Human Rights in North Korea.

"Our argument is very clear: the North Korean themselves have formally decoupled the security issue from the human rights and humanitarian issues," said Jared Genser, a DLA Piper lawyer who coordinated the project.

Based on a comprehensive review of published information and first-hand interviews, the report concluded that "North Korea has violated its responsibility to protect its own citizens from crimes against humanity being committed in the country."

Coupled with North Korea's refusal to accept prior recommendations from UN bodies to remedy the situation, "UN Security Council action is warranted," it said.

The report covered research on areas such as the historical context of international concern over the Korean peninsula, the major human rights concerns, including food policy, famine and political prisoners, and the transnational effects of the crises, such as refugee exodus.

"The evidence and analysis contained in this report is deeply disturbing," Havel, Bondevik and Wiesel of Boston University, the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize winner, said in a foreword of the report.

"Indeed, it is clear that Kim Jong Il and the North Korean government are actively committing crimes against humanity," they charged.

North Korea allowed as many as one million, and possibly many more, of its own people to die during the famine in the 1990s, they said.

Hunger and starvation remained a "persistent" problem, they said, pointing out that over 37 percent of children in North Korea were "chronically malnourished."

Furthermore, North Korea imprisons more than 200,000 people in its modern-day gulag, and it is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in that system over 30 years, they said.

Widely condemned internationally, the North Korean nuclear test came after Pyongyang walked out of prolonged nuclear talks with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

Pyongyang had earlier agreed in principle to abandon its nuclear weapons in return for energy and other aid as well as diplomatic guarantees.

Turn North Korea Into A Human Rights Issue (NYT)

By Vaclav Havel, Kjell Magne Bondevik And Elie Wiesel

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

WHILE the focus in recent weeks has been on North Korea's nuclear test, we shouldn't lose sight of the fact that the government there is also responsible for one of the most egregious human-rights and humanitarian disasters in the world today.

DOJ_NMG_0087861

For more than a decade, many in the international community have argued that to focus on the suffering of the North Korean people would risk driving the country away from discussions over its nuclear program.

But with his recent actions, North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, has shown that this approach neither stopped the development of his nuclear program nor helped North Koreans. It is time, therefore, for a renewed international effort to ameliorate the crisis facing the country's citizens.

And with the unanimous adoption by the United Nations Security Council of the doctrine that each state has a responsibility to protect its own citizens from the most egregious of human-rights abuses, a new instrument for diplomacy has emerged.

States will retain sovereignty over their own territory, but if they should fail to protect their own citizens from severe human-rights abuses, the international community now has an obligation to intervene through regional bodies and the United Nations, up to and including the Security Council.

It is in this context that, working with the law firm DLA Piper and the United States Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, we commissioned a report on the failure of the North Korean government to exercise its responsibility to protect its own people. The evidence and analysis in this report are deeply disturbing. Indeed, it is clear that North Korea is actively committing crimes against humanity — against its own people.

North Korea allowed perhaps one million — and possibly many more — of its own citizens to die during the famine in the 1990's. This was caused in part by the government's decision to reduce food purchases as international assistance increased so that it could divert resources to its military and nuclear program.

Hunger and starvation remain a persistent problem today, with more than 37 percent of North Korean children chronically malnourished. And yet North Korea has requested less food assistance from the World Food Program and refuses to let the program monitor food distribution in some 42 of 203 counties in the country.

As a result of the cuts in food aid, the program has said that millions of North Koreans will face real hardship this winter and many aid groups have warned of another famine.

Furthermore, North Korea holds as many as 200,000 people in its political prisons. Not only are real or imagined dissenters imprisoned, but so are their relatives, including the elderly and children, under a guilt-by-association system instituted by North Korea's founder, Kim Il-sung.

Prisoners in the gulag are provided starvation-level rations, forced to work long days under brutal conditions, and many face torture or execution for trivial offenses. It is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in the North Korean gulag over 30 years.

The few attempts by the international community to engage with North Korea on human rights and humanitarian concerns have come up short. Resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights have been repudiated by North Korean representatives and then ignored.

In addition, North Korea refuses to recognize the legitimacy of the United Nations special rapporteur on human rights in North Korea and has denied his numerous requests for access to the country.

Kim Jong-il has proven that the international community's restraint in openly discussing North Korea's treatment of its own people did not yield compromise on the nuclear issue. It merely allowed him to decouple the two issues.

Now that Kim Jong-il's nuclear weapons test has attracted the attention and condemnation of the world, it is imperative to seize this opportunity and once again engage with Pyongyang on human rights and humanitarian concerns.

Our report recommends that, as a first step, the Council should adopt a non-punitive resolution urging open access to North Korea for humanitarian relief, the release of political prisoners, access for the special rapporteur and engagement by the United Nations.

We also urge the incoming secretary-general, Ban Ki-Moon, to make his first official action a briefing of the Security Council on this dire situation.

Protecting the people of North Korea requires nothing less.

Bush May Start Talks With N. Korea, Former Envoy Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Heejin Koo

Bloomberg, October 30, 2006

Oct. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush may bow to political pressure from within the U.S. and agree to direct talks with a nuclear-armed North Korea, according to a former State Department specialist on Kim Jong Il's regime.

``President Bush doesn't change his policy because of external pressure," Kenneth Quinones, 63, said in an interview on Jeju island, South Korea. ``If he's going to change in the near future, it's because of domestic political pressure."

DOJ_NMG_0087862

U.S. officials have refused North Korea's demands for bilateral talks, urging the Asian nation to return to six-nation negotiations on ending its weapons program that have been suspended since November last year. North Korea announced on Oct. 9 it had detonated a nuclear bomb.

Failure by the Republican Party to keep control of Congress in elections on Nov. 7 will probably encourage Bush to begin direct negotiations, according to Quinones, a former State Department director of North Korean affairs. Democratic candidates are backed by 53 percent of likely voters, according to a Newsweek poll of 1,002 people, conducted between Oct. 19 and 20 with a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

``In Washington, surprisingly, there is within the Republican Party growing pressure on Bush to show flexibility," said Quinones. ``If the Republicans lose, then yes, I have no doubt Bush will show greater flexibility."

Reaching Agreements

Quinones, a professor of Korean Studies at Japan's Akita International University, was involved in so-called back channel talks between the State Department and North Korea's delegation to the United Nations till February this year. He was in South Korea last week to give a lecture.

The U.S. and North Korea in 1994 reached an agreement for North Korea to abandon its weapons program to get assistance to build two reactors for generating power.

The accord unraveled when the North admitted in October 2002 it was proceeding with its weapons plan in violation of the pact. Bush had already branded the country part of an ``axis of evil" for developing weapons of mass destruction and selling drugs and counterfeit money. Iraq and Iran were the other countries named in the ``axis of evil."

North Korea must return to the six-nation talks, which include the U.S., China, Russia, Japan and South Korea, and the U.S. won't negotiate outside that framework, according to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Oct. 20.

Refusal to Return

Kim's regime has refused to return until the U.S. removes financial sanctions imposed last year for money-laundering and counterfeiting.

``President Bush's whole claim of `I want a peaceful diplomatic solution, but I won't negotiate' -- it's a total contradiction," Quinones said. ``You can't have one without the other."

The commander of the U.S. Forces Korea and the United Nations Command, General Burwell Bell, also urged North Korea to return to talks.

``I hope for a peaceful and diplomatic resolution to the North Korean nuclear issue," Bell told reporters at a briefing held at the Yongsan Eighth U.S. Army base in Seoul today. ``If deterrence fails, and North Korea attacks the Republic of Korea, the ROK-U.S. alliance will quickly and decisively defeat any aggression."

The nuclear test heightened tensions on the Korean peninsula, where North and South remain technically at war because no peace treaty was signed to end their 1950-53 conflict, and raised concerns of a regional arms race.

``Moderate right-wing factions" including former Secretary of State James Baker and former President George H.W. Bush will urge the administration to meet with the North, Quinones said.

Frozen Funds

One possible compromise is over $24 million of North Korean funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia in Macau, China, after the U.S. Treasury Department in September last year designated the lender as a money-laundering threat, Quinones said.

North Korea offered to transfer the money to a New York account, allowing the U.S. to monitor its distribution, according to Quinones.

``The Treasury Department flatly rejected the idea," Quinones said, without specifying where he obtained the information. ``If it comes to a choice between Washington accepting that compromise and allowing the transfer of funds, or war, everybody will push Washington to take the compromise offer."

Quinones said he does not expect Japan, Taiwan or South Korea to begin nuclear weapons programs while the international community to trying to revive negotiations.

``If the six-party talks completely collapse, then we could see an unraveling of the present balance of power."

A Campaign For Settlers In Golan Heights (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

KATZRIN On the edge of this growing Jewish settlement, which bills itself as "the city of water and wine," Moti Bar is building a stylish microbrewery and restaurant in a glass and stone shopping mall that opened a few months ago. His venture, all the way down to the imported copper brew tanks, is a bet that Israel will remain in the Golan Heights for years to come.

DOJ_NMG_0087863

The high-end beer and view of the Sea of Galilee are designed to appeal to Israeli yuppies, who are being encouraged more aggressively than ever to move to this rugged plateau seized from Syria in the 1967 Middle East war. Dozens of newly graded home sites stretch westward, and a large industrial park called Golantech is emerging a few miles from Bar's pub.

"We're living our life as if we'll be here forever," said Bar, 42, who commutes from the nearby community of Kanaf. "And I don't think there is any reason why we should leave."

Israel's summer war with Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia that acts as Syria's military proxy, has revived the decades-old contest over the Golan Heights. This latest phase is also being shaped by demographic changes epitomized by this expanding settlement.

Israel annexed the Golan Heights in 1981 and offered its Arab residents citizenship in the Jewish state, something it has not extended to Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The annexation was not recognized internationally, however, and most of the Arabs here refused the offer as a protest against what they consider an illegal occupation. But they do have residency rights that allow them to travel throughout Israel and vote in local elections.

Most of the Arabs in Golan are Druze, members of a sect that split from Islam centuries ago and has large followings in Lebanon, Syria and Israel. Unlike most of the Druze in Israel, those here identify themselves as Arabs and do not serve in the Israeli military. The vast majority consider themselves citizens of Syria, although a small percentage support Israel's presence here.

For years, the Israeli military discouraged civilian settlement in Golan, particularly along the frontier with Syria, for fear the area would emerge again as a battlefield. Some small Israeli settlements were established there anyway, but in the past 15 years all new growth has occurred within existing settlement boundaries rather than in new areas.

The pace has picked up in recent years. Now, for the first time, the number of Jewish settlers in Golan may soon exceed the nearly 20,000 Arab residents whose families remained here after the war. The milestone may have already been passed, Arab leaders concede, with 400 Jewish families moving into Golan each year.

Since the Lebanon war ended on Aug. 14, settler leaders have launched a $250,000 advertising campaign to attract young Israelis with the lure of free land and a lifestyle ethic that blends Marlboro Country, Napa Valley and the X Games. Their goal is to double the Jewish population in Golan to 40,000 within a decade through an appeal that emphasizes cowboy hats over skullcaps.

At the same time, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has called for new negotiations on Golan, emboldened by Israel's inconclusive fight against Hezbollah. For years, the Syrian government has helped arm and fund Hezbollah to strengthen its own hand in talks on the region. The Syrian army, meanwhile, has maintained quiet along the heavily mined frontier.

In a recent interview with the German magazine Der Spiegel, Assad added an ominous note to his previous calls for talks, warning that "when the hope disappears, then maybe war really is the only solution." In response, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called Golan "an inseparable part of the state of Israel."

"No doubt the steadfastness of the resistance in Lebanon, ending the legend of the undefeatable Israeli army, has strengthened our belief that the end of the occupation is closer than ever," said Hail Abu Jabal, 62, a Druze political leader in the town of Majdal Shams who spent seven years in Israeli prisons for campaigning against Israel's hold on Golan. "But expanding these settlements is a mistake, making peace more distant and violent confrontation closer."

Rising from the Sea of Galilee to snowcapped Mount Hermon, Golan is a rocky slope of vineyards, cattle ranches, fruit orchards and remnants of conflict. Vast minefields stretch out behind barbed-wire fences, and the overgrown remains of Syrian houses, military barracks and mosques line mostly empty roads. Trenches and earthworks still score the land where the Israeli army has twice fought Syrian forces.

For decades, Israeli military leaders considered Golan an essential high-ground buffer against Syrian invasion and peppered the region with bases. In recent years, though, some Israeli generals have argued that air power has reduced the strategic importance of the heights. It still remains a training ground for the infantry and armored corps.

Perhaps more important, the region provides a third of Israel's drinking water.

"Until the war with Lebanon, there was no talk of giving back the Golan Heights. Most of the focus was on Israel's real problem, which is with the Palestinians," said Eli Malka, 48, the leader of a group of Golan settlements that is using government money to fund the ad blitz. "We're building, we're growing. And I don't see the prospect of any talks with Assad."

Jewish history here is visible in the remains of a 4th-century synagogue, among others found in Golan, that has been turned into a tourist site on the edge of this settlement of 7,500 people. But most of the roughly 100 families moving each year to Katzrin -- the largest of 33 Jewish communities in Golan -- are secular Israelis like Topaz Barkai, a 32-year-old former banker who arrived last month.

Barkai's father was killed in Golan during the 1973 Arab-Israeli war while her mother was pregnant with her. She was born here, then spent much of her adult life studying and working in Tel Aviv, the cosmopolitan coastal city she still visits for professional soccer games and nightclubs. Her new job is to persuade friends to move to Golan, with its skiing, water sports, cattle ranching and boutique wineries.

"We're trying to make this place younger," Barkai said.

A year and a half ago, the Golan lifestyle drew Einbar Pelter and her husband, Tal, an army officer and aspiring vintner. The couple moved with their two young children from a town near the seaside city of Netanya to Merom Golan, a farming collective founded a month after the 1967 war.

Pelter, a landscaper whose front yard is now a mix of grape vines, lavender and herbs, said the promise of free land, a communal setting and wilderness made them set aside qualms about relocating to an occupied region. Pelter Wines now appear on Tel Aviv wine lists.

"Even if it is going to be temporary, we thought it would be worthwhile," said Pelter, 32, who has seen her new neighborhood fill up over the past year. "A community that isn't growing has an expiration date on it."

The population of roughly 7,000 Arabs who remained after the 1967 war has grown to about 20,000. Most of them refused citizenship. Those who accepted are ostracized to this day in the four insular mountain towns where the Druze population is concentrated.

"After almost 60 years, the basic question of whether the Israelis have a right to create a Jewish state is being asked again after this war," said Taiseer Maray, director of Golan for Development, an Arab-rights organization in Majdal Shams. "This shows the stupidity of power. If I were a clever Zionist, the first thing I'd do is seek peace."

In Maray's Israeli travel document, the space beside "Nationality" reads "undefined." It is an apt description of a population that gathers Fridays at an overlook on the edge of the town to shout to relatives across the border with Syria.

The Arabs here are allowed to sell their apples in Syria and study at Damascus University. Hundreds of graduates have returned, many of them working in summer camps, professional clubs and civic groups, the main venues for political organizing.

"The feeling among the people here is that the Syrians could come back any day," said Maray, who has not seen his three brothers in Damascus since the 1967 war. "The settlers now talk about breaking down the boundaries between us with jobs and investment."

Arab grievances here center on the preferential treatment Israeli settlements receive in allocation of water, which is scarce and expensive for many Arab farmers. Meanwhile, civic campaigns for the removal of the Israeli military base on a hill in the center of Majdal Shams have been ignored.

In recent weeks, a group calling itself the Syrian National Alliance has been posting communiques around town calling for a new campaign against the Israeli occupation, including armed operations. "But we really don't know who they are," said Ayman Abu Jabal, 40, a former prisoner who works for Golan for Development. "So far they have not been very convincing."

Abu Jabal, a distant relative of Hail's, has followed that route before. As a member of the now-defunct Syrian Resistance Movement, he spent 12 years in Israeli jails for blowing up an Israeli military warehouse in 1985. No one was injured.

"What we want is for our rights to be the same as theirs," Abu Jabal said. "I'm not against the Jew as a person. But we want the occupation to end and for us to live in peace."

Israeli Labor Votes To Stay In Gov't (AP)

By Mark Lavie

AP, October 30, 2006

Israel's dovish Labor Party bent its ideology Sunday and voted to stay in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government, despite his intention to add an ultra-hawkish party to his ruling coalition.

The vote clears the way for Olmert to bring hard-liner Avigdor Lieberman and his party into the government, giving the premier a large cushion of parliamentary support with the approach of crucial votes, including the state budget. In the past, Lieberman has called for bombing Iran, Egypt and Palestinian population centers, as well as drawing Israel's borders to exclude most of its Arab citizens.

In a show of hands after a stormy convention, the party endorsed the stand of its leader, Defense Minister Amir Peretz, that it was better to stay in the government and influence policy than to wither away in the parliamentary opposition.

Peretz denounced Lieberman's policies. "We're talking about a man with a world view that is extreme, clear and infuriating," he said. "We will stay (in the government) in order not to let these views be realized."

Opponents, led by Cabinet Minister Ophir Pines-Paz, argued that Labor would be committing electoral suicide by sitting at the same Cabinet table with Lieberman and his hawkish Yisrael Beiteinu Party. Labor traditionally has led the dovish camp that favors compromise toward peace with the Palestinians.

Pines-Paz was expected to resign from the Cabinet, where he serves as culture, science and sports minister. Arab members of the party also were considering an exit.

DOJ_NMG_0087865

Peretz dismissed his critics. "I don't need anyone to preach to me about my loyalty to peace," he told the gathering, where rivals scuffled in front of the podium. "I certainly don't need anyone to preach to me about principles of human dignity and equality."

Olmert is to convene a Cabinet session Monday to approve the addition of Yisrael Beiteinu, and the parliament is expected to give its endorsement later in the week.

Lieberman is to be the only Cabinet minister from his party, serving as deputy prime minister in charge of dealing with strategic threats against Israel, primarily the nuclear threat from Iran.

Olmert's original coalition had a seemingly comfortable majority of 67 seats in the 120-seat parliament, but Labor itself disrupted the equation when several of its lawmakers said they would vote against the budget. If the Olmert government fails to pass a budget by the end of March, it must resign.

With Lieberman's 11 seats, the coalition's strength is boosted to 78 seats, and a mini-rebellion by some of the 19 Labor Party lawmakers would not bring down the government.

Israeli Official Asks President To Step Aside (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 29 — Israel's attorney general said Sunday that President Moshe Katsav should temporarily step aside while prosecutors decide whether to charge him with sex crimes.

Mr. Katsav has come under intense pressure to resign, or at least to suspend his official duties temporarily, and the remarks by the attorney general, Menachem Mazuz, made the president's position appear even more tenuous. Two weeks ago, the police recommended that prosecutors file charges, including rape and sexual assault, after accusations were made by several women who have served on his staff.

Mr. Mazuz will make the final decision about whether to charge Mr. Katsav. That announcement could still be weeks away.

"The more serious the allegations and the farther along in the process, the obligation increases for the president to take the step of temporarily suspending his term," Mr. Mazuz said in a letter to the High Court of Justice.

Mr. Katsav, whose position is largely ceremonial, has denied any wrongdoing. "Sooner or later it will be proven that the allegations against him are false," the president's office said in a statement on Sunday evening.

An Israeli president cannot stand trial while in office. However, the Parliament can impeach him, and once out of office, a former president can be prosecuted. Mr. Katsav's seven-year term expires next year.

In a separate development, neighboring Egypt has renewed its efforts to ease Israeli-Palestinian tensions and to try to broker a deal that would free an Israeli soldier captured by Gaza militants in return for a large number of Palestinian prisoners.

Egypt said Sunday that it had invited the exiled political leader of Hamas, Khaled Meshal, who is based in Syria, to come to Cairo for discussions on a prisoner exchange.

Such talks would also address the stalled efforts by Hamas, a militant Islamic group that controls the Palestinian government, and Fatah, a secular movement, to end their feuding and to form a national unity government.

Senior Hamas leaders plan to travel to Cairo for the talks in the next few days, but Mr. Meshal will not be among them, [a news agency] reported Sunday night from Damascus, Syria.

Egyptian officials have privately expressed sharp criticism of Mr. Meshal and Hamas, which has strong links to the Muslim Brotherhood, a group that is officially banned in Egypt. The Egyptians have also expressed frustration at the inability of the Palestinian government to calm the turmoil in the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian militants, including members of Hamas, seized the Israeli soldier on June 25, and the Palestinians are seeking to swap him for a large number of Palestinian prisoners. Israeli troops, who left Gaza last year, re-entered the coastal territory after the soldier was captured.

In a related development, the Israeli newspaper Maariv reported Friday that Israel might bomb a narrow strip along Gaza's southern border in an attempt to destroy weapons-smuggling tunnels linked to Egypt.

Israel's military has not commented on the report, but it appeared to raise concerns in Egypt about further instability in Gaza.

Palestinian security officials said a Hamas militant, Baker al-Assar, 20, was killed Sunday when a tunnel he was digging from southern Gaza into Egypt collapsed.

Egyptian officials said they had redeployed security forces around the border with Gaza specifically to help stop the smuggling. They denied reports, though, that they had moved 5,000 troops to the border, which would be a violation of an agreement with Israel that allows 750 Egyptian border guards.

DOJ_NMG_0087866

"Egypt is anxious to have calm on its border with Gaza and there are communications to guarantee this between the Egyptian and Palestinian sides," an Egyptian presidential spokesman, Soliman Awad, said in an interview.

Muslim Leader Dies In Nigeria Air Crash (FT)

By Dino Mahtani

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Nigeria's top Muslim leader, at least two senators and a state deputy governor were killed on Sunday when a passenger aircraft crashed shortly after take-off from the capital Abuja. The crash, involving the local ADC Airlines, is Nigeria's third big civil aviation disaster in the past year.

According to the airline, the aircraft was carrying 105 passengers and crew.

The crash will be a significant blow to the country's efforts at persuading international aviation agencies it has done enough to merit a clean bill of health in its aviation sector since embarking on urgent reforms in recent months. The sector faces an international audit next month.

The death of Muhammed Maccido, who is otherwise known as the Sultan of Sokoto, will also send shockwaves through the mainstream Islamic community in Nigeria, where half of the estimated 140m population is Muslim.

The sultan is an influential figure among the Nigerian political elite and normally would have been expected to play a role in endorsing the selection of what many Nigerians are expecting to be a Muslim candidate for presidential elections next year.

Muslim leaders will be expected to elect a new sultan after a period of mourning, and the appointment of a successor will be followed with interest by political forces in the north. While the sultan may be the spiritual head of Nigeria's Muslims, his authority depends on political leeway given to him by politicians, including the president.

President Olusegun Obasanjo yesterday ordered an investigation into the crash. He has previously blamed corruption and corner cutting for two air disasters last year that killed more than 200 people.

Sunday's crash adds yet more influential Nigerians to the country's aviation death toll. In September, 10 senior generals died in a military aircraft crash. Last year, a leading presidential adviser also died in one of the two passenger airline crashes.

The country's aviation accident investigation and prevention bureau blamed bad weather, poor runway lighting and crew incompetence for one of last year's airline crashes. But Roland Iyayi, head of the Nigerian Airspace Management Agency, has said measures are needed to counter "systemic failures" inherent in air safety infrastructure and procedures.

Nigeria, which has seen domestic air travel boom in the past few years, is due to be audited by the International Civil Aviation Organisation next month. The audit will be instrumental in determining whether Nigerian-registered air carriers, such as Virgin Nigeria, can fly to other countries, in particular the US.

Industry executives say they do not expect Nigeria to meet the main regulatory and infrastructure requirements demanded by auditors.

Nigerian Airliner Carrying 104 Crashes In Abuja (WP/AP)

By Bashir Adigun, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

ABUJA, Nigeria, Oct. 29 -- A Nigerian airliner with 104 people aboard slammed into the ground moments after takeoff Sunday, the third deadly crash of a passenger plane in less than a year in this West African country. Six people survived.

Among those killed was the man regarded as the spiritual leader of Nigeria's Muslims, and thousands of people gathered at a regional airport to receive his body.

The Boeing 737 crashed one minute after taking off from the Abuja airport, said Sam Adurogboye, an Aviation Ministry spokesman. President Olusegun Obasanjo ordered an immediate investigation into the cause of the crash, said his spokeswoman, Remi Oyo.

Rescue workers found debris from the plane, body parts and luggage strewn over an area the size of a football field. The plane went down inside the sprawling airport compound about two miles from the runway. Smoke rose from the aircraft's mangled and smoldering fuselage. Its tail hung from a tree.

Emergency workers pulled blackened corpses from the wreckage, then covered the bodies with white sheets and hauled them away in stretchers.

Through the day, airport security officials kept back anxious people seeking information about friends or loved ones.

Adurogboye said 104 passengers and crew members had been aboard the flight, and he knew of six survivors who had been taken to a hospital. "Obviously the rest are feared dead," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0087867

The plane was bound for the northwest city of Sokoto, about 500 miles northwest of Abuja, the capital, state radio said, adding that it had gone down during a storm. Witnesses said there was a rainstorm around the time the aircraft took off, but rains later subsided, giving way to overcast skies.

In an announcement broadcast on state radio, the Sokoto state government announced that the sultan of Sokoto, Muhammadu Maccido, died in the crash. Maccido headed the National Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs in Nigeria. The panel determines when Muslim fasts should begin and end, and decides policy for Nigeria's 70 million Muslims.

Maccido's body was immediately flown to Sokoto, where thousands of people awaited its arrival at the airport. He was buried Sunday in accordance with Islamic custom, and the Sokoto state government declared six days of mourning.

Mustapha Shehu, spokesman for the Sokoto state government, had said earlier that the sultan's son, Muhammed Maccido, a senator, also was aboard the flight, along with Abdulrahman Shehu Shagari, son of former Nigerian president Shehu Shagari, who was in office from 1979 to 1983. Their fates were not immediately known.

Oyo said Obasanjo was "deeply and profoundly shocked and saddened. . . . He offers condolences to all Nigerians, especially family, friends and associates of those who may have been on board."

The Boeing 737-2B7 owned by ADC Airlines, a private Nigerian company, was manufactured in 1983, Adurogboye said.

Nigerian Plane Crash Kills 98, Including Top Muslim Leader (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal, Oct. 29 — A commercial airliner with 104 passengers and crew members on board, including the spiritual leader of Nigeria's vast Muslim population, crashed shortly after takeoff in the Nigerian capital, Abuja, on Sunday. It was the third deadly passenger plane crash in Nigeria in a little more than a year.

Six people were taken to local hospitals, aviation officials told reporters at the crash site. The other 98 people on board were presumed dead. The plane crashed just past the runway at the Abuja airport after taking off in stormy weather, and the wreckage was strewn across a wooded area beyond the runway. News agencies reported that some bodies had been recovered, but it was unclear how many.

The flight was operated by ADC Airlines, one of Nigeria's many small domestic airlines. The 23-year-old plane was a Boeing 737-2B7, The Associated Press reported, quoting an Aviation Ministry spokesman.

The plane was headed to Sokoto, the capital of a state near Nigeria's northern border. Among the passengers was the sultan of Sokoto, Muhammadu Maccido, the spiritual leader since 1996 of Nigeria's Muslims, who are believed to constitute half of the country's estimated population of 130 million.

"It is a terrible tragedy, an unimaginable loss," said Mustapha Shehu, a spokesman for the Sokoto State government, in a telephone interview just moments after the sultan's body had been brought to Sokoto for burial by a government plane. "Everyone is in mourning."

The crash was the latest in a string of disasters in Nigeria's skies. More than 200 people died in two aviation accidents in Nigeria in 2005. Last October, a flight operated by Bellview Airlines, one of the country's most popular carriers, crashed shortly after taking off from Lagos on its way to Abuja, killing 117 people.

Just two months later, a flight operated by Sosoliso Airlines crashed on the runway at Port Harcourt, the main hub of Nigeria's oil industry. Dozens of high school students on their way home for Christmas from an elite boarding school in Abuja were among the more than 100 people killed in that crash.

The two episodes, coming just months apart, prompted the government to ground the entire domestic fleet of both airlines for inspections. Nigerian aviation officials later said that sudden weather changes were to blame for both accidents.

Last month 10 senior military officials were killed in a military plane crash in Benue State.

Despite its vast oil wealth — Nigeria is the world's sixth-largest oil exporter — its infrastructure is crumbling, and traveling even a few hundred miles by road takes more than a day.

With most domestic fares running at least $100 one-way in a country where 60 percent of the people live in poverty, the airlines tend to cater to the country's business and political elite. Politicians, diplomats and prominent business people have been among the dead in recent crashes.

In addition to the sultan, several top Sokoto State officials were on the plane, Mr. Shehu said, including two senators and the deputy governor. The group had been in the capital attending a government meeting on education, Mr. Shehu said.

The death of the sultan leaves Nigeria's Muslim population without one of its most prominent voices against interreligious conflict as the country enters a contentious period leading up to elections next year. Mr. Maccido was crucial in calming religious tensions in 2002, when deadly riots broke out over a beauty pageant in northern Nigeria, and in 2004, when interreligious violence killed dozens in Plateau State.

DOJ_NMG_0087868

The 2007 presidential election is likely to fan these flames again as the largely Muslim north and the largely Christian south battle over which region the country's next president will come from.

Is A Moat The Answer? (NSWK)

By Kevin Peraino And Joanna Chen

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

In search of a creative way to stop militants and weapons smugglers from infiltrating across the Egypt-Gaza border, Israelis are talking about building a six-mile moat filled with Mediterranean seawater along the southern boundary. The plan was first considered seriously in 2000; in 2004 the Defense Ministry even opened bids for construction. But the project was dropped after government legal experts feared it would require destroying hundreds of Palestinian houses along the canal route. Brig. Gen. Tzvika Foghel, who studied the idea in 2001 as the IDF Southern Command chief of staff, says geologists warned that if the construction weren't done right, it could contaminate water supplies in both Gaza and Egypt and destabilize land under Palestinian homes. It would also have been prohibitively expensive—$250 million.

That doesn't matter so much now. After this summer's conflicts—during which militants tunneled from Gaza to Israel to capture and kill Israeli soldiers—the idea has gained new currency. Nervous Israelis are eager to put distance between themselves and their enemies. "I don't believe in coexistence," hard-liner Avigdor Lieberman, who just agreed to join Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's coalition, told NEWSWEEK recently. Neither do a growing number of his countrymen; polls show strong support for his hawkish views. Even Foghel says he's convinced the moat is "a good solution," adding that Gaza residents might grow to like relaxing by their new moat, and even fishing in it. "It will be something nice to look at," he says.

Central America: Ortega And Ollie—Again (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Joseph Contreras

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

The Bush Administration is increasingly worried that ex-Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega—once the scourge of the Reagan White House—may prevail in the first round of Nicaragua's presidential election Nov. 5. But it wasn't happy when another Reagan-era figure flew to Managua to rally opposition to Ortega. In a speech to a group of old anti-Sandinista rebels, Iran-contra figure Oliver North compared an Ortega victory to the seizure of power by Mussolini and Hitler—and charged that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez was behind Ortega. The visit blindsided officials in the U.S. Embassy, who demanded to know why North was stoking old passions. North said he was simply responding to an invitation from his old contra pals, who wanted to give him an award. "I only go where I'm invited," he said.

Bush officials are worried that Chávez is backing Ortega financially. The Venezuelan president has signed a deal to provide low-cost oil to Sandinista mayors as a way of boosting Ortega's campaign. The prospect of another leftist taking power in Latin America prompted Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez to warn that an Ortega triumph might endanger a free-trade treaty with the United States. But officials are wary of saying too much—or backing one of several rival candidates—lest they too be accused of meddling.

Mexican Police Move Into Oaxaca (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

Mexican federal police have moved into the southern state of Oaxaca in response to growing levels of violence that has turned the once-popular tourist destination into a virtual war zone.

President Vicente Fox decided to act after three people, including a US citizen, were shot dead on Friday in what were believed to be skirmishes between local police and protesters.

The presence of federal forces – about 3,000 arrived in and around the city of Oaxaca on Saturday – is the latest reminder of how far things have spun out of control from what initially began in May as a strike by teachers who were demanding more pay.

Mr Fox, who ends his six-year mandate on December 1, is desperate to hand over a peaceful and law-abiding country to Felipe Calderón, the president-elect and a member of Mr Fox's centre-right National Action Party (PAN), and Oaxaca has become the biggest test of his ability to do so.

Last week most of the state's 50,000 teachers voted to return to classes after five months of occupying the colonial city's main square. But the remaining teachers, together with members of the People's Popular Assembly of Oaxaca (Appo), an umbrella group of indigenous, social and labour organisations, have vowed to continue the resistance until Ulises Ruiz, the state's governor, resigns.

DOJ_NMG_0087869

The teachers and the Appo accuse Mr Ruiz, of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), of electoral fraud and authoritarianism. On Saturday, Appo leaders rejected the federal government's demands to clear the barricades that the protesters have raised all around the city to prevent reprisals from local police.

Flavio Sosa, leader of the Appo, said on the weekend that Mr Ruiz's resignation is not negotiable, although he said that his organisation is willing to continue talks with the federal government.

Police Storm Oaxaca To Suppress Protest (WP/AP)

By Mark Stevenson

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 29 -- On the order of President Vicente Fox, federal police backed by armored vehicles and water cannons tore down barricades and stormed embattled Oaxaca on Sunday, seizing control of the city center from protesters who had held it for five months.

A 15-year-old boy guarding one barricade was killed by a tear gas canister, said Jesica Sanchez, a human rights worker.

The conflict has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster.

With helicopters roaring overhead, police earlier entered the city, normally a picturesque tourist destination, from several sides. They marched up to a final metal barrier blocking the center, but pulled back as protesters armed with sticks attacked them from behind, hurling burning tires. The air filled with black smoke and tear gas.

Some demonstrators used syringes to pierce their arms and legs, then painted signs in their own blood decrying the police.

As night fell, however, protesters abandoned the center and regrouped at a local university. They pledged to continue their battle to persuade Gov. Ulises Ruiz Ortiz to resign, even as police tore down the banners and tents in the center that had served as demonstration headquarters.

At least eight people have died in the unrest since August, including Brad Will, an American and volunteer correspondent for the Web site Indymedia.org who was shot dead Friday along with two Mexican protesters. Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, had for months resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to quell the protests.

In Oaxaca, the teachers protest is an annual rite that began 26 years ago. The protests are usually peaceful and generally last a week or two, but this year the teachers became infuriated when Ruiz sent police to forcefully remove demonstrators from the city's idyllic squares.

Last week, teachers tentatively ratified an agreement that would allow them to return to classes at an unspecified date and receive 30 percent raises spread over six years. Their unmet central demand, Ruiz's resignation, threatened to undermine the fragile pact.

Police Start Push To Retake Oaxaca (WT/AP)

By Mark Stevenson

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico -- Federal police with assault rifles and riot shields advanced into Oaxaca yesterday, bypassing or extinguishing barricades of burning tires and tree trunks in this normally picturesque tourist destination that has been racked by five months of protests and violence.

Officers in bulky black helmets lined a highway just shy of a sign reading "Welcome to Oaxaca" and used fire extinguishers to douse flames at a roadblock abandoned by retreating demonstrators.

Flanked by armored vehicles, water cannons and bulldozers and with helicopters roaring overhead, they faced a knot of protesters who yelled insults and readied piles of stones to hurl. Some protesters used syringes to pierce their arms and legs, then paint signs decrying the police in blood.

In other parts of the city, columns of police climbed over burned cars and moved past hijacked tractor-trailers, buses and other debris used to block streets, in their march downtown. Instead of offering resistance, many protesters retreated, pledging a massive defensive in the city center.

Some residents emerged from their homes to cheer and wave white flags at marching police.

What began in late May as a teachers strike in this colonial southern Mexican city spiraled into chaos as anarchists, students and Indian groups seized the central plaza and barricaded streets throughout the city to demand the ouster of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz.

Police and state forces, often in plain clothes, have shot at protesters, setting off clashes in which at least eight persons have died.

DOJ_NMG_0087870

President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, resisted repeated calls to send federal forces to Oaxaca until Saturday, a day after gunfire killed a U.S. activist-journalist and two residents.

Although some protesters retreated, others fortified their posts at street blockades, pledging a street-by-street defense against the Federal Preventive Police. Bertha Munoz, one of the movement's leaders, said many of the demonstrators were peaceful.

"How can we confront them? We have already seen the R-15 [rifles] and AK-47s they carry," she said. "What do our people have? Most have just come to bring them flowers."

The Interior Department issued an ominous statement demanding that protesters give up their occupation of the city immediately, but officials said yesterday that they hoped negotiations could avoid further bloodshed.

Protesters accused Mr. Ruiz of rigging his 2004 election and using thugs to kill or intimidate political opponents. They say they will not return home without his resignation.

In Mexico City, several hundred supporters of the Oaxaca protests converged on a hotel where Mr. Ruiz was rumored to be staying, damaging the grounds around the entrance and screaming, "Murderer."

The protesters estimated that 4,000 federal police officers had taken up positions on the edges of the city. There were no official reports, however, on how many officers were sent to Oaxaca, which is the capital of the state of the same name.

Mexican Federal Police And Army Move To Retake Oaxaca (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

OAXACA, Mexico, Oct. 29 — Federal forces moved to take back this picturesque tourist town one cobblestone street at a time on Sunday, bashing through barricades and pushing back activists who had seized the downtown five months ago in an increasingly ugly dispute with the state governor.

Police officers wearing riot gear and carrying shields were backed by water cannons, police helicopters and heavily armed soldiers as they marched from all directions toward Oaxaca's main square, the Zócalo, which used to draw tourists but in recent months has been a giant encampment for an array of groups intent on toppling Ulises Ruiz, the governor of Oaxaca State.

The police, estimated to number in the thousands, met resistance in some areas. Demonstrators clutching rocks and sticks tried to stop them. Buses shuttling police officers to the center of town were pelted with stones, and bonfires in the middle of streets sent huge plumes of smoke into the sky.

By Sunday night, the Zócalo was ringed by police officers in riot gear and appeared to be controlled by federal forces.

The tension here spilled over into Mexico City on Sunday, with supporters of the Oaxaca protesters surrounding a hotel where Governor Ruiz was thought to be staying and shouting: "Murderer! Murderer!"

The operation, ordered by President Vicente Fox in his final month in office, did not become the bloodbath that many had feared. Mr. Fox ordered the raid on Saturday after two protesters and an American activist working as a journalist here were killed Friday, the latest in a string of deaths for which protesters blamed provocateurs linked to the government.

Protesters said the police killed one of their supporters in the raid, although police officials did not confirm the death.

The Fox administration said in a statement on Sunday night that it had acted because state and local authorities could no longer guarantee public security and "radical groups, out of control, had put at risk the peace of the citizenry."

The unrest began in May as a teachers' strike. But when Mr. Ruiz sent the police to break up the peaceful demonstrations, other activists joined in and the situation quickly spiraled out of control.

The original dispute with the teachers was recently settled with a pay raise. The teachers have said they intend to return to classes on Monday, allowing 1.3 million children to resume their studies.

But on Sunday, many demonstrators, some with bandanas pulled over their noses to protect against tear gas, vowed to continue pressing for the removal of Mr. Ruiz. They accuse him of rigging the 2004 gubernatorial election and ruling the state with an iron hand.

"The very hour that the governor leaves, we will stop these protests and go home," said Joel Santiago, 38, who stood on the front lines of one standoff with officers on Sunday. "The people are tired of this man treating us as though we're nothing."

Some residents were clearly tired of the protesters, as well. As troops advanced, some people came out of their homes to applaud their arrival, and what they hoped was the end of the lawlessness that had taken over Oaxaca. "Thank you for coming to the rescue of our city," said Teófilo Rodríguez, 56, a businessman.

Oaxaca, a six-hour drive southeast of Mexico City, is known for its colonial charm, with centuries-old architecture and a distinct regional cuisine. But on Sunday it more closely resembled an urban jungle. Protesters from the Oaxaca People's Popular Assembly, or A.P.P.O., a loose coalition of interests that had laid siege to the Zócalo and taken over radio stations, hustled through the streets, taunting the authorities and then fleeing at each advance.

Protest slogans were painted on buildings everywhere and the burned-out remains of cars and buses litter the roads. On Sunday night, protestors were torching buses in the center of town.

On the main highway leading to Mexico City, police officers in riot gear spent most of Sunday standing in formation, eyeing several hundred protesters manning a barricade of stones and tree trunks 200 feet away.

At one point, a woman approached the officers and stuck white roses and carnations in their all-black uniforms. “It makes me sad that they want to kill my people,” she said. “I want to change their hearts.”

Other demonstrators drew their own blood to protest the arrival of the authorities. They had health workers stick needles in their veins, and the blood that flowed out was then dripped onto street signs and used to paint messages on their chests.

At about 3 p.m., the police officers began advancing. Water cannons were fired on people who did not clear the way. Chaos ensued as men, women and children fled.

Elsewhere, bulldozers cleared some of the hundreds of barricades that had been erected around the town.

The roots of the conflict have less to do with leftist ideology or a peasant uprising than with political patronage and old political rivalries, people here say.

Over the past two decades, as Mexico’s political system has opened up, brutally poor Oaxaca has remained a virtual one-party state, controlled by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, the machinelike organization that ruled the entire country until Mr. Fox’s victory in 2000.

After taking office in a disputed election, Mr. Ruiz eliminated millions in community subsidies and began a series of public works projects that involved condemning land, often taking it from farmers at rock-bottom prices, protesters say. He also forbade marches and protests in the Zócalo, angering groups that routinely used protests to demand more government aid.

“He didn’t realize it, but he was closing the escape valves that let the pressure off,” said Flavio Sosa, the head of the New Left of Oaxaca, a political pressure group, and a leader of the A.P.P.O.

When Mr. Ruiz sent in poorly trained riot police officers to oust striking teachers from the Zócalo on June 14, the crisis began.

“This is a fight about power, about money, and the problem of poverty, as well,” said Rosa Nida Villalobos, the head of Priista Women, a group that supports the governor, in an interview last week. “It’s a monster with a thousand heads and a thousand interests.”

Mexican Police Storm Protesters In Oaxaca (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Reed Johnson

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Oaxaca, Mexico — Thousands of federal riot police using tear gas and water cannons battled demonstrators in this once-picturesque state capital Sunday, prompting striking teachers and leftist groups to abandon the central square they had held for five months.

After hours of smoky clashes in the streets, the end of a political crisis that had left at least nine dead and tested President Vicente Fox came quietly.

With police halted at the edge of the central square, or Zocalo, late Sunday, demonstrators who had encamped there since May demanding the resignation of the state's governor started heading home.

"We've decided we're going to leave this space," said Daniel Reyes, a spokesman for the striking teachers.

But Reyes added that a march was planned for today, ending at the Zocalo.

"This is the heart and the house of the people," he said. "This is ours, and we'll take it back peacefully."

Protest leaders also said that a 15-year-old boy had been shot and killed, a report that could not be verified.

About 4,600 Federal Preventive Police officers moved into the sprawling city of 275,000 people about 230 miles southeast of Mexico City on Sunday morning after three people, including an American, were killed Friday.

With water cannons and riot shields, police dispersed protesters from behind barricades of rocks, tree trunks and sheet metal.

They were met with taunts, pleas, scoldings and the occasional hurled rock. Some demonstrators threw Molotov cocktails, triggering a return volley of tear gas.

Police then retreated to the edge of the Zocalo and waited for several hours before protesters started leaving about sundown.

Most of the resistance appeared to be peaceful. Many protesters stood face to face with the rows of incoming officers, chanting slogans. Others cut themselves with knives and syringes, smearing their blood on placards and the Mexican flag. Local websites reported about 50 arrests.

Protest leaders voiced anger at police tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0087872

"The police came in fighting, as is their habit," Flavio Sosa, a leader of the protest coalition, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, said in a radio interview.

The federal forces were dispatched over the weekend by Fox to end an increasingly ugly standoff between local government authorities and the union representing 70,000 striking public school teachers.

The dispute over better pay and working conditions had mushroomed into a larger political struggle as a loose coalition of trade unionists, indigenous groups, anarchists and leftist activists backed the teachers' call for Gov. Ulises Ruiz to resign.

Teachers union leader Enrique Rueda Pacheco said the protesters' demand for Ruiz's resignation was not negotiable.

"We don't agree with an operation of this nature they will resolve the conflict, because it's not going to resolve it," Rueda Pacheco said in a radio interview. "There are going to remain some wounds that this police operation isn't going to be able to wipe away."

The protesters accuse Ruiz of rigging the 2004 gubernatorial election, and more generally of maintaining the system of autocratic rule and patronage politics used by his Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, during the 71 years it held a virtual monopoly on Mexican government.

Ruiz, speaking to local media Sunday, ruled out resignation.

Famous for its graceful colonial-era buildings and vibrant indigenous cuisine and art, the city of Oaxaca is now a trash-strewn, graffiti-covered combat zone that has seen its normally flourishing tourist trade fall drastically.

Fox's decision to send in federal police, after insisting for months the standoff was a local problem, caps a strategic battle to wrest control of the state capital without sparking a major altercation at a time of great political tension nationwide.

The country has been on edge for months after a disputed presidential election in July, escalating drug-related violence along the U.S. border and the Pacific coast, and a high-profile street brawl in May pitting federal and state police against residents of the town of San Salvador Atenco, near Mexico City.

A week ago, it seemed the conflict in Oaxaca might be at an end, after teachers tentatively agreed to return to work in exchange for a 30% raise over six years.

But the killing of American journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, and two Mexican men Friday apparently prompted Fox to send in federal police, ostensibly to prevent further bloodshed.

Will, a photojournalist with an Internet-based alternative news agency, was shot in the abdomen while trying to conduct interviews at a street barricade.

Fox has been criticized by political opponents who charge that by not intervening sooner in Oaxaca, the federal government was seeking to placate Ruiz, because Fox's successor, President-elect Felipe Calderon, will need the support of the PRI to govern.

Fox's decision to send police to Oaxaca also goes against a long-standing reticence to use federal forces against protesters, after the government's brutal suppression of demonstrations in the 1960s and 1970s during the so-called dirty war sparked international condemnation.

The long-term aftermath for Fox and Calderon is unclear. The Zocalo, once filled with the tents of protesters, began to be covered again — this time with the tarps of soldiers and police.

Brazil's Da Silva Wins Re-Election, But Campaign Rifts May Persist (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett And Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Using charisma and a common touch to overcome corruption scandals, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva easily won a second four-year term in Brazil's balloting.

Mr. da Silva, a pragmatic leftist who gained respect from financial markets in his first term, led centrist challenger Geraldo Alckmin by 60.8% to 39.2%, with 99.6% of the vote counted.

Despite the wide margin of victory, Mr. da Silva, Brazil's first blue-collar president, will face a formidable challenge to heal the rifts left by a bitter, bruising campaign that played on class and regional differences. Fallout from the electoral fight, including a criminal investigation of alleged smear tactics by operatives of Mr. da Silva's Workers Party, could undercut Mr. da Silva's ability to push the legislative changes needed to spark Brazil's slow-growing economy.

DOJ_NMG_0087873

To overcome a series of corruption scandals during his administration, Mr. da Silva rallied his base using a strategy of attacking "elites," who he warned would cut social-welfare programs. The results of yesterday's election exposed deep divisions within Brazilian society.

Mr. da Silva won 77% of the vote in the vast, arid Northeast, where the president was born and where people tend to be poorer, darker-skinned and less-educated than in the South of Brazil. The Northeast has benefited from the administration's program to provide welfare stipends to poor families.

But Mr. Alckmin won in the more developed South, outpolling Mr. da Silva 53%-47%. Mr. Alckmin also won by four points in his home state of São Paulo, center of much of Brazil's industry and media. Overall, Mr. da Silva won in four of Brazil's five geographical regions. The shrillness of the campaign prompted two of Brazil's newsmagazines to devote recent cover stories to the polarization between the country's poorer north and richer south. "Two Brazils after the vote?" asked one publication, Veja, while another, IstoE, exhorted, "We must unite Brazil."

The wounds left by the election may make it harder for Mr. da Silva to take steps to boost an economy that has grown an average of 2.8% a year during his first term, far below the pace of Brazil's emerging-market peers. Economists say Brazil needs to overhaul its labor, tax and social-security laws to shrink government and make the business environment less costly and bureaucratic.

Mr. da Silva will have to move quickly. "His best chance to get the needed reforms passed will be early into his administration, since his power will decline the closer he gets to the end of his second term," says Susan Kaufman Purcell, director of the Center for Hemispheric Policy at the University of Miami. Brazilian presidents are constitutionally barred from a third successive term.

Mr. da Silva may well begin his second term ensnarled in further controversy. Mr. Alckmin's coalition has motioned for Brazil's Electoral Court to investigate whether Mr. da Silva used his office to plot and later cover up a case in which Workers Party operatives were caught with $770,000 that prosecutors allege they were going to use to buy a bogus dossier linking a leading opposition politician to a procurement scam.

If the court finds that Mr. da Silva was involved, the attorney general could file suit to strip the president of his office. Mr. da Silva has denied involvement and hasn't been charged. Most analysts don't envision such a scenario. "If the dossier has not done [Mr. da Silva] in by now, it is improbable it will in the future," says Johns Hopkins University Latin America scholar Riordan Roett.

But dealing with the dossier mess could dissipate the da Silva administration's energies and make it harder to coexist with Mr. Alckmin's Social Democratic Party, the main opposition. In a radio interview last week, former Social Democratic President Fernando Henrique Cardoso said the party wouldn't seek to impeach Mr. da Silva. But he added, "That doesn't mean mistakes go unpunished. ... Are we going to pretend [the dossier affair] doesn't exist?"

With many of his closest allies having been forced to resign because of corruption scandals, Mr. da Silva has been reaching out to some business and political heavyweights who might bring new blood into a second-term administration. In the past few months, Mr. da Silva has been courting industrialists, including Jorge Gerdau, chairman of the giant steelmaker Gerdau SA, say people familiar with the matter.

Mr. da Silva is also considering an administration post for Antonio Delfim Netto, a former finance minister during a relatively prosperous period of the 1970s known as the "Brazilian Miracle," according to local media reports and political watchers. Besides being well-regarded by business, Mr. Netto is a member of a large party whose support Mr. da Silva will need to push his agenda through Congress.

Despite political roadblocks, Brazil's economy has some trends working in its favor. Besides healthy international demand for Brazilian commodities, such as soybeans and iron ore, Brazilian interest rates have been moving steadily downward. They have fallen to 13.75% from 19% a year ago.

Brazil's President Roars Back To Win Vote (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 29 — Overcoming a series of corruption and political scandals that tarred his image and undermined his credibility, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil won a landslide re-election victory in a runoff vote on Sunday.

With 99 percent of the vote counted, Mr. da Silva, a former factory worker and labor union leader running as the candidate of the left-wing Workers Party, had 60.8 percent of the vote. The percentage of the vote going to his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin of the center-left Brazilian Social Democratic Party, dropped in comparison with the 41.6 percent he won in the first round of balloting on Oct. 1, when Mr. da Silva fell just short of the majority he needed to win outright.

"This is an extraordinary result, one that gives him a legitimacy that all the accusations had perhaps broken," said Jairo Nicolau, a television commentator and political science professor at the Candido Mendes University here, referring to Mr. da Silva. "It's one thing to win a narrow victory and something else altogether to register this level of support after all that has happened."

Wearing a T-shirt that proclaimed "The victory is Brazil's," Mr. da Silva spoke to supporters at a hotel in São Paulo on Sunday night, saying that "Brazil is living a magical moment" and expressing his gratitude to voters for their faith in him. "The people knew how to distinguish between what was true and what wasn't," he said, before adding that he had "learned a lot" in power and promising to make a greater effort to combat corruption.

Mr. da Silva took office in January 2003, promising a new era of social justice and clean government in this nation of 185 million people, the world's fourth-largest democracy. But his luster began to fade a year later, when an aide was caught on film soliciting campaign donations from numbers-game kingpins here.

Then, in May of last year, a much larger scandal erupted. Though it was initially limited to corruption in government contracts, investigations by congressional committees and the news media soon established the existence of an illegal multimillion-dollar slush fund used to finance Mr. da Silva's 2002 campaign, and to pay off legislators from small political parties to support his government.

The metastasizing scandals forced the resignation of Mr. da Silva's chief of staff and his minister of finance, as well as the president, treasurer and secretary general of the party Mr. da Silva founded in 1980 and has led ever since. As a result, opinion polls taken late last year consistently indicated that the president would be defeated if he ran for re-election.

To make matters worse, the police last month apprehended operatives of Mr. da Silva's party as they were about to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently thought would damage Mr. Alckmin's chances. Though that weakened Mr. da Silva in the first round of balloting, he benefited from an improved economy and a welfare program that delivers a monthly stipend of about $45 to nearly 12 million poor families.

"Lula's turnaround is based mostly on the economy," said Alberto Carlos Almeida, a political scientist. "That, combined with the social programs, gives the electorate the impression that he is really taking care of the poor. There is the appearance of stability, and so people want continuity."

After being chastised by the first-round vote on Oct. 1, Mr. da Silva adopted a new campaign slogan: "Don't trade the sure thing for the dubious." That clearly resonated with the working-class voters who have always provided his electoral base.

"Lula cares about the poor, and that's what matters to me, more than all this talk about corruption, which we've always had," Jane Cunha, a 56-year-old maid, said at a polling place here Sunday morning. "I earn the minimum wage, and thanks to him, my salary has gone up $20 a month and the price of food has gone down enough that I'm eating a lot more meat than in the past."

Mr. da Silva has governed on the right, at least as regards his conservative economic policy. He has run up the kind of budget surpluses that delight Wall Street and the International Monetary Fund, and bank profits are at an all-time high.

But in recent weeks, he has "campaigned on the left," in the words of Marco Aurelio Garcia, Mr. da Silva's national security adviser. A loan repayment to the I.M.F., for example, was repackaged as Mr. da Silva giving the organization its walking papers, and telling it to keep its nose out of Brazil's affairs.

In addition, the president repeatedly accused Mr. Alckmin of planning to dismantle the government's social welfare programs and to privatize state-owned companies and banks.

"Alckmin was pushed to the right and placed on the defensive, and was never able to get out of that posture," Mr. Nicolau said. "He could neither defend himself nor offer his own program."

As is often the case, the candidates' personalities also played a part in voters' calculations. Mr. da Silva never passed up an opportunity to refer to his humble origins, similar to those of a majority of the electorate, while Mr. Alckmin, a physician whose specialty is anesthesiology, proved unable to shake his image as a bland and somewhat pedantic son of the middle class.

"I think Alckmin had the better platform, but he lacks charisma," said Renato Bruzzi, a 57- year-old engineer who voted for the challenger nonetheless. "Lula is a fighter and the people identify with him. Alckmin is well-qualified to be a good president. But he has that professorial air that irritates people a bit."

Mr. Alckmin sought to capitalize on the corruption scandals, making them the centerpiece of his campaign. But he was perceived as being too aggressive on the subject, and the lack of progress in the official investigation of the dossier scandal undermined his argument that Mr. da Silva was ultimately responsible.

"Because of all the corruption denunciations, I voted for Alckmin in the first round, based on emotion," said Valmir Moura, a 38-year-old office clerk here. "But this time I stopped to reason things through, and I realized his whole campaign is based on nothing but accusations and that he hasn't presented a program for governing. So I went back to Lula."

Brazilian President Wins Second Term By Sizable Margin (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANIERO, Oct. 29 -- Brazilians cast a vote of confidence for President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva on Sunday, granting a landslide victory to the former union leader whose first term was marked by a significant reduction of poverty and by corruption scandals that implicated some of his closest aides.

Lula received about 60 percent of the votes, outpacing former Sao Paulo state Gov. Geraldo Alckmin by more than 20 points.

During the campaign, Lula cast himself as the champion of the country's poor, touting a 19 percent decrease in poverty rates, minimum wage increases and millions of new jobs. But he also had to defend himself against several corruption allegations, the most recent of which was an accusation that his campaign had paid for damaging information against his political opponents. That accusation dominated headlines before the first-round vote on Oct. 1, when Lula narrowly failed to win a majority, forcing Sunday's runoff against Alckmin.

During a victory speech Sunday night, Lula thanked voters for rejecting the allegations and credited a rising standard of living among the poor as a key to his victory.

"Above all, the people felt they were improving -- no one can be opposed to that idea," Lula said. "The people felt -- at their tables, on their plates and in their pockets -- their lives getting better."

Lula, 61, grew up in poverty, dropping out of school in the fifth grade and working as a shoeshine boy, peanut vendor and lathe operator. During the country's military dictatorship of the 1970s and '80s, he became a union leader and a prominent voice of opposition. He was elected president of the world's fifth-largest country in 2002, becoming a by-the-bootstraps symbol of success in a country where two-thirds of the population lives on less than $500 a month.

His first term's signature program extended welfare benefits to more than 11 million low-income families on the condition that their children attend school and get health checkups. Such programs have helped increase the spending power of the poorest tenth of the population by about 23 percent.

"During the first round, I didn't vote for Lula because of all of the corruption, but this time -- at the last minute -- I decided to vote for him," said Lucia Moraes de Souza, 42, a cashier in a market here. "He has done a lot to help the poor and the middle classes. Alckmin to me looks like he was born rich."

Alckmin, 54, a former doctor, had pinned much of his election hopes on the scandals, which began more than a year ago with congressional vote-buying evidence against Lula's political party. That scandal forced cabinet minister Jose Dirceu to resign. Lula's finance minister also stepped down after being accused of involvement in a kickback scheme for municipal contracts. Alckmin tried to cast himself as a counterpoint, adopting the slogan: "For a Decent Brazil."

"People have had enough of the scandals. They don't want to hear about them anymore," Rogerio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo, said before Sunday's balloting. "There has been little new evidence of wrongdoing, so very few people are paying attention to it."

Alckmin's promises of lower taxes and more rapid growth of the gross domestic product also failed to energize voters. That the economy grew by only about 2.5 percent last year -- one of the most sluggish rates in Latin America -- seemed less important to many voters than the lowered inflation and currency gains of the past four years. For many, Alckmin was simply the person to direct protest votes toward, a passive foil in an election completely defined by the charismatic but controversial Lula.

"This has nothing to do with Alckmin," said Gerson Costa, 37, a graphic designer who voted for Alckmin on Sunday. "It's a clear referendum on Lula. In 2002, I voted for Lula because I thought, 'This guy will be different.' I was wrong, and now I can't stand him."

During his first term, Lula approached foreign policy pragmatically, preferring to play the role of negotiator rather than firebrand. Lula has preserved free-market economic reforms implemented by his predecessor, Fernando Henrique Cardoso, and has tried to serve as a communicator able to maintain generally friendly relations with both Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez and President Bush. On Sunday he said that he has tried to encourage regional trade alliances, citing his strong support of South America's Mercosur trading bloc as an example of his regional leadership.

Analysts said that in his second term, Lula will be pressured to enact major reforms of Brazil's large labor sector and enormous pension system, which many believe could prevent the country from reaching growth rates needed to sustain the poverty reduction measures Lula achieved during his first term.

Brazil's President Easily Wins 2nd Term (AP)

AP, October 30, 2006

President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva brushed aside corruption allegations and won re-election in a landslide as Brazilians rewarded their first working-class leader for diminishing grinding poverty and improving the economy of Latin America's largest nation.

The leftist former union leader cruised to a runoff victory Sunday with strong support from tens of millions of poor voters, easily topping center-right rival Geraldo Alckmin, whose tepid campaign style and robotic image failed to win over ordinary Brazilians.

With 99 percent of the votes counted, Silva had 61 percent support compared to 39 percent for Alckmin, Sao Paulo state's former governor.

"We're going to do a lot better in my second term than we did in the first," Silva told cheering supporters in a Sao Paulo hotel. "The foundation is in place, and now we have to get to work."

Beaming in a white T-shirt emblazoned with "It's Brazil's Victory" in the yellow and green colors of the Brazilian flag, Silva promised to boost growth and reduce inequality to put the country on track to reach the ranks of developed nations.

Alckmin congratulated Silva in a telephone call, then told reporters he planned to stay in politics but didn't outline his next steps. He made no reference to the corruption allegations against Silva's party that he pressed during the campaign.

"Life and democracy are similar. Sometimes you win, sometimes you have hard times," Alckmin said.

Silva's win came after Alckmin made a surprisingly strong showing in a first round of voting on Oct. 1. The vote went to a second round after Silva failed to get 50 percent plus one vote required for an outright win.

But Silva had the firm support of Brazil's poor, who have benefited over the past three years as Silva increased social spending without raising taxes. Silva also overcame corruption scandals that tarnished the image of his administration.

While Alckmin was seen as more business-friendly, investors and big business from Brazil to Wall Street gave high marks to Silva's conservative economic policies that prompted slow and sustainable economic growth with rising foreign investment.

While Silva came to power four years ago by employing strong leftist rhetoric, he ended up governing as a centrist and is considered much more moderate than South American leftist leaders like Bolivia's Evo Morales and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. Analysts said Silva probably won't change much in his second term.

His Workers Party has been battered for two years by charges of vote-buying and illegal campaign financing, scandals that have cost the former labor leader and lathe operator his reputation as a bastion of political ethics.

Nearly 126 million Brazilians voted in Sunday's runoff elections for president and for governor in 10 of Brazil's 27 states.

Polls before the first round of voting had predicted Silva would win outright then, but his campaign was tripped up after the news media ran photos of $770,000 in cash that members of his Workers Party allegedly planned to spend purchasing an incriminating file about Alckmin and his allies.

Regardless, Alckmin failed to make the corruption charges stick to Silva during the second round.

Instead, Silva battered his opponent with accusations that the former governor of Brazil's richest state would privatize cherished state industries and end the popular Family Allowance program that provides monthly payouts to 11 million poor families as long as they keep their children in school and get them vaccinated.

Silva managed to funnel more money to the program because of the country's improving economy and through more aggressive tax collection, and Alckmin was forced to defend himself by saying he would maintain the program, which has helped lift millions out of poverty.

Also, Silva managed to reduce Brazil's notoriously high inflation through high interest rates, and prices of staples such as rice and beans even dropped.

Aloisio Pisco, a 36-year-old doorman, said Silva's handling of the economy earned him the right to a second term.

"Lula, he's the best; he's created jobs and prices are cheaper," Pisco said after voting in Sao Paulo.

Others said Alckmin deserved high marks for his adept administration of Sao Paulo state.

"I thought Alckmin was better prepared to become president," said Reginaldo Fernando Pittarelli, 29-year-old machinery designer. "And I would have never voted for Lula because of all the corruption surrounding his government."

Lula Wins Easy Victory In Brazil Election (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley In São Paulo

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil won a decisive victory in the country's presidential election last night.

With 99 per cent of the votes counted, Mr Lula da Silva had won 60.8 per cent compared with 39.2 per cent for his challenger, Geraldo Alckmin, of the centrist opposition PSDB.

DOJ_NMG_0087877

With victory secure, Mr Lula da Silva told supporters he would follow “tough fiscal policies” in his second mandates. He added: “At the same time, I am convinced that the solution for Brazil’s problems [lies in] economic growth and income distribution,” including increases in the national minimum wage at rates ahead of the rate of inflation.

He predicted Brazil’s economy would accelerate next year because of increased investments in ports, roads and other infrastructure projects. “We have already predicted for next year an expansion of 5 per cent. I think Brazil may grow by 5 per cent or 6 per cent.” Brazil’s economy is expected to grow about 3 per cent this year.

The president was forced into a surprise second-round run-off after failing to win an outright majority in the first round on October 1, when Brazilians also voted for state governorships and state and federal legislatures.

Then, Mr Lula da Silva won 48.6 per cent of the vote against 41.6 per cent for Mr Alckmin. The vote for Mr Alckmin was bigger than predicted and appeared to have given him a chance of victory in the run-off.

Mr Lula da Silva has won solid support among the country’s poor – the majority of voters – for his income distribution initiatives and other welfare programmes. Before the first round he was expected to win an outright majority mainly on the basis of overwhelming support in the poorer north-east of the country.

But his lead evaporated before the first round when members of his Workers’ party (PT) campaign team were implicated in an attempt to smear the opposition’s candidate for the governorship of São Paulo state. The scandal served as a reminder of the string of corruption allegations that have dogged Mr Lula da Silva’s administration for much of his four-year term.

The president pulled ahead quickly in campaigning for the second round after he and his aides began branding the PSDB as a rightwing party adverse to any state involvement in the economy.

They made particular play of the former PSDB government’s record on privatisation. Large parts of the state economy were privatised in the 1990s and, although standards of public services such as telephony have improved dramatically, public service tariffs have also risen sharply and privatisation remains deeply unpopular.

The PT’s anti-liberal rhetoric during the second round has caused consternation among many economists, who see it as a sign that spending cuts, needed to release money for investment and growth, are less likely under a second Lula administration than the first.

Brazil's Lula Captures A Second Term (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Marcelo Soares

The Los Angeles Times, October 30, 2006

Sao Paulo, Brazil — A chastened President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won a landslide victory Sunday, gaining a second term as leader of Latin America's largest nation.

With 99% of the ballots counted, official tallies showed the leftist incumbent with 61% of the vote, compared with 39% for his challenger, former Sao Paulo Gov. Geraldo Alckmin of the centrist Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

As the victory became clear and the chief of the electoral court declared the lead insurmountable, Alckmin called the president Sunday evening to offer congratulations.

Polls had shown the president, known as Lula, leading by more than 20 percentage points going into Sunday's vote after he failed to garner a simple majority to win the Oct. 1 general election.

Analysts said Lula's unremitting portrayal of Alckmin as a corporate lackey intent on giving away the government to private investors put the challenger on the defensive.

On the streets of this industrial city, activists wearing the red of Lula's Workers' Party started celebrating before the official results were announced.

"We in Brazil have the second opportunity to elect a working man," said Rosangela Rigo, 42, a psychologist dressed in red who was waiting in line for a movie after voting for Lula.

A smiling, relaxed Lula struck a magnanimous tone as he voted at a state school in Sao Bernardo do Campo, the industrial suburb near here where he got his start as an up-from-the-assembly-line union activist confronting corrupt bosses and the former military dictatorship.

'Magic moment'

Despite his first-round disappointment, Lula thanked God for the runoff vote, calling it a "magic moment" that galvanized his supporters.

"It was a way for the people to demand more of the candidates," Lula said of the second-round vote. "I'm happy because the Brazilian people recognized the work of the past four years and were very generous."

In brief remarks, Lula returned to trademark themes, promising to enhance education and improve income distribution in a nation of 185 million people that is widely regarded as among the world's more unequal societies.

Alckmin's candidacy was always a long shot, but corruption scandals swirling around Lula and his party sapped support and forced the runoff.

Several minor leftist candidates dismayed at Lula's economic pragmatism and his party's corruption also drew support away from the president in the Oct. 1 election. But the runoff featured two candidates, and many on the left seemed to think they had no choice but to vote for Lula.

"I voted painfully for Lula," said Cristina Figueiro, 35, a lawyer in Sao Paulo. "But when it comes to the second round, one has to choose between the dirty and the badly washed."

The president's backers said Lula would probably emerge stronger than ever after Sunday's vote. But opponents countered that Lula's poor early showing meant he would have to compromise more with the opposition on a range of economic and social challenges confronting Brazil.

Lacking a majority in Congress, Lula will be obliged to form coalitions to help push through his planned reforms.

The president has pledged to expand social service programs for the poor and working class, bolster the minimum wage, bring down interest rates and increase a desultory economic growth rate that has deeply worried many Brazilians, as has increasing crime.

Survived a scandal

Days before the Oct. 1 vote, the news media in Brazil published photographs showing stacks of cash totaling more than $700,000 that Lula backers allegedly planned to use to purchase information incriminating Alckmin's party.

Lula was forced to dismiss several advisors, and the scandal cost him votes in the first election.

Lula started off the second phase of the campaign slowly, stumbling in the first of four debates and acknowledging his poor performance. He had avoided debates altogether in the first round, apparently confident of victory.

But the charismatic incumbent eventually gained momentum and flashed the populist charm that helped propel him to office in 2002 on his fourth try at the presidency.

In the monthlong campaign, Lula, 61, painted Alckmin as a technocrat eager to slice social service programs begun during Lula's term and sell off public assets such as the national bank, postal service, the government-owned energy conglomerate Petrobras, and even the Amazon.

Alckmin denied the charges, at times donning jackets and caps emblazoned with the logos of state-owned companies. But his party's history of privatizing government assets left many poor and working-class workers wary that he might cater to his wealthy supporters at their expense.

"State ownership versus privatization became a mandatory theme in the political debate," said Helgio Trindade, a political scientist in Porto Alegre.

Some observers said Alckmin might have overplayed his image as a competent executive poised to topple Brazil's first working-class president. Lula's supporters rallied to the cry of defending the "people's president."

Alckmin "showed himself as a good manager, the manager of Brazil Co. But Brazil is not a private company, it's a country, and he was not prepared for that kind of debate," said Demetrio Magnoli, a sociologist and columnist in Sao Paulo.

Many Brazilians have commented on the need to heal wounds after an acrimonious campaign that revealed stark divisions between the poor north, where Lula ran strong, and the comparatively wealthy south, the base of Alckmin's support.

Experts have spoken of a U.S.-style red state vs. blue state rift that threatens to divide the country even more in coming years.

"You know I am a peaceful man," Lula said during one of his final campaign stops, his reelection seemingly assured. "Political parties understand that there's a time to fight and a time to vote and manage the country."

Brazilian President Lula Da Silva Wins Runoff (MCT)

By Jack Chang

McClatchy Newspapers, October 30, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil - Having survived corruption scandals and desertions by longtime allies, Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won re-election Sunday in a landslide victory that promises to strengthen his weakened government.

With 90.6 percent of polling places counted Sunday night, the 61-year-old former union leader won 60.5 percent of the vote in the runoff, while challenger Geraldo Alckmin, the former governor of the country's richest and most populous state, garnered 39.4 percent of votes. Brazilians also voted in 10 gubernatorial runoff elections.

DOJ_NMG_0087879

The results confirmed public opinion polls showing the president running away with the second-round election after doing more poorly than predicted in the Oct. 1 first-round vote and falling short of the majority he would have needed for an outright win.

The victory also capped a tumultuous first term in office, during which the president weathered a revolt by the radical wing of his center-left Workers' Party and almost succumbed to a wave of corruption scandals.

Political analysts said the president's first-round chances were hurt after members of his party and campaign were caught in mid-September allegedly trying to mount a failed smear campaign against Alckmin and another rival. The president had already spent much of last year mired in a bribes-for-votes scandal involving top administration officials.

"We didn't have any new developments in this latest scandal, so that played in Lula's favor in the second round," said Alessandra Alde, a political scientist at the University Research Institute of Rio de Janeiro. "People are skeptical of their politicians and think they're all the same, so these scandals always had a limited effect."

What put the president on top were a solid, if unspectacular, economy and social programs that transferred billions of dollars in welfare aid to Brazil's poorest, voters and analysts said. The president's humble origins - he was the son of illiterate parents in the country's poor northeast - also won over many voters.

His policies apparently had its effects. Between 2003 and 2005, the number of people in extreme poverty dropped 19 percent, one study shows.

"He helped people who were never given any attention to," said Deise de Oliveira, an accountant from a working-class Rio de Janeiro neighborhood who voted for Lula. "He did good things despite the scandals. He's with the poor, while Alckmin is with the elites."

Another Lula supporter, teacher Melissa Ferreira, said the president had broken with past governments by giving federal investigators free rein to weed out corruption, which had always existed.

"Corruption is a thing that didn't just start now," Ferreira said. "It's only appearing now because Lula's government is looking into it."

Alckmin and other critics say the president used aid programs to buy the votes of poor Brazilians and say his government set a new low for scandal. They also point out that many of the government's aid programs started under former President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, who hails, along with Alckmin, from the centrist Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

"The money is helping people, but they've become hostages to it," said Rio de Janeiro public school principal Tony Menezes, who voted for Alckmin Sunday. "They receive this help, and they don't want to lose it, so they vote for Lula."

Speaking to reporters Sunday morning after voting in a suburb of Sao Paulo city, Lula was already proclaiming victory.

"The re-election is an important thing," he said. "I am happy because the Brazilian people recognized the work of these four years and were very generous."

Alckmin, deserted in the end by many of his political allies, was still betting on an upset victory as he voted in a Sao Paulo neighborhood Sunday morning.

The second-round campaign was marked by ideological debates, with the president accusing Alckmin of planning to privatize state-owned companies and cut welfare benefits to poor Brazilians.

Alckmin scurried to defuse the president's attacks while hammering the incumbent over accusations of government corruption.

Despite the rhetorical sparring, the candidates' platforms were not very different, Alde said. Both candidates pushed pro-business platforms such as running primary budget surpluses and checking inflation although Alckmin has said he would more aggressively cut government spending.

That orthodox fiscal policy cost Lula, in the first years of his presidency, the support of many longtime allies who left the Workers' Party accusing the president of betraying his radical roots.

Two party defectors, senators Cristovam Buarque and Heloisa Helena Lima de Moraes Carvalho, ran against Lula this year and between them amassed more than 9 percent of the first-round vote.

Nonetheless, Lula's party emerges from this election season as a political force, controlling the second largest group of representatives in the lower house of the federal Congress and at least four of the country's 27 governorships. Lula also will start his final four-year term with the support of at least 17 governors.

The country's top electoral official, however, has said the president could be removed from office if continuing investigations into the failed smear campaign reveal wrongdoing on his part.

Brown To Back More Emissions Trading (FT)

By Christopher Adams And Jimmy Burns

Financial Times, October 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087880

Gordon Brown will on Monday throw his weight behind a massive expansion of carbon trading to tackle global warming, rather than raising billions of pounds in green taxes.

The chancellor, flanked by Tony Blair, will useMonday's release of a report by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist and a senior UK civil servant, to propose a sweeping overhaul of Europe's fledgling emissions trading scheme, arguing that climate change is "a global challenge that requires a global solution".

And, in an effort to push climate change up the international agenda, the chancellor will appoint Al Gore, former US vice-president and an environmental campaigner, as an adviser on green issues.

In a letter to European Union leaders, the chancellor will propose cuts in carbon dioxide emissions of 30 per cent by 2020 and of 60 per cent by 2050.

He will suggest that the scheme, under which industrial polluters have to buy credits to emit more than a set level of greenhouse gases, be extended to cover more than half of all emissions and that trading permits should be auctioned.

Mr Brown wants to link the trading scheme with similar markets in California and elsewhere.

But he will face tough questioning over a document leaked at the weekend showing that the government is considering a raft of green taxes on consumers.

The paper, prepared by David Miliband, environment secretary, and submitted to the Treasury ahead of the pre-Budget report, floats measures including: "pay as you drive" road pricing; raising air passenger duty; imposing VAT on EU flights; and levies on energy wasting appliances.

Road tax could also be increased for gas-guzzling cars, it says.

The paper is evidence of a belief in Whitehall that consumers might be prepared to accept higher taxes to tackle global warming. Labour is seeking to boost its environmental credentials amid Conservative support for a shift towards green taxation. David Cameron, Tory leader, said he would back taxing air travel and planned to install a wind turbine on the roof of Downing Street if elected.

Treasury insiders said Mr Brown would consider the Miliband proposals "in the round" and was not ruling anything in or out. "We'll make our decisions about tax at the normal time," said one.

The Stern review, which was commissioned by the government to look at the economics of climate change, warns that failure to tackle global warming will wreak an economic catastrophe.

Changes that would be "difficult or impossible to reverse" threaten to knock 10 to 20 per cent off annual global output by the end of the century.

In contrast, the review argues that acting now to reduce carbon dioxide emissions would cost just one per cent of output. Sir Nicholas also advocates a doubling in global research and development spending on energy to $20bn (£10.6bn) and much greater use of techniques such as carbon capture and storage.

Mr Brown is also expected to announce on Monday measures to boost bio-fuels and to give statutory backing to long-term emissions targets, rather than annual ones as proposed by the Conservatives.

Report To Tell Consumers To Brace For 'Green' Taxes (WT)

By George Jones

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's consumers will be told today to prepare for new "green" taxes on cars, fuel, air travel and consumer electronics to curb pollution and avert a looming global catastrophe caused by climate change.

A report drawn up by Nicholas Stern, the government's chief economist, says that ignoring global warming could lead to economic upheaval on the scale of the 1930s Depression and turn 200 million people into refugees as their homes are hit by drought or flood.

Ministers plan to use the report to pave the way for "eco-taxes" to persuade people to adopt less-polluting lifestyles. A start is likely to be made in the federal budget in the spring.

Environment Secretary David Miliband has proposed an end to cheaper gasoline, even if oil prices fall. In a leaked letter to the treasury secretary, he called for "pay-as-you drive" charges to be extended nationwide, taxes on inexpensive flights and levies on energy-wasting domestic appliances.

Prime Minister Tony Blair and Chancellor Gordon Brown -- Mr. Blair's likely successor when he steps down next year -- were to signal their support for the potentially unpopular message by attending the formal publication of the Stern report in London today.

Mr. Brown will call for a global carbon market and promise to set targets to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions in a climate-change bill. He will announce that former U.S. Vice President Al Gore, a leading advocate of tackling climate change, has agreed to act as his adviser.

DOJ_NMG_0087881

Mr. Stern, whose 700-page report was widely leaked over the weekend, has convinced the Cabinet that urgent action has to be taken now. His report states that no matter what is done, the chance to keep greenhouse gases at a level that scientists say should avoid the worst effects of climate change "is already almost out of reach."

But he says the benefits of worldwide steps to tackle climate change would greatly outweigh the costs.

Mr. Miliband, who is taking the lead in pressing for green taxes, said yesterday that tackling climate change was the "defining challenge for our generation." He acknowledged that the tax system had a part to play, although he refused to comment on the leak of the letter that he sent to the chancellor this month.

"Market-based instruments, including taxes, need to play a substantial role. As our understanding of climate change increases, it is clear that more needs to be done," Mr. Miliband said in the letter obtained by the Mail on Sunday newspaper.

He told Mr. Brown that "a substantial increase" in the tax on higher-emission vehicles should be considered, as well as charging road users for the full environmental effect of their journeys.

He said gasoline prices should be kept high at the pumps by raising fuel taxes if the oil price drops significantly. He proposed charging air passengers an extra $9 per flight and putting a value-added tax on flights to countries of the European Union.

Mr. Miliband also wants to steer consumers toward buying electrical goods that are more energy efficient.

David Cameron, the Conservative Party leader, has said he wants to raise the percentage of revenue that comes from green taxes. "That means we've got to look at things like air transport, like the gas-guzzling cars. We'll come up with those ideas closer to a general election."

He said that he did not want to stop people going on a family vacation but that the Tories would put a tax on air travel if it was thought necessary.

British Government Report Calls For Broad Effort On Climate Issues (NYT)

By Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

A report commissioned by the British government and scheduled for release Monday calls for substantial international cooperation to combat global warming and doubling public spending on research into low-carbon technologies.

The main findings of the 16-month study, led by Sir Nicholas Stern, the chief of Britain's economic service, were described over the weekend in several British news reports. [A] news agency quoted the report's 27-page summary as saying, "The evidence gathered by the review leads to a simple conclusion: the benefits of strong, early action considerably outweigh the costs."

The report, prepared for Tony Blair, the prime minister, and Gordon Brown, the finance minister, has been heavily promoted by Britain and environmental groups as one of the most authoritative reviews of climate costs, although some economists and energy experts at anti-regulatory research groups saw it as understating the cost of an accelerated transition away from the fossil fuels that provide nearly 90 percent of the world's energy today.

The report, called the Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change, will be published online at sternreview.org.uk.

If emissions are not cut and temperatures rise as many scientists project, [a news] agency quoted the report as saying that, among various impacts, melting glaciers would threaten one sixth of the world population by raising sea levels and drying up river sources.

The Observer, a British newspaper, reported that the study cited a figure of £3.68 trillion (the equivalent of $6.98 trillion) as the cost to society of failing to start blunting global warming within a decade.

"Our actions over the coming few decades could create risks of major disruption to economic and social activity, later in this century and in the next, on a scale similar to those associated with the great wars and the economic depression of the first half of the 20th century," the report said, according to [a news agency].

The study estimated that the cost of cutting emissions in 2050 to 60 percent to 80 percent below 1990 levels would be about 1 percent of total global economic activity by then, [a news agency] and The Observer said. If emissions cannot be cut to those levels, the cost from climatic impacts could be 5 to 20 times higher, The Observer cited the study as saying.

The study, according to the news reports, said that progress would best be accomplished by doubling global investment in research on climate-friendly energy technologies and placing a rising cost on further emissions of the greenhouse gases, led by carbon dioxide, to propel the shift toward non-polluting options.

The news reports on the study are consistent with presentations by Sir Nicholas, including a speech last January at Oxford University.

Other recent estimates of the eventual annual costs of stabilizing concentrations of greenhouse gases over the 21st century have ranged from 1 percent of global gross domestic product to 16 percent by around 2100, not counting any savings from averted damage.

By comparison, the world is currently spending just over $1 trillion a year, or about 2.5 percent of global gross global domestic product, on defense, according to a yearly survey by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute. (Military spending in the United States is about 3.7 percent of gross domestic product.)

"This confirms what we've seen for a long time," said Kert Davies, a climate-policy coordinator for Greenpeace. "The longer we take to act, the greater the costs will be."

Jerry Taylor, an expert on energy and climate policy at the Cato Institute, a libertarian research group in Washington, said the wide range of cost estimates for cutting emissions "basically tells you we're guessing."

Overall, he said, he put more faith in academic analyses than one produced at a government's request, particularly at a time when the public appears eager to see signs of action on the issue.

The release of the 700-page report, which was 16 months in the making, will come one week before the start of the latest round of talks on the Kyoto Protocol, the first international pact requiring cuts in heat-trapping emissions.

The United States has not ratified the Kyoto pact but is a party to the voluntary treaty that preceded it, which requires all signatories to seek to avoid a dangerous buildup of greenhouse gases.

The Kyoto Protocol, an addendum to the original treaty, requires three dozen participating industrialized countries to cut their combined emissions 5 percent below 1990 levels between 2008 and 2012.

At the moment, many of the three dozen industrialized countries bound by the pact are not on track to meet targets. And there are few indications of a shift toward accepting binding restrictions in the United States, the world's biggest emitter of greenhouse gases, or China and India, which are projected to be the dominant source of emissions in a couple of decades.

Belgian Role Model (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

Al Gore may have failed to carry his home state of Tennessee as a Presidential candidate, but the former Vice President is all the rage in . . . Belgium. The country has even named a tax after him.

Earlier this month, Mr. Gore spent a day in Brussels to promote his film on global warming. "Our planet has a fever, and the fever has been getting steadily higher," he said in a speech. "It is in fact a full-scale planetary emergency." Within days, Belgian politicians were rewriting their tax laws to do something about this looming calamity.

Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt invoked his American visitor in proposing a new "environmentally friendly" tax on packages that would penalize users of aluminum or plastic and provide incentives to switch to paper or cardboard, whose production releases less CO2 into the atmosphere. The details have yet to be worked out, but the idea is for milk sold in, say, a plastic bottle to cost more than milk sold in a cardboard container.

"We must take Al Gore's message seriously," Mr. Verhofstadt told parliament the other day. The measure, introduced into the draft 2007 budget, was fast dubbed "the Gore tax." Also in the works are tax breaks for car pollution filters and deductions for energy-efficient investors.

To be sure, this Belgian scheme to save the planet also raises a bundle for the politicians to spend, to the tune of roughly €600 million ($750 million) a year. A government spokesman says that the revenue will make up for what it expects to lose from planned reductions in social taxes, which are some of the highest in Europe. Evidently the government figures that dressing the new tax package in Al Gore green will make it go down easier. If the former veep decides he can't beat Hillary Clinton for the 2008 Democratic nomination, he can always try Europe.

Monitors Say Vote On Serbian Constitution Is Too Close To Call (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, October 30, 2006

LJUBLJANA, Serbia, Oct. 29 — Estimates by an independent election monitoring group showed Sunday that a vote on Serbia's new constitution was too close to call.

Official results were not expected until Monday. The monitoring group said its survey showed that 52 percent of voters had approved the document, with a margin of error of two percentage points, making the estimated victory margin statistically insignificant. The proposed constitution needed support from more than 50 percent of voters to pass.

The Center for Free Elections and Democracy, the monitoring group, came up with its figure by interviewing officials at 600 of the country's 2,000 polling places to learn their vote tallies and by extrapolating from them.

The group also watched voting at those and other polling places to check for irregularities. The Belgrade-based group, which has monitored 10 Serbian elections since 2004, has called those elections correctly.

One of the most discussed provisions of the 206-article constitution declared that the province of Kosovo is an "integral part of Serbia." The declaration was symbolic, because the fate of the province lies with the United Nations Security Council, which is likely to vote to enable Kosovo's independence.

Critics of the constitution have said the document would not move the country far enough toward full democracy.

The proposed constitution was drafted and supported by nationalists and pro-democracy reformers in Parliament. Many reformers supported the document despite its flaws because they wanted to make clear to Serbs that they were doing everything they could to hold on to the province.

Reformers feared that the United Nations vote would create a backlash that could lead to gains for the Serbian Radical Party, the leading nationalist party. They also agreed to rush through the drafting of the constitution so it could be in place before the United Nations vote.

Despite the high-profile provision on Kosovo, the document did not seem to excite the populace. Voting was so slow over the weekend that it appeared the constitution might not get the needed votes, which would be a significant embarrassment for the government.

Voting surged late Sunday after an intensive get-out-the-vote campaign in the afternoon. Senior politicians as well as members of the Serbian Orthodox Church issued statements urging people to vote.

"Citizens, get out and circle 'yes' for Serbia, 'yes' for a better life for every citizen," President Boris Tadic was quoted as saying by the state-run Tanjug news agency.

Between 2 p.m. and 8 p.m., when the polls closed, an estimated 20 percent of Serbia's electorate went to the polls. Officials of the monitoring group said they recorded an increase in reports of electoral irregularities during that time. The group did not consider the irregularities significant enough to compromise the vote.

The overall turnout was 53.5 percent, according to the group's survey.

Kosovo is regarded by many Serbs as being central to their national identity. It has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when NATO-led troops took control of the province after 78 days of bombing. NATO wrested Kosovo from the hands of Yugoslav security forces accused of committing widespread atrocities against the majority Albanian population.

Kosovo's future is the subject of United Nations-led negotiations between the Serbian government and ethnic Albanians in the province. The ethnic Albanians want independence, while the Serbian government and the province's small Serbian community demand that Kosovo remain part of Serbia.

Few Western diplomats say the groups will be able to reach agreement, leaving the decision to the United Nations Security Council, which is expected to impose a settlement in the next several months to enable Kosovo to claim independence.

While much of the constitution's contents had been heavily criticized by rights groups as contradictory in parts and giving too much power to Parliament, there was little public debate about its contents. The charter would replace one drafted by the authoritarian government of Slobodan Milosevic in 1990.

Serbia's government worked hard to help ensure the adoption of the new charter. A government-financed publicity campaign urged people to vote "yes," and voting was held over two days in an attempt to draw Serbia's election-weary voters to the polls.

Kosovo's estimated 1.3 million ethnic Albanians were also excluded from the election. Including the Albanians would have increased the number of voters and made it difficult to secure approval of more than 50 percent of the electorate.

"The government gambled," said Bratislav Grubacic, a leading political analyst and editor of the VIP news agency in Belgrade. "They hoped by putting Kosovo in the constitution, they would manage to draw out the Serbian electorate."

Serb Vote Reasserts Claim Over Kosovo (AP)

By Katarina Kratovac

AP, October 30, 2006

Serbia's top leaders said Sunday that voters approved a new constitution reasserting Serbia's claim over the U.N.-administered Kosovo province, a predominantly ethnic Albanian region whose status is the focus of international negotiations.

Election officials and an independent commission also predicted the charter's adoption, based on early returns from the weekend referendum. But official results were not expected until Monday.

Serbia's opposition Liberal Party charged there was "massive fraud" at polling stations in the final hours of voting, with people allegedly voting several times and without identification papers.

DOJ_NMG_0087884

Western diplomats had already warned that only the international talks can decide the future of Kosovo, which ethnic Albanians want to be independent. But Serbian politicians hope the new charter will bolster their bargaining position. Ethnic Serbs consider Kosovo the historic and cultural heartland of their nation.

Independence-seeking ethnic Albanians form 90 percent of the population in Kosovo, which has been under U.N. administration since U.S.-led NATO air strikes halted a Serb crackdown on the separatists in 1999.

The need for a new constitution arose in June after Montenegro — Serbia's last partner from the former Yugoslav federation — declared independence and left Serbia on its own for the first time since 1918.

To win adoption, the charter needed to get "yes" votes from more than 50 percent of Serbia's 6.6 million registered voters and a majority of registered voters also had to cast ballots to make the referendum valid.

The Belgrade-based Center for Free Elections and Democracy, an independent monitoring group, said its surveys indicated both thresholds were met. It put turnout at 53.3 percent and said its sample counts at polls indicated 96 percent of ballots favored the new charter.

State referendum authorities announced similar results, saying 96 percent voted in favor of the new charter — based on just under 11 percent of ballots counted — and estimated turnout at 53.6 percent.

Those figures would produce a "yes" vote of just over 51 percent of all registered voters.

Serbia's conservative Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica and pro-Western President Boris Tadic both proclaimed victory for the constitution.

"This is a great moment for Serbia," Kostunica told Serbian state television. "This is a historic moment, a beginning of a new era."

Tadic said a "huge job is now behind us." He said the "best thing about this constitution is that we now leave behind us" the charter adopted during the regime of the late autocratic leader Slobodan Milosevic.

Kostunica said the turnout was "adequate, considering that opponents chose to boycott the vote" rather than cast "no" votes. "We have reasons to be very happy."

The referendum was strongly condemned by ethnic Albanians, who have long boycotted any ballot under Serb auspices and were not listed on the voter rolls, purportedly for that reason.

Some government opponents and nongovernment organizations also criticized the charter as hastily drafted and flawed on issues such as independence of the judiciary, equal rights for minorities and autonomy for local governments.

In Serbia's northern Vojvodina province, where turnout was very low, provincial assembly speaker Bojan Kostres accused authorities of "forcing the new constitution" on the people.

"The final voting hours were very strange, with a sudden, steep rise in turnout," Kostres said.

For many Serbs, the charter's key point was its declaration that Kosovo is an "integral part of Serbia."

Serbs in Kosovo began celebrating even before official results were announced. Hundreds gathered Sunday night in Kosovska Mitrovica, waving banners, cheering and shouting "Kosovo is the heart of Serbia" as NATO peacekeepers watched and dispatched reinforcements to the scene.

Bulgarian President Wins Re-election: Partial Results (AFP)

By Diana Simeonova

AFP, October 30, 2006

Bulgarian President Georgy Parvanov won re-election with an unassailable lead in his run-off battle against ultra-nationalist challenger Volen Siderov, the central electoral committee said based on partial results.

The electoral committee said a count of 98.11 percent of the ballots cast gave the 49-year-old incumbent 75.7 percent of the vote, while his rival scored 24.3 percent.

Turnout by 7:00 pm (1700 GMT) was 41.2 percent, it added.

"This is an unprecedented, historic result," Parvanov told a news conference late Sunday.

"The result is a recognition of the policies we followed during our first five-year term," he said, adding that he would continue to be a president with "a clear social engagement at home".

He also promised to continue what he called his "active" and "consistent" foreign policy.

"It will be oriented towards securing a dignified European Union membership, and at the same time maintaining our national identity and working in solidarity with our European partners."

Parvanov, a pro-European former leader of the Socialist Party who prided himself in being "the president of all Bulgarians," won the first ballot last weekend with a commanding lead of 64 percent against Siderov's 21.5 percent but failed to avert a run-off as voter participation was below 50 percent.

No minimum turnout was required in the second round.

DOJ_NMG_0087885

Parvanov is the first Bulgarian president to be re-elected since the fall of communism in 1989, and is now all but certain to fulfill his dream of presiding over the official entry of his Balkan nation into the European Union on January 1.

Support for the youthful 49-year-old leader has surged since he first took office in 2001, making him Bulgaria's most popular and trusted politician.

Under his leadership, Bulgaria joined NATO in 2004 and earlier this year received the green light to join the EU in two months' time.

Parvanov also played a key role in the formation of the current Socialist-led government after inconclusive general elections in June last year and the ensuing political deadlock threatened to stall reforms and postpone EU accession.

Parvanov also supported the signing this year of an agreement to set up three US military facilities in Bulgaria.

At the same time, he has worked to thaw Bulgarian-Russian relations, which have deteriorated badly since the fall of communism.

A proponent of ethnic tolerance, he developed good relations with the Turkish minority Movement for Rights and Freedoms party. He was fiercely attacked as a "Turkish puppet" by runner-up Siderov, known for his hostile statements against Bulgaria's Roma and Turkish minorities, each of which comprise 10 percent of the population.

Firebrand Siderov, 50, attempted to belittle all of Parvanov's achievements during the presidential campaign.

A sharp-tongued populist speaker, he garnered support from many disillusioned Bulgarians, impoverished during the transition period from communism and apprehensive about the challenges of EU membership.

Nevertheless, by simply gaining a berth in the two-way final race, the short grey-haired former journalist changed his country's political landscape by ripping apart its traditional balance between moderate left- and right-wing parties.

"What we achieved is a feat in peacetime," Siderov told a press conference late Sunday, lashing out against "the sea of malice ... the consistent, massive, evil campaign fought against us from all sides".

"Our result marks a crucial stage in the development of Bulgarian nationalism that has now proved itself a factor in Bulgarian politics and can no longer be disregarded or played down," Siderov said.

In his latest public appearances before the vote, Siderov sought to tone down his aggressive rhetoric in order to appeal to a larger voter base, but after losing the run-off he returned to a more radical discourse against "the mafia that stops at nothing."

"Parvanov was elected with the votes of the Roma neighbourhoods and the Turks," he said.

Nicaragua's Critical Elections (WT)

By Jose Rizo

The Washington Times, October 30, 2006

On Sunday -- just two days before the American election -- Nicaraguans will also have an election to choose a new president. With an estimated 400,000 of them living in Florida alone, and the potential of a flood of new immigrants should the Nicaraguan election herald a return to policies which failed in the past, the United States has a lot at stake. Many observers of the political situation in Central America are deeply concerned about the upcoming Nicaraguan election because former President Daniel Ortega is leading in most polls. Although Mr. Ortega and the rest of his Sandinista colleagues claim to have learned from their mistakes, many Nicaraguans are rightly convinced that if the Sandinistas win the election they would revert to their failed leftist policies of the past.

Most polls show that the election is a tight race between Mr. Ortega and myself, and any candidate only needs 35 percent of the vote to win in the first-round vote. If no one wins, there will be a second round in December. But there is a risk that Mr. Ortega could squeak by with a win in the first round since the anti-Sandinista vote is split. In 2001, I ran as vice president against Mr. Ortega and our liberal party, the Constitutional Liberal Party (or PLC), won by a landslide. If elected, I will work very closely with the United States and other allies in guaranteeing that Central America and the Western Hemisphere are prosperous and secure. I am called the "clean hands" candidate because I have served my country honorably, and, unlike other candidates, I have never been implicated in any corruption scandal.

Upon becoming president, I will promote a constitutional ban on presidential re-election in Nicaragua. My economic policy is called "Nicaragua First" and is designed to take full advantage of the trade, investment and employment opportunities that have been created by the Central American Free Trade Agreement. It is also founded on truly free, transparent and open-market strategies and institutions.

In an extraordinary turn of events, President Enrique Bolanos turned against the party that elected him and decided to promote presidential candidate Eduardo Montealegre. The Ethics and Transparency Commission of the Nicaraguan Congress recently found Mr. Montealegre responsible for the looting of Treasury funds for the benefit of his own bank while he was secretary of the treasury for Mr. Bolanos. The Sandinistas are gleeful about this split in the PLC vote and are quietly supporting it.

The most surprising development in this Nicaraguan political fight is the strong intervention of Bush administration. It has been misled by the Bolanos administration and their key cronies who are desperate to hold onto power. This confusing and troubling U.S. involvement in this election is so transparent that many prominent U.S. citizens have felt compelled to openly call for a more neutral American policy. Unfortunately, as it did with Iraq, the Bush administration is receiving its information from biased exile leaders and misguided policy experts. If the Sandinistas win the election, they will most likely enact their previous failed totalitarian policies and join the likes of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez in the anti-American crusade in Latin America. More importantly, tens of thousands of Nicaraguans will likely flee the country again and seek to relocate in the United States.

It is not too late for the Bush administration to declare its neutrality in the upcoming election and its willingness to work with any democratically elected government. Unless it does so within the next 10 days, it might actually help cause what it fears the most: the election of Daniel Ortega as president of Nicaragua.

Jose Rizo is former vice president of Nicaragua. He is running for president representing the PLC, the largest political party in Nicaragua. Mr. Rizo also studied at the London School of Economics.

Losing Nicaragua, Again (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, October 30, 2006

Oliver North and his associates were leaving Managua last Tuesday on a private plane after a dramatic surprise visit when they heard news they could scarcely comprehend. The State Department had just issued a "public announcement" that, in effect, warned Americans not to travel to Nicaragua because of the prospect for "violent demonstrations" and "sporadic acts of violence" leading up to the Nov. 5 presidential election there.

The North group had seen nothing in Nicaragua to justify a travel advisory, normally issued when life and limb of visiting Americans are at risk. U.S. and Nicaraguan security officials alike are dumbfounded, and the State Department did not explain it to me. That buttresses suspicion that the U.S. government wants to keep away meddling Americans like North, who seek to influence an election that now appears likely to return Daniel Ortega and the Sandinistas to power after an absence of 16 years.

The seemingly unavoidable outcome of next Sunday's election is a Nicaraguan tragedy, losing at the ballot box what was won two decades ago by the blood of contra fighters and the risking of Ronald Reagan's presidency. Because the anti-Sandinista vote is split, Ortega figures to return his Marxist-Leninist party -- now backed by Hugo ChÃ¡vez's Venezuelan petrodollars -- to the presidential palace. Apart from the misery to be inflicted on the Nicaraguan people, this reflects the deterioration of U.S. influence in the Western Hemisphere under the Bush administration.

Nicaraguan law permits the election of a president with as little as 35 percent of the vote if he is five percentage points ahead of his nearest competitor. That now seems probable with the anti-Sandinista vote divided between two major candidates: former vice president Jose Rizo and banker Eduardo Montealegre. The former contras blame this state of affairs on the Bush administration in general and, specifically, on the U.S. ambassador in Managua, Paul Trivelli.

The looming political fiasco in Nicaragua comes as no surprise. Adolfo Calero, a Washington-based contra leader in the '80s, returned to the U.S. capital in April to issue a warning. He asserted that tacit U.S. support for Montealegre and opposition to Rizo was a horrendous political error and that the only hope to hold off the Sandinistas was to support Rizo. But official doors were closed to Calero. The occasion of Calero's visit was a reunion of contra leaders, their former CIA handlers and Ollie North, who as a Marine lieutenant colonel ran the Nicaraguan account at the Reagan White House. The festivities were marred by fear and frustration over the coming election.

North went public in his syndicated column of Oct. 6. He contended that "official U.S. policy in Nicaragua has been blind to the realities of Nicaraguan politics." He said Ambassador Trivelli "has to stop pressuring private sector leaders with potential reprisals" for backing Rizo and his Liberal Party. North called on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to visit Managua and meet with all anti-Sandinista candidates -- including Rizo.

In Washington, North was ignored. He and his colleagues paid a hastily arranged visit to Managua Monday, Oct. 23, and publicly pleaded with Nicaraguans to reject the Sandinistas. The apparent U.S. reaction was Tuesday's official U.S. government warning that implies Americans would do well to stay away from now until April 18. By urging "American residents and visitors in Nicaragua " to be "vigilant," the U.S. government was telling the old contras to keep hands off.

Dewey Claridge, the famous CIA contra handler, put it bluntly in an e-mail to associates: "Just when you think the State Department's level of stupidity has reached bedrock and can go no further, it comes up with this nonsense, probably the [work] of Trivelli and his paranoia that Oliver North's visit to Managua to receive a testimonial and lay a wreath at the tomb of the fallen . . . is the Contra War II."

DOJ_NMG_0087887

State Department spokesmen would not elaborate on the basis for the travel advisory, but the department's security personnel and Nicaraguan police privately said they saw none for such a warning. The real warning should be about the return of the Sandinistas, in league with Havana and Caracas, thanks to another failure in U.S. policy.

U.S. Jobs Shape Condoms' Role In Foreign Aid (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

EUFAULA, Alabama — Here in this courtly, antebellum town, Alabama's condom production has survived an onslaught of Asian competition, thanks to the patronage of straitlaced congressmen from this Bible Belt state.

Behind the scenes, the politicians have ensured that companies in Alabama won federal contracts to make billions of condoms over the years for AIDS prevention and family planning programs overseas, though Asian factories could do the job at less than half the cost.

In recent years, the state's condom manufacturers fell hundreds of millions of condoms behind on orders, and the federal aid agency began buying them from Asia. The use of Asian-made condoms has contributed to layoffs that are coming next month.

But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, has quietly pressed to maintain the unqualified priority for American-made condoms and is likely to prevail if the past is any guide.

"What's wrong with helping the American worker at the same time we are helping people around the world?" asked the senator's spokesman, Michael Brumas.

That question goes to the heart of an intensifying debate among wealthy nations about to what degree foreign aid is about saving jobs at home or lives abroad.

Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America, and not just those that make condoms.

The wheat to feed the starving must be grown in United States and shipped to Africa, enriching agribusiness giants like Archer Daniels Midland and Cargill. The American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost.

The history of the federal government's condom purchases embodies the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style. Alabama's congressmen have long preserved several hundred factory jobs here by insisting that the United States Agency for International Development buy condoms made here, though, probably in a nod to their conservative constituencies, most have typically done so discreetly.

Those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular.

On the other hand, skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent. Blame often falls on corrupt leaders in poor countries, but aid from rich nations with restrictions requiring it to be spent in the donor country can also reduce effectiveness.

The United States government, the world's largest donor of condoms, has bought more than nine billion condoms over the past two decades. Under President Bush's global AIDS plan, which dedicates billions of dollars to fight the epidemic, a third of the money for prevention must go to promoting abstinence. But that leaves two-thirds for other programs, so the federal government's distribution of condoms has risen, to over 400 million a year.

Over the years, Usaid could have afforded even more condoms — among the most effective methods for slowing the spread of AIDS — if it had it bought them from the lowest bidders on the world market, as have the United Nations Population Fund and many other donors.

Randall L. Tobias, who heads Usaid, declined through a spokesman to be interviewed on this topic. His predecessor, Andrew Natsios, sought to weaken the hold of what he sometimes called a cartel of domestic interest groups over foreign aid. He tried, for example, to persuade Congress to allow the purchase of some African food to feed Africa's hungry. Congress killed that proposal last year and again this year.

Hilary Benn, Britain's secretary of state for international development, said in an interview that in 2001 his country untied its aid from requirements that only British firms could bid for international antipoverty work.

"If you untie aid, it's 100 percent clear you're giving aid to reduce poverty and not to benefit your own country's commercial interests," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0087888

In recent years, most of the low-end condom business has moved to Asia, including Australia-based Ansell, which used to have plants in Alabama. American makers cannot compete with Asia on price — unless they have the federal contract.

The last American factory making condoms for Usaid sits anonymously in a pine-shaded industrial park here in Eufaula. Inside a modern, low-slung building owned by Alatech Healthcare, ingenious contraptions almost as long as a football field repeatedly dip 16,000 phallic-shaped bulbs into vats of latex, with the capacity to turn out a billion condoms a year.

The equation of need is never straightforward. Africa's need to forestall its slow-motion catastrophe of AIDS deaths is vast. But there is need here, too.

Most of the 260 people employed at this factory and the company's packaging plant in Slocomb are women, some the children of sharecroppers and textile factory workers, many of them struggling to support families on $7 to $8 an hour.

The most vulnerable among them — single mothers and older women with scant education — are the most fearful of foreign competition. All feel the looming threat.

"It's cheaper, yeah," said Lisa Jackson, 42, a worker in the packaging plant. "But we Americans should have first choice. We need our jobs to stay in America. We got to feed our families. I just wish it had never come to sending manufacturing jobs overseas."

From 2003 to 2005, Alatech and one other company making condoms for Usaid fell behind on their orders, agency officials said. Last year, the other company went bankrupt. So Usaid ordered condoms from Asia, the first of which were shipped last year. With only a single American company still in line for the federal contract, agency officials are wary of ruling out Asian suppliers.

At such moments in the past, Alabama's politicians have come to the rescue of the state's condom industry. This time was no exception.

Senator Richard C. Shelby, a Republican on the Appropriations Committee, had a provision tucked into the 2004 budget bill requiring that Usaid buy only American-made condoms to the extent possible, given cost and availability. His spokeswoman, Kate Boyd, said the agency did not tell him it was worried about the relative cost of American and Asian-made condoms.

Senator Sessions wrote Usaid a letter last year saying it should purchase condoms from foreign producers only after it had bought all the condoms American companies could make, noting it was "extremely important to jobs in my state."

Usaid assured the senator in writing that it "remains committed to prioritizing domestic suppliers."

On the strength of that, Alatech bought the more modern Eufaula plant from its bankrupt rival. Without the government contract, the company's president, Larry Povlacs, said, Alatech would go out of business.

In interviews, agency officials were noncommittal about whether they would halt all purchases in Asia. Condoms made there cost around 2 cents each, opposed to about 5 cents for those made here.

"At the end of the day, it's all a political process," Bob Lester, who recently retired after 31 years as a lawyer at Usaid, said of such decisions. "The foreign aid program has very few rabbis. Why make enemies when you don't have to?"

Duff Gillespie, a retired senior Usaid official who is now a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, said that over the years officials at Usaid raised the prospect of foreign competition to tamp down what he called "the greed factor" of Alabama condom manufacturers.

But whenever the staff pushed to buy in Asia, Alabama politicians pushed right back.

During the Reagan years, the offices of two Alabamans, Representative William Dickinson, a Republican, and Senator Howell Heflin, a Democrat, caught wind of one such move. Mike Houston, chief of staff to Senator Heflin, recalled being tipped off by Mr. Dickinson's chief of staff.

"He says, 'Well, A.I.D. is going to buy condoms from Korea,' " Mr. Houston recalled. " 'The reason is they can get three condoms for the price of one that they're paying us.' " Mr. Houston said he asked in amazement, "You mean we're making rubbers in Alabama?"

The congressmen's staffs threatened to introduce amendments to require that condoms be made in America. The agency backed off.

Further attempts to open up bidding proved fruitless. Representative Jim McDermott, a Democrat from Washington State, had seen the devastation of AIDS firsthand in the 1980s as a State Department medical officer in Africa. But he said he could not break what he called the "stranglehold" of Alabama congressmen on the condom rules.

In the mid-to-late 1990s, Representative Sonny Callahan, a Republican from Alabama, served as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that shaped Usaid's budget. Brian Atwood, who headed Usaid in those years, said no administrator "in his right mind" would have tried to cut Alabama out of the condom contract at a time when many Republicans were deeply hostile to foreign aid.

Then in 2001, after decades of negotiation, the United States and other wealthy donor nations reached a nonbinding agreement to open at least some foreign aid contracts to all qualified bidders. Included were those for commodities bound for the world's poorest nations.

Usaid decided the agreement did not apply to condoms since some went to more advanced developing countries. Alabama's manufacturers kept the condom business once again.

William Nicol, who heads the poverty reduction division of the Development Assistance Committee at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a group of economically advanced countries, scoffed at Usaid's interpretation. "That's rubbish," he said in a telephone interview.

The condom companies' inability in recent years to fulfill Usaid's orders accomplished what the gentleman's agreement did not: the entry of Asian competitors.

Usaid has asked Alatech to make 201 million condoms next year, less than half of this year's order, and ordered another 100 million made in Korea and China.

Come Nov. 15, Alatech will lay off more than half its work force. Those jobs fell victim to Usaid's smaller orders for condoms, foreign competition and automation.

The reactions of these workers ranged from philosophical to panicked.

One, Garry Appling, a 41-year-old single mother, has worked before as a $6-an-hour cashier at Krystal, the fast food restaurant, and another at $7.15 an hour in a chicken processing plant. She said her 10-year-old daughter, Anterria, worries that she will have to go back to the chicken plant, a place so cold and wet Ms. Appling often fell ill.

But even facing her own impending job loss, Ms. Appling took a moment to empathize with the women making condoms on the other side of the world.

"We need a job — I guess they do, too," she said, during a brief pause from feeding condoms into an intricate, rotating, whooshing machine that tested them for holes. "It's sad.

"At the same time, the United States can't just keep helping overseas. They've got to help us, too."

Chinese Shadows (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 30, 2006

If U.S. politicians think they can impose trade barriers without consequences for American economic interests, they should take a look at China these days. Beijing is reacting to America's talk of tariffs and limits on foreign investment by imposing new restrictions on foreign investment in that country.

Earlier this month, the Carlyle private equity fund agreed to buy half, rather than 85%, of a state-owned construction firm after Beijing bureaucrats intervened. A French firm's bid for China's dominant cookware manufacturer is under competition review. Foreign investment in the brokerage industry has been recently shuttered. And so on.

The most egregious example may be the continuing saga of Guangdong Development Bank, a bankrupt lender in which Citigroup and Societe Generale were competing to buy a majority stake. After bidding, however, they were told they'd have to settle for only 20% of the equity. The State Council in Beijing is still figuring out how to handle the bids. This is the equivalent of President Bush's Cabinet blocking a bank merger in Atlanta -- or perhaps Members of Congress objecting to a takeover of a relatively small U.S. oil company by a Chinese company. Never mind that more foreign cash and know-how are exactly what China needs if it wants to clean up its lumbering, corrupt banking industry.

Lest you think we're exaggerating the anticompetitive mood, consider China's new "Rules on the Merger with and Acquisition of Domestic Enterprises by Foreign Investors," enacted by six Chinese regulatory agencies last month. The rules provide the Communist Party with a mechanism to regulate foreign mergers and acquisitions, impose new guidelines on offshore financing of Chinese companies, and give the Ministry of Commerce the authority to squash deals it doesn't like, among other things.

Beijing's regulators aren't exactly exemplars of transparency, so it's hard to know if this is the start of a broader anti-foreign backlash, or simply an effort to duplicate regulatory language used elsewhere. To date, no major deals have been blocked under the new rules. But there's still plenty of room for worry.

Take Article 40, which gives the Ministry of Commerce room to halt foreign acquisitions of Chinese companies in "core industries," without defining, exactly, what those industries are. Some are easy to guess: Media, for one, is unlikely to be opened up anytime soon given that the Party's control rests on its stranglehold on information. But what about other state-dominated sectors -- such as steel, automobiles, retail, or China's horribly backward mobile phone industry?

Article 40 also gives Beijing the right to block acquisitions of Chinese domestic firms with a "well-known" trademark or a "traditional" Chinese brand. That's odd, given that China doesn't possess any well-known international brands -- or register many of its nascent brands with foreign patent offices. Perhaps this is simply Commerce's way of planning for the future.

DOJ_NMG_0087890

We're told that the Ministry of Commerce may very well allow the French-Sino cookware merger when it hears the case in the coming weeks. But the broader reversion to economic nationalism remains a worry -- which is why American politicians shouldn't give Beijing politicians any more protectionist episodes to emulate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rasmussen Poll Shows Increase In Confidence On War On Terror. A national Rasmussen Report survey of 1,000 adults (+/- 3%) taken October 25-26 shows a "slight rebound in confidence among the American public" on the war on terror. Right now, 38% say the US and its allies "are winning the war while 29% say terrorists have the edge." Earlier in October, the "public assessment was much more bleak. Just 31% thought the U.S. and its allies were winning while 36% gave terrorists the advantage." But President Bush's handling of Iraq continues to receive low scores, with 50% calling it "poor," and 30% "excellent" or "good."

SouthCom Head Says Guantanamo Bay Meets Geneva Standards. McClatchy (10/29, Rosenberg) reports, "Just days into the job, the Pentagon's new Southern Command chief made an overnight weekend visit to the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay - and declared captive conditions compatible with the Geneva Conventions." Admiral James Stavridis, speaking to the McClatchy-owned Miami Herald, called detainees "a hearty bunch" and assessed interrogations as "amicable conversations between two people." He found the 14 "high-value detainees" to be in "very good shape." About 15 sites carried this story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

TSA's "Observational Techniques" Passenger Screening Program Defended. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (10/29, B3, 748K) Paul Ekman, professor emeritus of psychology at the University of California at San Francisco and pro bono adviser to the Transportation Security Administration's SPOT program, writes, "Critics of the controversial new security program…known as SPOT, for Screening Passengers by Observational Techniques -- have said that it is an unnecessary invasion of privacy, based on an untested method of observation, that is unlikely to yield much in the way of red-handed terrorists set on blowing up a plane or flying it into a building, but would violate fliers' civil rights. I disagree. I've participated in four decades' worth of research into deception and demeanor, and I know that researchers have amassed enough knowledge about how someone who is lying looks and behaves that it would be negligent not to use it in the search for terrorists. Along with luggage checks, radar screening, bomb-sniffing dogs and the rest of our security arsenal, observational techniques can help reduce risks -- and potentially prevent another deadly assault like the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001."

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Maliki Smooth Over Differences Via Videoconference. Coverage of President Bush's videoconference with Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki highlighted the discord over the past week and the inability or unwillingness of Baghdad to curb militia violence. NBC Nightly News (10/28, lead story, 0:40, Jordan, 9.87M) reported the videoconference took place "after a week of growing tension over how Baghdad is coping with the violence. Aides said he is in charge of making Iraq secure and the U.S. is there to help, not run the show. Americans are deeply uneasy about the war. Twenty-nine percent say the US is making progress in efforts to make Iraq more secure, while 60% say the U.S. is losing ground."

The New York Times (10/29, A1, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports Bush "stepped into an increasingly fractious relationship with the Iraqi government in a videoconference with Baghdad on Saturday." An "acrimonious conversation" between Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Maliki appears to represent "a growing schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and its American supporters, a division building for months that burst into full public view this week." The pessimistic article observes criticism by both sides of key figures: Khalilzad is blamed by Iraqi leaders for "intense efforts to bring minority Sunni Arabs into Iraqi politics. Shiite leaders say he has worked so hard to involve Sunnis that he has abandoned the Shiites." Meanwhile, Maliki's "early months as prime minister were widely described in Washington as a disappointment."

The Washington Post (10/29, A19, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports Bush "coaxed" Maliki "back into a common front with the U.S. administration Saturday, soothing the Iraqi leader." The Post calls the past week evidence of "an embarrassing rift" and notes pessimistically that the proposed commission "for speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces, moving ahead on efforts to put Iraq in control of those forces, and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security" follows another commission that was unable to prevent the "explosion" of sectarian warfare.

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Daragahi, 918K) reports Bush "upheld Washington's commitment to his Shiite-dominated government despite its failure to rein in the Shiite militias, which form a nucleus of Maliki's political base." However, the Times also reports in a more optimistic light, "Maliki and U.S. officials have pressured anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to crack down on a powerful and volatile militia nominally under his control. On Saturday, several members of his organization said that Sadr had designated a committee of loyalists to investigate and purge his organization of the most egregious troublemakers."

The AP (10/28) reports Bush "reaffirmed his support for Iraq's prime minister, telling Nouri al Maliki that he isn't 'America's man in Iraq' but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding."

CNN.com (10/28) reports Maliki "referred to the boundary between himself and the United States, telling U.S. President Bush that he answers first to the Iraqi government and people, according to an Iraqi official." The AP (10/28) reports Bush "reaffirmed his support" for Maliki, telling him "that he isn't 'America's man in Iraq' but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding."

Iraqi And US Governments Differ On Timetables. The Washington Post (10/29, Pincus, 748K) reports, "Recent discussion about Iraq has focused on the U.S. and Iraqi governments setting benchmarks for improving stability so the United States can eventually draw down troops, but public statements have made it difficult to determine who has agreed to what. The situation seemed to change over the course of the week, until finally it appeared that little had really happened." The Post lists statements by Khalilzad, Maliki, Bush, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and White House spokesman Tony Snow that resulted in the "videoconference to smooth out the differences that had bubbled up during the week."

Aide Says Iraqi PM Uses US Voters' Angst. The AP (10/29, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports Maliki said Bush "promised to move swiftly to turn over full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government." A close Maliki aide "said later the prime minister was intentionally playing on U.S. voter displeasure with the war to strengthen his hand with Washington." Hassan al-Suneid declared that "issues needed airing at a higher level" than with Khalilzad, adding that Maliki "complained to Bush that Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shiite al-Maliki imperiously."

The Washington Times (10/29, 88K) also reports on the discord, leading, "A festering grievance between Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the United States escalated yesterday with Mr. al-Maliki telling President Bush that America's ambassador in Baghdad acts like a viceroy instead of a diplomat."

October May Be Remembered As War's "Tipping Point." The Washington Post (10/29, Ricks, Baker, 748K) says in a bleak front page story that this month "may be remembered as the month that the U.S. experience in Iraq hit a tipping point, when the violence flared and shook both the military command in Iraq and the political establishment back in Washington. Plans to stabilize

Baghdad collided with a surge in violence during the holy month of Ramadan. Sectarian revenge killings spread, consuming a town 50 miles from the capital." US officials "spoke of setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to take on more responsibility, only to have the Iraqi prime minister call that suggestion election-year grandstanding." President Bush "compared the situation to the 1968 Tet Offensive -- often seen as a turning point in the Vietnam War -- and urged Americans not to become disillusioned.

NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 2, 03:16, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported a rocket attack at a Baghdad market Saturday "killed a person and injured 35 others. The Pentagon said one US Marine was killed in a separate incident bringing the number of troops killed this month to 98."

Iraqis, Americans Live In Two Worlds In Iraq. The New York Times (10/29, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Part of the problem is that the Americans cannot see for themselves how bad things get when they are not around. ... When Americans move through Iraq, they do so like a giant ship cutting through a thick and treacherous sea. They move slowly, displacing the harsh reality on both sides, carving out a trough of safety around them. But after they pass, reality closes back in, in all its sucking, swirling fury. That reality is terrifying because much of Iraq is a place without rules or laws, in which armed gangs, sometimes dressed as police officers, can come into any house and do exactly as they please."

Troops Work In Villages To Sway Iraqis. The Washington Post (10/29, White, 748K) reports in a relatively cheerful article on troops serving in Mustafar, Iraq, "It is in small villages like these that U.S. soldiers say they are making their biggest strides but also face their biggest challenges. Commanders in Iraq say they can win any battle against armed insurgents and conduct any military operation successfully, but persuading Iraqis to believe in Iraq could end up being the most difficult battle in this war. There are places in Iraq where U.S. troops are greeted with suspicion. And there are others where they confront grave danger. ... But in some of the small towns that ring the southern edge of Baghdad, the situation is quite different. For many residents, the daily dose of roadside bombs and gunshots that plague the capital is glimpsed only on television. Here, U.S. forces work to provide more electricity, to ensure water supplies are clean and to fix roads. The locals appear to appreciate it, but they also appear to genuinely fear what could happen if U.S. forces leave."

Baghdad Enjoys Respite From Violence. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 3, 03:42, Arraf, 9.87M) reported, "In a city where life is a game of chance, a Saturday afternoon escape is playing bingo. This man has just won a mobile phone. He has come here with a group of relatives. It's felt more secure in the past few days he said." Iraqi man: "We haven't heard a lot of explosions in the last two or three days." NBC (Arraf): "Officials and ordinary Iraqis are hoping desperately the relative quiet in Baghdad is not just a temporary lull."

"Little Things" Fade From Iraqi Life. The New York Times (10/29, A6, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports on a discussion among four Iraqi women of life amidst Iraq's dangers: "Their stories began with a familiar theme: the shrinking lives of middle-class families in the capital. Social clubs have emptied out. Weddings have been sparsely attended. But as the circle has become smaller, and as they focus intensely on just staying alive, they said, even the basics are being stripped away. ... Life was also hard under Saddam Hussein, the women pointed out. Plans were equally impossible to build. But the basic fabric of life, visiting family, attending weddings and funerals, was for the most part intact. Now Iraqis are letting go even of those parts."

Returning WPost Correspondent Dismayed By Baghdad's Changes. In the Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) Outlook section, Post reporter Anthony Shadid returns to Baghdad after "nearly a year" of absence and reports, "On my return, it was difficult to grasp how atomized and violent the 1,250-year-old city has become. Even on the worst days, I had always found Baghdad's most redeeming quality to be its resilience, a tenacious refusal among people I met over three years to surrender to the chaos unleashed when the Americans arrived. That resilience is gone, overwhelmed by civil war, anarchy or whatever term could possibly fit. Baghdad now is convulsed by hatred, paralyzed by suspicion; fear has forced many to leave. Carnage its rhythm and despair its mantra, the capital, it seems, no longer embraces life."

Iraq Claims To Have Captured Zarqawi's Cameraman. The AP (10/28) reports, "Iraq's Defense Ministry said Saturday that the Iraqi army captured a man thought to be the personal cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group." Reportedly, "Khalid al-Hayani was detained in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad."

IED-Defusing Specialists' Challenges Profiled. The 5,000-word cover article for the Washington Post Sunday Magazine (10/29) describes the work of soldiers trying to defuse IEDs, "the explosive booby traps that kill more Americans than any other weapon." Writer Whitney Terrell rides along in a minesweeping truck, and says "25,000 improvised explosive devices…have been aimed at American troops since the war in Iraq began, severing limbs and crushing the skulls of U.S. soldiers and journalists alike." Lt. Nate Rawlings' troops – "with whom I am embedded -- are the leading edge of a $6.1 billion Pentagon effort to win the war against roadside bombings in Iraq."

Hoagland Recommends Shultz As Iraq "Policy Czar." In his Washington Post (10/29, 748K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "There seems to be almost no learning curve in Washington's dealing with Iraq's societal and religious cleavages and prickly nationalistic politicians ... This midterm election is a moment of accountability, as Bush acknowledged at the news conference where he sought to fend off intimations of disillusionment. It is the time for voters and citizens to examine recent and past mistakes and omissions of U.S. policy in Iraq and then vote accordingly. ... [Bush] should give a senior Republican wise person complete powers to steer a new course, guided by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton study group and others. George Shultz, Ronald Reagan's secretary of state (and, like Jim Baker, an ex-Marine), is the outstanding candidate for a salvage mission on Iraq."

Iraq Foundation Director Argues Against Partition. In the Washington Post (10/29, 748K), Iraq Foundation executive director Rend al-Rahim writes, "An increasing number of lawmakers in Congress are considering Iraq's partition into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions under the umbrella of a loose confederation. But partition is neither desirable nor feasible. Neat partition lines are impossible because few regions in Iraq are ethnically or confessionally homogeneous. ... A plan to partition Iraq would plunge the country into total civil war far more widespread and bloody than the sectarian and factional violence we are witnessing now."

Rich Predicts Changes Inevitable In Iraq Policy. In the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M), columnist Frank Rich writes after watching a joint appearance by Ambassador Khalilzad and General George Casey, "If there really is light at the end of the tunnel, why after three and a half years can't we yet guarantee light in Baghdad?" Rich continues, "In keeping with the political cynicism that gave birth to this war and has recklessly prolonged it, the only ones being kept in the dark about this inevitable denouement are our fighting men and women. They remain trapped, dying in accelerating numbers ... Mr. Maliki is not cracking down on rampaging militias but running interference for their kingpin, Moktada al-Sadr." Rich predicts, "After Election Day, adults in Washington will step in, bow to the obvious and pull the plug. The current administration strategy -- praying for a miracle -- is not an option. The current panacea favored by anxious Republican Congressional candidates -- firing Donald Rumsfeld -- is too little, too late."

NATO Troops Battle Afghan Insurgents. The AP (10/28, Abrashi) reports that in Uruzgan province, "NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others." A later version of the AP article gives the insurgent death toll as "at least 70." BBC.com (10/29) carries a similar report.

NATO Commander Vows Probe Of Civilian Deaths. CNN.com (10/29) reports NATO Supreme Allied Commander Gen. James Jones promised Afghan President Hamid Karzai that a "full investigation of an incident involving the unintended death of around 70 Afghan civilians would be launched." The AP (10/29, Abrashi) reports Jones "apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them."

NYTimes Continues Study Of Coalition Pursuit Of Taliban. In the New York Times Magazine (10/29), writer Elizabeth Rubin concludes her two-part story with an article on coalition forces' pursuit of the Taliban that tops 5,000 words. She says the "final draft of the U.S. military's latest counterinsurgency manual, written under the direction of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus and Lt. Gen. James Mattis, emphasizes that if you skimp on resources, endurance and meeting the population's security requirements, you lose. Yet for the past five years, the Pashtun provinces have been plagued by a lack of troops and resources. James Dobbins, President George W. Bush's former special envoy to Afghanistan, blames the White House, which he said had a predisposition against nation-building and international peacekeeping. ... 'In manpower and money,' he added, 'this was the least resourced American nation-building effort in our history.'"

Army Could Be Stretched Too Thin. The Houston Chronicle (10/29, Hedges, 535K) reports from Fort Hood, "The quick pace of comings and goings is evidence of an Army strained to the breaking point, with little in reserve if the United States is forced to respond to a new crisis, according to military analysts." Retired Maj. Gen. Barry McCaffrey asks, "What happens if we have to confront North Korea or Iran?" While some military leaders "said the Army is adapting to pressure on staffing and other aspects of its operation," the "anecdotal testimony of strain on families is backed by figures compiled by the Pentagon."

Democrats At Crossroads Over "Antiwar" Legacy. In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) David D. Kirkpatrick writes, "Democrats have spent three decades trying to exorcise the ghost" of George McGovern, but "as they look ahead, Democrats are torn between two visions of their history. Some potential candidates in the 2008 Democratic primary and many liberal activists argue that the Republican responsibility for the Iraq war has, in effect, freed the Democrats from Mr. McGovern's legacy. They say the 2006 elections will provide a mandate for a new antiwar argument: that troops can be pulled from Iraq in order to shore up American security elsewhere in the world. Other strategists and political scientists argue that the Iraq war has given the Democrats a different opportunity to lay to rest their McGovernite image, in part by rejecting calls for a quick withdrawal in Iraq."

Boot Says Military Must Adjust To Decentralized Foes. In his column for the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), Max Boot writes about the need throughout history to adjust to technological revolutions. He argues, "We have an insurmountable advantage in high-end military hardware. ... But all that spending produces weapons systems that aren't much good for pacifying Baghdad or Kandahar. ... Our scientific sophistication gives us a reasonable chance of shooting down a nuclear-tipped missile, but a nuclear suitcase smuggled into the U.S. would be much harder to detect. To stop such stealthy threats, we need to get much better at human intelligence, counterinsurgency, information operations and related disciplines. ... It may sound melodramatic, but the future of U.S. power rests on our ability to remake a government still structured for Industrial Age warfare to do battle with decentralized adversaries in the Information Age."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Groups Aligned With White House Reportedly Plan Sarbanes-Oxley Rollback. The New York Times (10/29, Labaton, 1.21M) reports on its front page that two "influential industry groups with close ties to administration officials" who are "frustrated" with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act "are drafting proposals to provide broad new protections…from criminal cases," as well as "a stronger shield against civil lawsuits from investors." The Times adds, "To alleviate concerns that the new Congress may not adopt the proposals…many are being tailored so that they could be adopted through rulemaking by the S.E.C. and enforcement policy changes at the Justice Department. The proposals will begin to be laid out in public shortly after Election Day, members of the groups said in recent interviews."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ehrlich Aide Was Subpoenaed By US Over Slots. The Baltimore Sun (10/29, Green) reports, "Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. acknowledged yesterday that a top aide received subpoenas from federal prosecutors investigating in 2004 what published reports said was the influence of slot-machine gambling interests in Annapolis, an admission that led to a demand by his Democratic opponent that the administration release full details of the probe." The Sun continues, "The legal requests came from the office of then-U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio, who had been recommended for the post by Ehrlich. … The subpoenas were issued to Paul E. Schurick, the governor's communications director and one of the key figures in Ehrlich's attempts to legalize slot machines, and were first reported this month by The Washington Post. Schurick received the requests on June 2 and June 16 in 2004 as part of a probe into gambling, the paper said, adding that the governor's press office - still run by Schurick - would not comment on them." The Sun adds, "Responding to a question from a caller on Stateline with Governor Ehrlich on WBAL radio yesterday, the governor for the first time spoke publicly about the inquiry. … 'Paul cooperated, produced everything that they wanted and nothing came of it,' said Ehrlich, responding to the caller." The Sun notes, "Later in the day, when asked for more details about what his office had provided to investigators, Ehrlich said, 'How would I know?' and added that the line of questioning was prompted by a Democratic Party memo distributed last week. It could not be learned whether federal prosecutors were targeting specific individuals in their investigation."

Katrina's Effect On San Antonio Crime Unclear. The San Antonio Express-News (10/29, Bensman) reports, "Just days after the first of about 30,000 Louisiana hurricane evacuees began arriving in San Antonio, Mayor Phil Hardberger was asked a simple question he laughingly brushed off. What might be the impact of the influx on city crime rates and services?" The Express-News continues, "More than a year later, the issue remains unaddressed, conspicuously so in light of a 55 percent spike in murders the first eight months of this year, increasing violent crime rates in San Antonio, a stretched police force and widespread media reports linking some evacuees in Houston to similar crime trends there. … So: Did the sudden arrival of about 30,000 evacuees, a group equal to Del Rio in population, cause additional crime? The question, loaded with the kind of politically sensitive racial implications that can discomfit some politicians, is much more than academic. Millions of dollars could be at stake." The Express-News adds, "The San Antonio Express-News spent four months trying to determine whether a link exists between evacuees and crime in San Antonio. Among the highlights were an extensive analysis of crime data and interviews with dozens of street-level officers, community leaders, business owners, residents and evacuees throughout the city: … Steeply declining rates of violent crime and property crime during the first eight months of 2005 suddenly reversed after they arrived, although there is no proof evacuees caused it. Houston, however, has successfully cited a similar coincidence of suddenly rising crime to argue for more federal money. … Of the 55 percent spike in San Antonio's murders this year, three suspects and two victims were found to be evacuees. Several other cases have suspected links, but dozens of cases could neither be included nor excluded as related to evacuees. Unlike Houston, the San Antonio Police Department homicide unit never has been asked to methodically look for such a connection that could be cited in a request for federal funds."

MS-13 Seen As Growing Threat In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (10/29, Mclemore) reports from Pharr, TX, "Shortly after midnight in late September, a Texas National Guard soldier with night-vision equipment spied four figures slipping through the brush and alerted Border Patrol agents. .. The men were arrested, and one in particular stood out for the extensive tattoos across his face, body and arms. … A fingerprint check showed Santos Chileno-Gomez, a 23-year-old Salvadoran, had been deported for an assault on a Long Island, N.Y., police officer. His lengthy criminal record – and the tattoos – labeled him as a member of Mara Salvatrucha 13, a vicious international street gang that federal authorities call one of the most violent in the U.S." The News adds, "Mr. Chileno-Gomez is among 76 MS-13 members apprehended by the Border Patrol in the Rio Grande Valley during the just-ended fiscal year. That total was up from 62 the previous year, showing the gang's resilience to federal efforts aimed at rooting it out and its determination to travel almost at will through Texas to cliques operating throughout the U.S. … And, some police agencies believe, there is evidence that MS-13 has taken sides in the bloody war among drug cartels that's playing out in Nuevo Laredo. … Officials estimate there are up to 10,000 hard-core members of the gang operating in 33 states, the largest clusters living in Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., and the Mid-Atlantic region. But Texas is one of the fastest-growing states for MS-13, simply by virtue of geography."

Mendendez Attorney's Query To Federal Prosecutors Sparks Kean Salvo. The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (10/29, Howlett) reports, "Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. yesterday questioned why Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez would enlist the services of one the state's top defense lawyers if he isn't under a federal criminal investigation." The Star-Ledger continues, "Menendez has said the lawyer, Joseph Hayden, contacted the U.S. attorney around the time a subpoena was issued for records from a federally funded nonprofit agency that paid more than $300,000 to rent a row house that Menendez owned in Union City." The Star-Ledger adds, "Hayden was doing a 'favor' for the campaign, Menendez spokesman Matt Miller said, not personally representing Menendez. Miller declined to say who in the campaign reached out to Hayden and asked him to make the call, except to say it was not Menendez. … 'We were trying to find out what was going on,' Miller said of tapping Hayden. 'We were just looking to find out in the midst of all these rumors what the facts were.' … Miller declined to say what the campaign gleaned from Hayden's conversation with federal authorities. 'I'm just not going to go there,' he said." The Star-Ledger notes, "Such a scenario makes no sense, Kean said during a press conference in Mountainside yesterday. … 'Every criminal defense attorney knows that you don't reach out to the U.S. Attorney's Office during a pending criminal investigation unless you are representing a subject, target or witness,' he said."

Raymond Discusses New Hampshire GOP Phone-Jamming Operation. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 6, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "As the election draws near, it turns into the season when dirty tricks can come into play. Neither Republicans nor Democrats can claim the high ground. What is rare is hearing from someone that got caught." NBC (Myers) talked to Allen Raymond, for years a "prominent Republican operative with a reputation for bare-knuckle tactics. … Raymond admits four years ago he went beyond pushing the envelope and crossed the line. He spent three months in prison. Now in a civil suit Democrats are trying to tie his misdeeds to the White House. It happened during a hard-fought battle for the Senate in New Hampshire. Raymond was running a telemarketing firm. He says an old friend from the Republican National Committee came to him with an idea: Use nonstop hang-up calls to tie up Democratic phone lines on Election Day." Raymond: "We were trying to stop them from operating efficiently." NBC (Myers): "On Election Day the plan worked until nervous state Republicans pulled the plug. The Republican candidate won, though there is no evidence that phone jamming made the difference. How common are dirty tricks in Republican and Democratic politics?" Raymond: "Fairly common. Let's be clear on something: The New Hampshire phone jamming was not a dirty trick, it was criminal." NBC (Myers): "He pleaded guilty to conspire to make harassing phone calls," and the RNC "spent an estimated $3 million to defend its high-ranking operative. Others charged, including Raymond, did not get the RNC's support. They think because they paid $3 million to defend this guy they have something to hide." Raymond: "That is a fair assumption to make. They need to answer for that." NBC (Myers): "The RNC and the White House deny authorizing the operation. Raymond is now shunned by his party and, as a felon, unable to vote."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New York Officials Pleased By Fire Department Recruiting Efforts. The New York Post (10/29, Gallahue) reports, "The FDNY's million-dollar diversity drive is starting to pay off as the department heads into its final week of recruiting." The Post continues, "Forced to extend its deadline due to lagging numbers, the FDNY's aggressive campaign to bring minorities into the department has managed to boost its pool of applicants by thousands, the Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta announced yesterday. … 'The results are impressive,' he said. 'We have over 20,000 applicants [who] filed [to take the test] as of yesterday, and 35 percent of those applications are from minorities - and we still have a week to go.' … Applicants have until Nov. 3 to sign up for the test, which is given every four years." The Post notes, "Last year, the city and the FDNY put more than $3 million into the department's Recruitment and Diversity Unit as the Justice Department probed the department for allegedly discriminatory hiring practices. More than 90 percent of the 11,000-member force is white."

The New York Daily News (10/29, Brosh, Singleton) reports, "In May, with the department's hiring practices under investigation by the Justice Department, the FDNY launched a multimillion-dollar ad campaign to lure more minority-group firefighters. In August, it relaxed its hiring requirements - the latest move in an uphill effort to increase the diversity of a department that is 91% white."

Lowell, MA, Seeks Ballot Help In Immigrant Areas. The Boston Globe (10/29, Reid) reports, "In the past in Lowell (MA), voter registration efforts in the city's immigrant communities have fallen short and advocacy groups have charged that voters who speak languages other than English have faced problems at the polls. … During this year's election campaigns, the city and a number of groups have worked to deal with both situations." The Globe continues, "Volunteers from ONE Lowell, an immigrant advocacy group, have spent the past several weeks canvassing neighborhoods throughout the city to register new voters. Translators and bilingual poll workers have been recruited and trained for duty at voting precincts in neighborhoods with the highest population of non-English-speaking residents. Ballot instructions and voting information have been printed in Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese for distribution on Election Day, Nov. 7." The Globe adds, "Gail Cenik, a manager with the city's Election Commission, said her office has concentrated on education to familiarize people with the voting process. … Cenik's comments reflect efforts by the city to correct many of the problems that have plagued the last two elections in Lowell. In March, the US Department of Justice began an investigation into alleged voting rights violations faced by Cambodian-Americans who tried to vote in elections held last November. … The federal investigation was prompted by complaints from the New York-based Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. The advocacy group surveyed the city's polling places in that election and found several problems, including statements that several voters were directed to the wrong polling places and one instance in which a voter's name was misspelled on the voting roll." The Globe notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed the ongoing investigation and declined to provide further details."

Panel Investigating Voting System Firm's Takeover By Venezuelan Company. The New York Times (10/29, Golden, 1.21M) reports on its front page that the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States is investigating the takeover of Sequoia Voting Systems, a "leading American manufacturer of electronic voting systems," by Smartmatic, a "small software company that has been linked to the leftist Venezuelan government of President Hugo Chávez. The inquiry is focusing on the Venezuelan owners" of Smartmatic and is "trying to determine whether the government in Caracas has any control or influence over the firm's operations, government officials and others familiar with the investigation said."

Will Says HAVA Could Muck Up Tallying Of Votes. In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, George Will writes, "The hoariest jest in conservatism's repertoire is that the three least credible assertions in the English language are 'The check is in the mail,' 'Of course I'll respect you as much in the morning' and 'I'm from the government, and I'm here to help you.' Which brings us to the exquisitely named Help America Vote Act. Having fixed Iraq and New Orleans, the federal government's healing touch is now being applied to voting. As a result, days -- perhaps weeks -- might pass after Election Day without the nation's knowing which party controls the House or Senate. If that happens, one reason might be HAVA, that 2002 bit of federal helpfulness. … Democracy is not a mere game. But -- write this on a piece of paper, using a No. 2 pencil -- neither is it an activity from which it is sensible to demand more precision than can reasonably be expected when, on a November Tuesday, 100 million people record billions of political choices."

US Catholic Bishops Release Guidelines On Ministering To Gays. The New York Times (10/29, A18, Goodstein, 1.21M) reports that American Roman Catholic bishops "have drafted new guidelines for ministry to gay people that affirm church teaching against same-sex relationships, marriages and adoptions by gay couples, yet encourage parishes to reach out to gay Catholics who feel alienated by their church." The guidelines "recommend baptizing the adopted children of same-sex couples, as long as the children will be raised as Catholics. It says that gay people may benefit from revealing their 'tendencies' to friends, family and their priest, but should not make 'general public announcements' about it in the parish." The Washington Post (10/29, A9, 748K) reports, "An early draft of the guidelines welcomes celibate gay men and lesbians to take part in parish life while asserting the church's 'right to deny roles of service to those whose behavior violates her teaching.'"

Same-Sex Marriage Debate Mimics Earlier Arguments Over Interracial Marriage. The New York Times (10/29, Liptak, 1.21M) reports, "People on both sides of the same-sex marriage issue say there are important lessons from the earlier debate over laws banning interracial marriages." Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, "said the contrast between the political landscape when the Supreme Court acted in 1967 and that facing proponents of gay marriage today is stark and telling. 'When the court moved to strike down the interracial marriage laws,' Ms. Gallagher said, 'the democratic process was in the process of getting rid of these laws. What's happening now is exactly the opposite: more and more states are moving to protect marriage.'"

Media Ownership Rules Under Scrutiny. The New York Times (10/29, Siklos) reports, "It is hard to find any public policy question that feels less relevant by the minute than whether one person or company should be permitted to own television stations and newspapers in the same market." The Times continues, "Rules barring cross-ownership went into effect in 1975 but were overturned by the Federal Communications Commission three years ago. But, soon after, an appellate court effectively sent the decision back for another go-round, which is under way. This month in Los Angeles, the commission held a public hearing, the first of a series around the country, to look at newspaper-TV cross-ownership but also to examine other, more pertinent questions — for instance, how many radio or television stations a single owner can have in a single market." The Times adds, "A Supreme Court ruling from 1945 may best sum up why the F.C.C. scrutinizes such affairs: to ensure 'the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources.' It's too bad we can't skip months of table-thumping hearings over thousands of pages of studies and filings and just acknowledge that the media landscape is changing quickly. … The reality is that even if media companies could own more TV stations and newspapers in the same city, they might not think that it's such a brilliant idea any more. As the F.C.C.'s chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said recently: 'We need to develop a rule for cross-ownership that reflects current market characteristics, including the struggling nature of today's newspaper industry.'" The Times notes, "The Tribune Company is Exhibit A, of course. Its past success with a triple play of television, newspaper and radio in its hometown of Chicago has not translated into financial brilliance in New York and Los Angeles, where it owns Newsday and The Los Angeles Times, as well as the television stations WPIX and KTLA. Under pressure from its biggest shareholder and a slumping share price, the company has said it is exploring all options, including selling part or all of itself. … In addition to Chicago, there are markets like Atlanta, where the privately held Cox Enterprises owns The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, television, cable and much else. In these places, cross-ownership appears to have served its corporate orchestrators well."

Atmospheric Research Center's Management Agreement Up For Bid. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Riccardi, 918K) reports management of the National Center for Atmospheric Research "is up for grabs. Since 1997, National Science Foundation policy has required that all government research institutions be subject to a competitive bidding process when their contracts come up for renewal. Foundation officials say that a formal request for bids is imminent and that the competition will be open to all organizations -- academic, nonprofit and for-profit."

Southern California Wildfire Continues To Blaze. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 4, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that in southern California, "a major wildfire is burning out of control. The fire is still threatening homes. It is happening about 80 miles east of Los Angeles."

US Seeks Arsonist In California Wildfires. The New York Times/AP (10/29, Press) reports, "Calmer winds on Saturday helped crews fighting a huge wildfire that killed four firefighters and critically injured a fifth, while investigators searched for the arsonist who set the blaze roaring through the canyons of Southern California. … Now in its third day, the fire that broke out in uninhabited brushland about 90 miles east of Los Angeles has blackened 39,900 acres, or more than 62 square miles, the authorities said. The fire was 40 percent contained, they added." The AP continues, "A reward for information leading to the arsonist rose to $500,000 on Friday, as $100,000 posted by Riverside County multiplied with matching offers from the state; neighboring San Bernardino County; a Rancho Mirage resident, Tim Blixseth; and the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, which has a casino in nearby Cabazon. … Forecasters predicted winds would ease and temperatures would drop slightly throughout the weekend, which could help as crews work in steep terrain to build fire lines around the blaze." The AP notes, "Investigators were looking into whether the wildfire was related to other blazes in recent months, including a canyon fire last weekend, though a sheriff's spokesman said there was no immediate indication of a serial arsonist. .. .Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire broke out west of the San Jacinto Mountains."

Meth Labs Curbed Under New Rules. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (10/29, Jarvis, Svokos) reports, "Several times a day, pharmacists throughout North Texas get blasted by sniffling, sneezing allergy and sinus sufferers who hate what they have to go through to get their Sudafed." The Star-Telegram continues, "First, consumers must show a photo ID, and then they must sign their name while someone on the other side of the counter fills in a log. It can take five minutes or more to get any medication that contains pseudoephedrine, the popular decongestant that criminals have used to make methamphetamine. … 'It makes me very, very aggravated and irritated,' said Mandi Elias of Arlington, who shopped recently at the south Arlington SuperTarget. 'It's just so frustrating because I'm used to picking it up at the counter and going.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "Such retail inconvenience is succeeding, however, in making it tough for would-be meth cooks to buy enough decongestant to produce the highly addictive substance that sheriffs nationwide identify as the country's No. 1 drug problem. … New laws limiting how much pseudoephedrine consumers can buy at a time have slashed the numbers of clandestine meth labs, which have blown up in rural areas and residential neighborhoods, law enforcement experts say. … But just as quickly, Mexican drug cartels have stepped in to fill the void. Mexican manufacturers now buy large quantities of decongestant tablets from China, Panama and India to make 'ice,' what some experts say is a purer, more potent form of the drug." The Star-Telegram notes, "The federal Combat Meth Act took effect just last month. Signed by President Bush in March, the law limits pseudoephedrine sales to 3.6 grams per day and 9 grams every 30 days. … It also requires purchasers to provide identification and sign a logbook. Sellers must keep the products behind the counter or under lock and key and must register online with the U.S. Attorney General. .. .Texans have had more than a year to get used to a similar state law."

Marshals Lead Pittsburgh Sweep Of Sex Offenders. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/29, Ove) reports, "Squads of federal marshals and police rounded up hundreds of sexual predators and gang members in the eastern half of the United States as part of a nationwide manhunt that included 26 arrests in the city of Pittsburgh on Wednesday." The Post-Gazette continues, "Deferring to the U.S. Justice Department, Pittsburgh police said they couldn't discuss the charges or provide any details. … But some of those caught here were sex offenders; others were fugitives with warrants for a variety of other felonies." The Post-Gazette adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez will announce the national results on Thursday in Washington, D.C., and locally U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan plans a news conference to detail the arrests in the 25-county Western Pennsylvania district. … The roundup is the second part of a national effort to hunt down sex offenders. The first phase was in April, when the marshals arrested 1,102 fugitives on various sex offense charges in 27 states west of the Mississippi River. … A similar operation last year, which targeted mostly violent repeat offenders, netted 10,340 fugitives across the United States, the largest fugitive apprehension in history. In this region, more than 100 were captured. … This time the marshals and local police concentrated heavily on Megan's Law violators and other sexual predators, including those who have failed to register as sex offenders or are not living at the addresses where their Megan's Law form says they should be."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Activists Claim CIS Erecting Barriers To Citizenship. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Watanabe, 918K) reports, "Immigrant advocacy groups are decrying an array of proposed federal measures, including application fee increases and online filing requirements, that they fear will sharply reduce the ability of some legal immigrants to become U.S. citizens. As President Bush signed a controversial bill last week authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant rights groups charge that the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services is erecting a virtual 'second wall' that would disproportionately hurt Mexican immigrants, who tend to be less educated and earn lower incomes than others. Last week, a coalition of more than 230 religious, labor and immigrant rights groups delivered a letter to citizenship bureau Director Emilio Gonzalez, expressing strong concern about application fee increases that could double to $800, a 'digital barrier' of a mandatory online filing system, extensive new paperwork and a revised history and civics test they fear could be more difficult." Some fear the Bush Administration "is seeking to tighten access to citizenship to bar potential new Democratic voters. But US immigration officials flatly deny any partisan motives."

TAX:

NYTimes Blames Bush For Failing To Rework AMT. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "One of President Bush's be-very-afraid lines this campaign season is that Democrats, if elected, will raise taxes. What he doesn't say is that if you are one of tens of millions of Americans who make between $75,000 and $500,000 a year, your taxes are already scheduled to rise starting next year — because of laws that Mr. Bush championed and other actions he failed to take. The higher taxes stem from the alternative minimum tax. … Mr. Bush set the trap in 2001 — and in 2003, 2004 and 2006. In each of those years, he flogged for new tax cuts without requiring corresponding long-term changes in the existing rules for the alternative tax. It was well known that failure to update the alternative tax would create perverse interactions with the new tax cuts, causing filers' tax bills to drop because of the cuts, only to shoot back up again from the alternative levy."

Snow Said To Have Succeeded In Changing Tone Of White House Briefings. In a 5,000 word profile of White House Press Secretary Tony Snow for the New York Times Magazine (10/29), Rolling Stone's Ben Wallace-Wells writes, "For the most part, Snow's two predecessors in the Bush White House tended to look as if they regarded the twice-daily meetings with the press as painful procedures. Still, these are anxious days for the White House, with the president's approval ratings stuck below 40 percent — the sort of number that has a way of emboldening the reporters and making the atmosphere in the press room particularly aggressive. So the Bush White House has turned to Snow…in the hope that he can change the tone and project a confident, prime-time sort of calm. Gone already is the firing squad of the Scott McClellan days, and there is little echo of the testy, you-don't-need-to-know authority of President Bush's first press secretary, Ari Fleischer. Snow's style is basically cheery: Gee, isn't it fun to run the world?"

GAO's Walker Warns Mounting Debt And Entitlements Will Prove Disastrous. The AP (10/28, Crenson) says the GAO's David Walker "sure talks like he's running for office. 'This is about The future of our country, our kids and grandkids,' the comptroller general of the United States warns a packed hall at Austin's historic Driskill Hotel. 'We the people have to rise up to make sure things get changed.' … The accountant-in-chief's professional opinion is that the American public needs to tell Washington it's time to steer the nation off the path to financial ruin." According to the AP, "The vast majority of economists and budget analysts agree: The ship of state is on a disastrous course, and will founder on the reefs of economic disaster if nothing is done to correct it."

Prospects For McConnell-Reid Senate Previewed. The Washington Post (10/29, A4, Babington, 748K) writes that whether Republican Mitch McConnell or Democrat Harry Reid "prevails as the Senate's next majority leader, one thing seems certain: Either one will show more interest in the institution's often obscure traditions" than exiting Majority Leader Bill Frist. But what that means as a practical matter "is less certain. Some congressional scholars say it could mean greater bipartisan accord because McConnell and Reid are consummate deal-makers whose top priority is legislative achievement, whereas Frist's presidential ambitions have shadowed his comments and deeds as majority leader. But both men are also dogged by questions about financial dealings that could provide ammunition for opponents in the next Congress, which is virtually sure to be narrowly divided."

Thune's Role In Providing $2.3 Billion In Loan Guarantees To Railroad Scrutinized. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Havemann, 918K) reports that when Sen. John Thune "narrowly lost a bid for the Senate in 2002, his career followed a familiar pattern: He became a Washington lobbyist. He soon gained as a client a little-known Midwestern railroad. The Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad Corp. may have been small, but its ambitions were not. It was seeking more than $2 billion in federal loan guarantees to help finance a major renovation of its entire rail network and an expansion into the coal fields of Wyoming's Powder River Basin." According to the Times, now that Thune "helped attach a provision to last year's huge transportation bill, prospects for DM&E's $2.3 billion in loan guarantees are looking brighter. The federal government now is in a position to approve one of the largest loan guarantees in its history." The transportation bill "did not mention DM&E, but by raising the government's loan guarantee authority tenfold, to $35 billion, it made the railroad's request more likely to succeed. Whatever the outcome of the DM&E aid request, the fact that a lawmaker who is a former lobbyist helped it along speaks volumes about how business sometimes gets done in Washington."

Many NIH Research Scientists Consider Leaving Over New Ethics Guidelines. The AP (10/28, Beamish) reports, "Nearly 40% of the scientists conducting hands-on research at the National Institutes of Health say they are looking for other jobs or are considering doing so to escape new ethics rules that have curtailed their opportunity to earn outside income. Most scientists say the ethics crackdown is too severe, and nearly three-quarters of them believe it will hinder the government's ability to attract and keep medical researchers, according to a survey commissioned by the government's premier medical research agency."

NASA Seen As Likely To Approve Hubble Repair Mission. The Washington Post (10/29, A3, Kaufman, 748K) reports that on Tuesday NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will announce whether the Hubble telescope "will be repaired or will be allowed to gradually run out of steam. NASA said Friday that a series of events and briefings will follow the announcement at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt -- the kind of activity that often accompanies a decision to go ahead with a big mission. But agency officials said that no decision had been reached and that Griffin will study the pros and cons over the weekend."

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Not Winning Midterm Support For Republicans. CNN (10/28, Holmes) reported, "As Republicans fight to keep control of the House and Senate, President Bush touts economic growth as a key reason Americans should support the GOP. But this year, many voters appear to be tuning out that message." CNN (Schneider) continued, "For over 30 years, polls for CNN and 'Time' magazine have been asking people, 'How well are things going in the country today?' In economic bad times, no more than 40% say things are going well. … In good times, 60% or more say things are going well. … What happens when the number who say things are going well falls in the middle? Then you don't get a pocketbook election. The election is about something else. … So where are we in 2006? According to a CNN poll by the Opinion Research Corporation, about half the country says things are going well, while half say things are going badly. Here's the good news. The stock market has reached record highs. Gas prices have dropped. Now here's the bad news. Wages are stagnant. Home values are dropping. Manufacturing jobs are fleeing overseas. The punch line? For most voters, 2006 is not a pocketbook election. It's about something else. More than anything else, war."

In a Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) op-ed, Yale University's Jacob Hacker writes, "In the final days of this fall's campaign, Republicans have turned to an unexpected issue: the economy. President Bush touted the nation's prosperity last week, insisting that 'a strong economy is going to help our candidates.' And why not? The Dow is soaring. Unemployment is low. Inflation is tame. Gas prices are falling. And the overall economy has been growing steadily. … There's just one problem: Despite the sunny talk and favorable numbers, voters aren't happy with the economy. Though they've become somewhat more positive in recent weeks, they remain strikingly dissatisfied -- and favor Democrats by wide margins on economic issues." With voters feeling that "their jobs, health care, pensions and family finances" may be at risk, Republican "bragging about the economy may appear not as saviors, but as out of touch."

Economy Dragging On Republicans In Midwest. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 5, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) ran a feature on voters in Ohio, where "it is the economy hurting Republicans who are locked in tight races across the state. The unemployment average is a full point higher than the national average, and according to polls two-thirds of Ohioians think the economy is bad and getting worse. … All of the good economic news the President has talked about during the campaign surging stock market, falling gas prices and low unemployment is not being felt throughout the industrial Midwest."

Armey Says Republicans "Have No One To Blame But Ourselves." In a Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) op-ed, former House Majority Leader Dick Armey writes, "Somewhere along the road to a 'permanent majority,' the Republican Revolution of 1994 went off track. For several years, we had confidence in our convictions and trusted that the American people would reward our efforts. And they did. But today, my Republican friends in Congress stand on the precipice of an electoral rout." Republican lawmakers "forgot the party's principles, became enamored with power and position, and began putting politics over policy. Now, the Democrats are reaping the rewards of our neglect -- and we have no one to blame but ourselves."

Kinsley Says "New Yellow Dogs" Putting Party Above Candidates' Merits. In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, Michael Kinsley writes, "In a remarkable editorial on Wednesday, the New York Times endorsed Diane Farrell for Congress from a district in Connecticut. Who is Diane Farrell? I have no idea, and the Times seemed to have not a lot." Rep. Christopher Shays "has held the seat for almost 20 years and been endorsed by the Times 'in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent' -- until now." The Times decided to "'strongly endorse' Shays's opponent, entirely because she's a Democrat. Or rather, because she is not a Republican: 'Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup.' … People just love to say, 'I evaluate each candidate on his or her own merits' -- even when it's not true. But this year does seem to be different. … These New Yellow Dogs are voting for the Democrat, simply out of anger at or frustration with the Republican Party."

WPost Says Democrats Will Need To Offer Better Proposals If They Take Control. Under the headline "What Democrats Would Do," the Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K) editorializes that the party's "agenda is a hodgepodge of good ideas, bad ideas and no ideas." It is "heavy on ideas -- raising the minimum wage, letting the government negotiate Medicare drug prices -- that may have more popular appeal than real-world impact. … Other proposals sound good but are bad policy. Screening 100 percent of cargo containers at the point of origin would be expensive, time-consuming and impractical. The vow to 'prevent outsourcing of critical components of our national security infrastructure -- such as ports, airports and mass transit -- to foreign interests that put America at risk' is more Dubai ports demagoguery." Democrats "will need to do better than what they've proposed in 2006 if they are given the chance to govern in 2007."

Chait Says Democrats "Actually Have An Agenda." In his Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) column, Jonathan Chait writes that Democrats "actually have an agenda. Republicans aren't saying why the Democratic agenda is wrong, or why their own is better. They're just ignoring it. If you're like most people, you probably have no idea what that agenda is. Let me list it: Put new rules in place to break the link between lobbyists and legislation. Enact all the recommendations made by the 9/11 commission. Raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. Cut the interest rate on federally supported student loans in half. Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients. Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds. Impose pay-as-you-go budget rules, requiring that new entitlement spending or tax cuts be offset with entitlement spending cuts or tax hikes. Republicans disagree with all these items."

LATimes Decries Racial "Suggestion" In Today's Campaign Ads. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) editorializes that while campaign ads "clearly pandering to prejudice" are "yesterday's style. Today's is all about suggestion." In Massachusetts, Kerry Healey (R), "in a contest for governor with black Democrat" Deval Patrick "is running a commercial that shows a nervous white woman being stalked. It ends with: 'Deval Patrick, he should be ashamed -- not governor,'" alluding to Patrick's "support for a rapist he believed was not guilty until a DNA test proved him wrong. … Then there is the appalling flier recently put out by Democrats attacking Georgia Gov. George Ervin 'Sonny' Perdue. It shows a photograph of a civil rights marcher being beaten to the ground by a white officer with the caption: 'Remember this? Their last attempt to stop us from voting.' Beneath is a photo of Perdue, the state's white governor, signing a voter identification bill into law, and the words: 'Their current attempt to stop us from voting. Don't let the Bush/Perdue Republican Mafia take away our vote!' Requiring an ID to vote is hardly the equivalent of racial disenfranchisement." The Times says the Republican ad targeting Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee is "the most masterful of the genre." The Times concludes, "These ads and commercials themselves may not be overtly racist, they just hope you are."

Bush Begins Cross-Country Campaign Swing In Indiana, South Carolina. NBC Nightly News (10/28, lead story, 3:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) was the only network to air a newscast last night, and it led by reporting that President Bush "hit the campaign trail today. The President stopped for congressional Republican candidates and took aim at Democrats, saying they don't have a plan to win in Iraq." NBC (Jordan): "Nine days until Election Day and this is the first time voters got a chance to see the President in person for free. He took the opportunity to urge support for Republican candidates and his policy in Iraq. President Bush came out swinging on the campaign trail, stopping for a Republican congressman in a tight reelection bid." Bush: I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success: There isn't one." NBC (Jordan): "In South Carolina at a rally with 5,000 US forces, President Bush said Iraq was central to winning the war on terror." Bush: "If the United States of America were to leave before the job is done, the enemy will follow us here."

Major national newspapers focus on the Indiana event, and report the crowd was energetic and enthusiastic. The Washington Post (10/29, A7, Abramowitz, 748K) reports Bush "plunged into retail politicking for the first time this campaign season" in a visit to Sellersburg, Indiana, in the district of IN9 Rep. Mike Sodrel (R), who faces a tough race against ex-Rep. Baron Hill (D). The Post says Bush told a "raucous crowd of several thousand Republican partisans on Saturday that the Democrats would raise taxes and retreat from Iraq" if they win congressional control. The crowd "interrupted the president repeatedly with loud applause and chants of 'USA! USA!'" as Bush cast the elections as a "decisive turning point in the affairs of the country. 'The outcome of this election will determine how much money you have in your pocket,' Bush shouted, his voice seeming to crack at points. 'The outcome of this election will determine whether this government does its most fundamental job, and that is to protect the American people.'" Bush said he "was going to 'sprint to the finish line,' and rallies are planned in the coming week in Georgia, Texas, Nevada and Montana."

The Washington Times (10/29, Curl, 88K) says the President "yelled himself hoarse in his first public political rally of the 2006 election campaign, whipping thousands of supporters into chants of 'USA!' as he criticized Democrats for being weak on national security and anxious to increase taxes." The Times says the "Republican stronghold" will be an "early harbinger of whether Republicans hold control" on Election Day. Indiana's polls, along with Kentucky's, will be the first to close on November 7.

The New York Times (10/29, A24, Rutenberg, 1.21M) runs its story under the headline "A Warm Welcome For Bush The Campaigner, In Indiana," saying the President addressed "wildly cheering supporters," telling them that "Democrats did not want to investigate, prosecute or even detain terrorists and had no plan for Iraq. And, introducing a relatively new line in his election-year stump speech, Mr. Bush criticized the 'activist' New Jersey Supreme Court's ruling" on same-sex partnerships.

The AP (10/28) says Bush is now "campaigning aggressively ahead of the high-stakes" elections, and told the Indiana crowd that Democrats "should not be trusted to control Congress because they have no idea how to win in Iraq. 'I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success. There isn't one,' Bush told thousands of energized Republicans packed into a high school gymnasium. 'They are in agreement on one thing -- they will leave before the job is done, and we will not let them.'"

CNN (10/28, Quijano) reported, "President Bush hit the campaign trail this morning, first stopping off in Indiana. … At his first public campaign rally this election season, President Bush tried to go on the offense, hitting Democrats on the issue analysts say is Republicans' biggest political liability: Iraq." President Bush: "And all the people listening here, I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success: There isn't one." Quijano: "With a little over a week to go until the congressional midterm elections, both the President and first lady Laura Bush tackled domestic politics Saturday, each campaigning in different states." First Lady Laura Bush: "And thanks for coming to support Congressman Tom Reynolds and Congressman Randy Kuhl, both to be re- elected to the United States Congress."

Bush Said To Be Sticking To "Friendly Country." The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Hennessy-Fiske, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports on the event under the headline "Bush Picks His Battles In Friendly Country," also noting the "raucous crowd," the "USA" shouts, and how they stomped their feet and shook "dozens of red, white and blue pompoms." But the rest of the report focuses on how Bush is "playing to his base of conservative Republicans in such strongholds as Sellersburg, Statesboro, Ga., and Sugar Land, Texas. With Republican control of Congress at risk, the president's visits and tone could determine the fate of a handful of close races. Besieged Republican candidates have distanced themselves from the president in recent debates, TV ads and closed fundraisers as his approval rating remained below 40% this month. It has become increasingly difficult for the party to take advantage of the office of the president, GOP strategists say. Democrats in Maryland, Missouri and Pennsylvania have launched ads that remind voters of their opponents' support for Bush."

President Highlights Stark Differences Between Parties. Also in the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), Ronald Brownstein writes that "Bush and Republicans in many of the nation's key races are presenting divergent, even contradictory, visions of how Washington should operate after next week's election. Around the country, GOP incumbents and challengers alike are running against the relentless partisan conflict that defined the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency and have colored virtually every day of Bush's." While "Republicans almost everywhere are presenting themselves as flexible and independent problem solvers who will reach across party lines to build consensus on difficult issues," Bush is "moving in the opposite direction. As he often does when he's under political pressure, he's accentuating the disagreements between the parties and presenting the differences in the starkest possible terms. He's displayed that instinct most clearly in the highly charged way he has framed the debate over Iraq and the war on terrorism."

The Boston Globe (10/29, Milligan, 425K) says the "increasing unpopularity of the Iraq war is making some voters tire of the defiant demeanor showcased by the majority party in recent years, analysts say -- a special problem for those whose political style most resembles President Bush."

Rove Giving "Virtuoso Performance" As Midterms Enter Endgame. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Hamburger, Wallsten, 918K) runs a generally positive front-page feature on Karl Rove, saying the "top strategist is in rare form for the midterm endgame." Focusing on a recent trip to bolster "endangered" Rep. Tom Reynolds, the Times says Rove "delivered a fiery speech to 500 party activists, then shook every available hand and posed for snapshots like a rock star. He toured suburbs recently trashed by a snowstorm. He also found time to huddle with local strategists. But the most significant element of Rove's effort…may have occurred behind closed doors, when the White House strategist met with a federal disaster relief official contemplating how to respond to the storm. Four days after the meeting, Reynolds announced that President Bush would authorize millions of dollars in federal disaster aid for the area." The Times says that while polls show Democrats "extending their leads in pivotal races across the country," the "man largely responsible for the Republicans' glory days -- and arguably still the most powerful political operative in the United States -- is far from discouraged." Instead, Rove "is giving a virtuoso performance designed to prevent the Democrats from taking control of the House and Senate or, if that is no longer possible, to hold down the size of the Democratic victory to make it easier for the GOP to come back in 2008."

Democrats Race To Catch Up With GOP's GOTV Advantages. The New York Times (10/29, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports on its front page that Democrats "are pushing into high gear this weekend a sharply expanded campaign to get their voters to the polls," confronting a facet of the endgame that traditionally favors Republicans. Party leaders "expressed anxiety" that Republicans would "again out-organize them in the approximately 20 House and 3 Senate races that both sides agree will determine the outcome of the midterm elections." While Democrats "have invested heavily in catching up" with the GOP's "sophisticated get-out-the-vote operation," DNC Chairman Howard Dean said the rival party "continued to have a clear superiority in identifying voters they can persuade to vote for their candidates and then getting them to cast ballots." Dean said, "I think we've closed the gap, but I don't think we are there yet. It's going to take some time. I think we could match them in 2008, if everything goes right, in voter turnout." But other Democratic leaders disputed Dean's view, saying they were "increasingly confident about their party's ability to achieve parity, and perhaps regain its dominance, against the Republican get-out-the-vote machinery."

NRSC's Forti, DCCC's Lapp Have Campaigns' Final Days In Their Hands. The Washington Post (10/29, Vandehei, Cillizza, 748K) runs a front-page feature on the NRSC's Carl Forti and the DCCC's John Lapp, who "run the independent expenditure arms of their parties' campaign committees, the place where many of the negative ads that voters are seeing are financed, produced and strategically placed on television stations across the country. In the final days of the campaign, they will easily outspend the candidates themselves in many of the most competitive House races. They will decide the final images that many voters see in this campaign. Warning for the fainthearted: Most of the ads will be dark and accusatory." Officials in both parties said "one bad call could make or break a House race," and there is "no precise formula for determining the smartest choices."

Broder Says Bush Still Sees Democrats Only As "Opponents." In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, David Broder says Bush is "not yet ready to think of Democrats except as opponents." Broder recalls that it was "the combination of a Democratic president, Bill Clinton, and the Republican Congress elected in 1994 that finally got a grip on budget deficits and produced the only balanced budgets of modern times," and expresses hopes that immigration, tax, and Social Security reform could all advance if there is again a power split.

WPost Poll Shows Democrats Leading Maryland Gubernatorial, Senate Races. On its front page, the Washington Post (10/29, Barnes, Mosk, 748K) reports a new Post poll indicates a "strong Democratic tide in Maryland threatens to swamp" Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) and hold the state's open US Senate seat. The poll of 1,003 registered voters who said they were "absolutely certain to vote" (+/- 3%), taken October 22-26, shows Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) at 55% and Ehrlich at 45% in the gubernatorial race. In the Senate race, MD3 Rep. Ben Cardin (D) is at 54%, Lt. Gov Michael Steele (R) 43%, and third-party candidate Kevin Zeese 1%. The Republican campaigns "disputed the poll, saying it was too different from recent polls that they had seen that showed the races much closer." Ehrlich campaign manager Bo Harmon said, "It is simply unrealistic to think that a governor with approval ratings as high as this, who has provided record education funding and cut crime around the state is losing by 10 points to the mayor of the deadliest city in the country." And Steele spokesman Doug Heye said, "It is a dead heat, and Michael Steele is gaining ground every day."

Steele Crashes State NAACP Convention To Criticize Cardin. The Washington Times (10/29, Miller, 88K) reports Steele "made an unscheduled appearance at the NAACP state convention" in Baltimore Saturday, where he criticized Cardin "for paying only lip service to black voters." Steele said, "I'm tired of listening to leadership that fails to deliver." Cardin told the NAACP that "returning a Democrat to Maryland's Senate seat would help the party take control of the chamber and challenge President Bush's policies."

O'Malley Charges Ehrlich With Use Of "Coded" Racial Language. The Washington Post (10/29, C5, Wagner, 748K) reports O'Malley also addressed the NAACP gathering, where he accused Ehrlich "of using racially 'coded, charged language' when talking about Baltimore's schoolchildren" and accused Ehrlich of "pursuing policies unfriendly to African Americans." Ehrlich, "who entered the room after O'Malley had finished speaking, offered no direct response from the podium, instead listing the African Americans he has appointed to key positions and the programs he has supported. Afterward, he called the mayor 'uniformly negative.'"

Third-Party Senate Hopeful Zeese Profiled. The Washington Post (10/29, C6, Wan, 748K) profiles Zeese.

Webb Blasts "Unprincipled, Small-Minded, Power-Hungry" Allen. The Washington Post (10/29, C6, Craig, Shear, 748K) reports Virginia Senate candidate James Webb (D) "delivered his strongest criticism" of Sen. George Allen (R) "of the fall campaign, vigorously defending himself against Allen's charges that he wrote sex-laced passages in his fiction novels. He called on voters to reject what he called the 'smear tactics' of Allen and his campaign," particularly on the Allen camp's release of sexually explicit excerpts of Webb's novels." Webb said, "The fish rots from the head down. Our government should no longer be in the hands of a group of unprincipled, small-minded, power-hungry character assassins."

The Washington Times (10/29, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Webb said Allen "crossed the line when he used salacious excerpts from his wartime novels to question his character and respect for women." Speaking in Annandale, Webb said, "I've lived in the real world, and I reported the real world in my writings. … I have written what I have seen, and that is the duty of a writer -- to help people understand the world around us with all of its beauty and all of its flaws." The Allen campaign's decision to highlight Webb's novels "angered Democrats and disappointed at least one Republican. 'It's so dirty,' Michelle Malkin, a conservative columnist, said on Fox News. 'It looks desperate. It looks pathetic, and it looks so immature. … This is fiction.'"

NYTimes Endorses Lamont In Connecticut Senate Race. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) endorses businessman Ned Lamont (D) in the Connecticut Senate race, saying that the "fatal problem" with incumbent Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is not that he was wrong about the invasion" of Iraq, "but that he has not shown any capacity to grow and change." Lieberman "has changed his tone but not his underlying conviction that he has been right all along." He and President Bush "are still on the very same page, encouraging the American people to believe that there is a happy ending for American involvement in Iraq, and that all it takes is the perseverance to keep marching toward the end of the rainbow." Lamont "has run a far less polished campaign than Mr. Lieberman, but the more we see of him, the more impressed we are by his intelligence and his growing sophistication about the issues facing the nation. He is very much in the Connecticut mold of basically moderate, principled politicians, and his willingness to take on Mr. Lieberman when no one else dared to do it showed real courage and conviction. He would make a good senator. More important, he has the capacity to continually become a better one."

Campaign Is Most Expensive In Connecticut History. The New York Times (10/29, A30, Medina, 1.21M) writes that while Lieberman "may have lost the Democratic primary to a novice politician, his bid in the general election has come with all the financial advantages of a major party candidate and an 18-year incumbent." Lieberman's "financial prowess" has prompted Lamont "to dig deeper into his pockets, putting $12.7 million into the campaign so far." The race "has quickly become the most expensive in the state's history, with Mr. Lieberman spending $11.5 million and Mr. Lamont spending $8.6 million through the end of September. And there is no sign of slowing down."

Bloomberg Plays Big Role In Lieberman Reelection Effort. The AP (10/28) writes that if Lieberman wins, "it's a safe bet New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will be high on his thank-you list. Bloomberg, a Republican who shares Lieberman's independent streak, is playing a prominent role helping to raise money" for Lieberman, and "has also dispatched several campaign operatives to Connecticut to help Lieberman reach GOP and independent voters as the race closes."

Kean Has Two-Point Lead In Rasmussen New Jersey Senate Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely New Jersey voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, finds state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) at 43% and US Sen. Bob Menendez (D) at 41%.

Bayonne Development Role Shows Two Sides Of Menendez. The New York Times (10/29, Kocieniewski, Rivera, 1.21M) runs a front-page report on the role of Menendez in the construction of a new waterfront development in Bayonne, New Jersey. While Menendez "is not directly involved" in the project, "his influence can be seen throughout it." The project "is being built with the help of nearly $30 million in federal funds that Mr. Menendez secured using his trademark policy expertise and aggressive politicking." It will contain "movie studios and shops, marinas and waterfront parks, and 6,600 homes." But the project "has also produced considerable work for some of his chief political supporters." The project "displays the two contrasting images of Mr. Menendez -- one a fiery advocate who brings home federal aid for his constituents, the other a political empire builder who detractors say pushes too much largess toward his friends."

Corker, Ford Meet In Final Televised Tennessee Senate Debate. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (10/29, Locker, 172K) reports TN9 Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) "drove home his message for change" while Bob Corker (R) "emphasized his 'Tennessee life' and values in Saturday night's final televised debate" of the Tennessee Senate campaign. Neither candidate "unveiled new themes in their meeting at Vanderbilt University. And some attacks that dominated the previous two debates in Memphis and Chattanooga were absent. But the negative TV attack ads of the past three weeks surfaced at the end of the face-off." Ford said, "I was a little surprised to see the smut and the slime coming into my living room during family time." Corker said he "didn't like the ads and that he asked his national party to remove them. He asked Ford to join him in calling for all ads not put up directly by the two candidates' campaigns to cease. But he said after the debate that the national Democratic Party is spending $2.7 million on ads compared to $813,000 by the national GOP over the last two weeks."

Brooks Says Senate Would Miss Santorum's Antipoverty Efforts. In his New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) column, David Brooks writes, "Every poll suggests that Rick Santorum will lose his race to return to the U.S. Senate. That's probably good news in Pennsylvania's bobo suburbs, where folks regard Santorum as an ideological misfit and a social blight. But it's certainly bad for poor people around the world. For there has been at least one constant in Washington over the past 12 years: almost every time a serious piece of antipoverty legislation surfaces in Congress, Rick Santorum is there playing a leadership role. … The bottom line is this: If serious antipoverty work is going to be done, it's going to emerge from a coalition of liberals and religious conservatives. Without Santorum, that's less likely to happen."

GOP Hopes Of Pickup Fading In TX17. Under the headline "GOP Hopes Fade For Taking District Bush Calls Home," the Washington Times (10/29, Aynesworth, 88K) reports that while Texas Republicans "spent much of this year thinking they had a good chance to defeat" TX17 Rep. Chet Edwards (D). But now, Republican Van Taylor's campaign, "though well-funded, seems bogged down."

Democrats Could Gain Up To Eight GOP-Held Governor's Offices. The Washington Times (10/29, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democrats "are quietly poised to win a majority of the nation's gubernatorial offices" on November 7. The "latest polls" show Democrats could pick up currently Republican-held governorships "in eight states: Alaska, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Nevada and Ohio." DGA Communications Director Bernie Campbell said, "It's a volatile climate out there. A combination of things is working in our favor -- voter confidence in Democrats and building on the past accomplishments of our current governors."

Recently Unknown Palin Poised To Win Alaska Gubernatorial Race. The New York Times (10/29, A25, Yardley, 1.21M) profiles ex-Wasilla, Alaska, mayor Sarah Palin, who, until she "trounced Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican primary," was "hardly known" outside Wasilla. But now she has a "sizable lead in most polls" over ex-Gov. Tony Knowles (D). Palin "stands out in a state that has seen few fresh faces in politics. She is untainted by government scandal and unburdened by political debt. She is a conservative Christian who opposes abortion." She is "portraying herself as a needed outside agent of change" at a time when the FBI "is investigating links between Republican leaders in the Legislature and a major player in the oil industry."

Crist Leads Davis By Six Points In Florida Gubernatorial Poll. The St. Petersburg Times (10/28, Smith) reports Florida gubernatorial a poll of 800 voters (+/- 3.5%) for the newspaper by Schroth/Eldon and the Polling Company, taken October 22-25, shows state Attorney General Charlie Crist (R) at 48% and FL11 Rep. Jim Davis (D) at 42%.

Beebe Has Eight-Point Lead In Arkansas Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely Arkansas voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 22, finds state Attorney General Mike Beebe (D) at 49% and Asa Hutchinson (R) at 41%.

Ritter Leads By 12 Points In Colorado Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely Colorado voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 22, finds Denver District Attorney Bill Ritter (D) at 51% and CO7 Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) at 39%.

Patrick Has 24-Point Lead In Massachusetts Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely Massachusetts voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 22, finds former Assistant Attorney General Deval Patrick (D) at 53%, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey (R) at 29%, and businessman Christy Mihos (I) at 11%.

Gibbons Willing To Take Polygraph Over Assault Allegation. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) reports NV2 Rep. Jim Gibbons (R), running for governor, "said he'd be willing to take a polygraph to prove he did not assault" Las Vegas cocktail waitress Chrissy Mazzeo. Mazzeo "has said Gibbons pushed her up against a wall at a Las Vegas restaurant Oct. 13 and made a sexual advance while he and a prominent GOP operative were walking her to her truck." Gibbons says she "tripped and he caught her, then walked away."

Female Candidates Well-Positioned In Races In Western States. The New York Times Magazine (10/29, Starr) runs a feature on women seeking office in Western states. In WA8, Darcy Burner (D) "appears to have a good shot," and in AZ8, Gabrielle Giffords (D) "is favored to win." Nevada Democratic gubernatorial nominee Dina Titus is "headlining an almost all-female ticket," and NM1, where Rep. Heather Wilson (R) faces state Attorney General Patricia Madrid (D), "will send a woman to Congress no matter which party prevails." The West is said to be "well poised to retain its status as an incubator of female leadership."

More Than One-Third Now Seek Political Information Online. The AP (10/29, Lester) reports, "Increasing numbers of people looking for political news are going online -- with more than a third now saying they check the Internet for such information." An AP-AOL News poll found they are "more likely to be younger, better educated and male than the population in general." While 35% "say they go to the Internet for political updates about campaigns and candidates, that number grows to 43 percent of likely voters -- and they tend to be more liberal than conservative."

Bush's Use Of "Internets" And "The Google" Examined. CNN (10/28, Nguyen) reported, "President Bush is a 21st century president, right? We know that, but like many of his fellow Baby Boomers, he still appears to have a 20th century vocabulary." CNN (Moos) continued, "He can handle a power saw, but when it comes to the power of the Internet…" President Bush: "I hear there's rumors on the Internets." Moos: "Not once, but at least twice, President Bush has inexplicably added an 's.' … And now the leader dubbed 'Googler-in-Chief' by the 'Wall Street Journal' has struck again. During a CNBC interview, the President was asked if he ever Googles." Bush: "Occasionally. One of the things I've used on the Google is I can pull up maps." Moos: "'The Google?' It may be petty, but 'the Google' had techno geeks agog. I wonder on which one of the Internets he uses the Google on."

WPost Supports Review Of Virginia's Mental Health Laws. The Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K), in an editorial, writes, "Increasing numbers of mentally ill people in Virginia end up on the streets, in court or in jail, instead of in treatment, where they belong. Chief Justice Leroy R. Hassell Sr. of the Virginia Supreme Court has launched a commission to revamp state mental health laws, including the state's outmoded criteria for civil commitment, which provide emergency treatment only when people are an 'imminent danger' to themselves or others. … At a recent hearing, however, Sen. Kenneth W. Stolle (R-Virginia Beach) warned the court not to overstep its role by getting involved in policy." The Post contends, "Justice Hassell should be applauded instead of criticized."

Nuclear-Armed Iran Seen As Grave Danger To US, Israel, Sunnis. In an 8,000-word article for the New York Times Magazine (10/29) titled, "Islam, Terror And The Second Nuclear Age," Noah Feldman, a law professor at New York University and adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, writes, "A nuclear Iran means, at the very least, a realignment of power dynamics in the Persian Gulf. It could potentially mean much more: a historic shift in the position of the long-subordinated Shiite minority relative to the power and prestige of the Sunni majority, which traditionally dominated the Muslim world. Many Arab Sunnis fear that the moment is ripe for a Shiite rise." Near the end of the article Feldman concludes the US "has strong reason to block its enemy Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons…because the Islamic Republic of Iran as currently constituted is definitionally anti-American. There need not be a direct threat of Iranian first use against either the United States or Israel for this reason to weigh heavily. A nuclear Iran will be a stronger and more effective enemy in pursuing anti-American policies under the banner of Islam. … If and when Iran does have the bomb, its enhanced power and prestige will certainly be lent to policies that it conceives as promoting the Islamic interest."

Journalist Warns Discussions Of Iran And Iraq Sound Similar. In the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), journalist Jon Sawyer comments about the "déjà vu" caused by current discussion of Iran as a threat: "Four weeks ago, Congress enacted and President Bush signed the Iran Freedom Support Act, a resolution very much in the spirit of the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act. ... But if the confrontation over Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program ends in war — initiated by this administration or the next — you can bet this law will be cited as proof that Congress was onboard all along. The congressional action isn't the only sign of déjà vu. Recent months have seen the creation of an 'Iran directorate' at the Pentagon, using some of the same personnel as the Office of Special Plans" that was "accused of massaging raw intelligence on Iraq to make the case for war look far more solid than in fact it was."

Russia Surpasses US In Arms Sales To Developing World. In a front page article, the New York Times (10/29, Shanker, 1.21M) reports that "an annual study by the Congressional Research Service that is considered the most thorough compilation of statistics available in an unclassified form" found that "Russia surpassed the United States in 2005 as the leader in weapons deals with the developing world, and its new agreements included selling $700 million in surface-to-air missiles to Iran and eight new aerial refueling tankers to China." Those "sales to improve Iran's air-defense system are particularly troubling to the United States because they would complicate the task of Pentagon planners should the president order airstrikes on Iran's nuclear weapons facilities." Also, those "extensive trade relations" have partly been behind Russian officials' "expressed reluctance to vote for the most stringent economic sanctions" on Tehran. Additionally, "Russia's weapons sales to China…worry Pentagon planners" as "Taiwan remains a potential flash point between Beijing and Washington." Previously, the US "regularly dominated" the "highly competitive global arms bazaar in the developing world" since the fall of the USSR. However, the report finds "France ranked second in arms transfer agreements to developing nations, with $6.3 billion, and the United States was third, with $6.2 billion."

US Considers Deploying Patriot System Near Tokyo. The AP (10/29, Greimel) reports, "Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government it is considering putting Patriot Advanced Capability 3 surface-to-air interceptor missiles around Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and around Yokosuka Naval Base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported without saying how it got the information." The Pentagon has "already confirmed that the first batch of equipment for the PAC-3 missiles arrived in Okinawa in southern Japan, where the bulk of U.S. forces in the nation are stationed." The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

Domestic Concerns Said To Shape US Foreign Aid. The New York Times (10/29, Dugger, 1.21M) reports on its front page, "Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America" and "American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost." While "those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular," the "skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent." The federal government's condom purchases show "the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style." Asian produced condoms are cheaper, but Alabama Congressmen have protected their local plant's contract, as "Without the government contract," the company, Alatech, "would go out of business."

Tight Energy Markets Fund, Distort Diplomacy In Favor Of Hostile Nations. The Washington Times (10/29, Sands, 88K) reports, "Exploiting tight global energy markets and soaring gas prices in recent years, leading energy producers around the globe are using their export windfalls to challenge U.S. interests, intimidate U.S. allies and, in some cases, bankroll terrorist and insurgent groups fighting U.S. forces," as "hundreds of billions of dollars swelling the coffers of regimes hostile to the United States." Flynt Leverett, a former top Middle East adviser in the Bush administration, and Pierre Noel, a research fellow with the French Institute of International Relations, say "Major producers such as Venezuela, Russia and Iran have teamed up with emerging energy consumers -- notably China -- in an 'axis of oil' to frustrate U.S. foreign-policy objectives." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "conceded earlier this year she underestimated the ways the 'energy question' distorted international relations."

Chirac Said To Be Under "Unrelenting" Attack In France. The New York Times (10/29, A3, Sciolino, 1.21M) reports that French president Jacques Chirac "has been under unrelenting — indeed unprecedented — attack," and it has "crescendoed since Mr. Chirac suffered what has been called a mild cerebral attack a year ago, focusing on his age, his leadership and his legacy." This "disillusionment with Mr. Chirac is not only personal but also a reflection of the dread among the French public that their nation has lost its glory abroad and its way at home." His "1995 campaign promises to 'mend the social fracture' in France and reduce unemployment, among other things, have been unfulfilled," and "As the end of his political career draws near, the fear of him has receded, and the time to settle scores has come." However, "Chirac is not a politician who can go quietly into the night," and he "has refused to announce that he will not run for a third term next spring, saying that he will announce his decision next March." Still, "conventional wisdom is that Mr. Chirac plans to retire but refuses to become a lame duck."

French Youths Set Bus Ablaze, Seriously Burn Woman. The AP (10/28) reports, "A group of marauding teenagers set fire to a bus Saturday in the southern French port city of Marseille, seriously wounding a passenger and leaving three others suffering from smoke inhalation," when "three or four young people burst onto a bus in the southern French city and tossed inside a bottle of flammable liquid before fleeing." One of the passengers, a 26-year-old woman, "suffered second- and third-degree burns on her arms, legs and face." Scattered violence resulted in six police officers with minor injuries and 47 arrests. "Bands of youths torched two public buses, and in troubled neighborhoods around the country, youths set fire to a total of 277 vehicles."

Eastern Europe Sees Rise Of Populism, Nationalism. The Washington Times/AP (10/29, Gera) reports, "Political life has fallen into disarray in Eastern Europe, and many are asking what has gone wrong in the 2½ years since these former communist countries joined the European Union." Some "specialists on the region say people are simply exhausted after years of economic sacrifices made to join the EU and NATO. They now lack the clear goals that drove them toward the West" and "discontent is mounting as the instant riches many thought would come from EU membership have failed to materialize." Jiri Pehe, a political analyst and director of New York University in Prague, notes "we see now…a rise of populists and nationalism," but "also stressed that the 'democratic framework is very strong, and it's supported by the outside,' thanks to the region's integration with the West."

Abbas Considering Calling On Jordan PLO Troops Against Hamas. The Washington Times/AP (10/29, Teibel) reports that according to the Palestinian officials, "Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas hopes to beef up his loyalist forces with Palestine Liberation Organization troops from Jordan… as rival Palestinian factions bolstered their ranks in anticipation of a feared civil war." While "Israel has objected in the past to letting members of the Jordan-based Badr Brigade enter Palestinian areas," the officials say "Israeli officials said they would consider allowing them in" due to the "intensifying" conflict between Fatah "and forces loyal to the militantly anti-Israel Hamas government." However," Israeli authorities were not immediately available for comment yesterday."

Fox Orders Police Into Oaxaca Following Killings. The Washington Post (10/29, A14, Roig-Franzia, 748K) reports that following the shooting death of U.S. journalist Brad Will and two protesters, Mexican "President Vicente Fox on Saturday ordered federal police to seize control of strike-ravaged Oaxaca de Juarez," a move he had resisted "Despite pressure from Oaxaca's tourist industry." As "federal officers have been accused in the past of inciting violence," Mexican presidents usually are "reluctant to use force." This five-month conflict "has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster," and "the demonstrations have left the region a shambles and scared away the tourists who are the foundation of the city's economy." While strikers blame "the killings on plainclothes paramilitary members affiliated with Gov. Ulises Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party," the governor's office says it was "members of the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, an umbrella group that includes union members and indigenous groups that have joined the teachers' protest." This "spike in violence also seemed to suggest that there will be a long wait before Oaxaca's stunning colonial streets are once again crawling with camera-toting tourists. After the shootings, the U.S. ambassador in Mexico, Tony Garza, warned Americans to stay away."

The New York Times (10/29, A4, Lacey) adds that federal riot police officers and soldiers are "poised to end an increasingly violent protest," although it is "unclear…whether the federal troops intended to take over Oaxaca by force or to merely put pressure on the protesters to continue the monthslong negotiations to end the impasse." While "the federal government issued a statement ordering the protesters to 'immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property' so that officials could 'guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population's individual guarantees,'" the "blunt" response from Florentino López, spokesman for the APPO was, "We're going to resist the attack." Meanwhile, "the mayor of a nearby town said the five men being detained for possible involvement in Mr. Will's killing were…police officers and local officials."

The AP (10/29, Romero) identities that mayor as Mayor Manuel Martinez Feria of the nearby town of Santa Lucia del Camino, and he identified the men "as two members of Santa Lucia's city council, two of that town's police officers and a former justice of the peace from another town." Additionally, "U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said in a statement that the shooters may have been Oaxaca police, and the Mexico City newspaper El Universal published photos Saturday identifying some of the men firing at protesters as local officials."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Enriquez, Johnson, 918K) adds, "by Saturday evening, there were signs that both the protesters and federal officials might be stepping back from a confrontation." APPO leader Flavio Sosa "indicated that his group would continue to maintain its barricades but would not fight back if the federal forces attempted to dismantle them." Meanwhile, Arturo Chavez Chavez, deputy secretary of state, said "that the federal forces had been sent only to prevent more violence and were not 'contemplating any type of action' on Saturday or today."

Castro Makes TV Appearance. The AP (10/28) reports, "The ailing Fidel Castro appeared on Cuban state television for the first time in more than a month Saturday, looking thin and tired but walking and ridiculing recent rumors of his death," and saying "they were the work of his enemies." Castro "said his recovery would be long and not without risk," but added, "I'm not the least bit afraid of what will occur." The BBC (10/29) also covers this story on their website.

Contras Divided Over Support For Ortega. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Tobar, 918K) reports that a "split in the Contras highlights a growing frustration among the rural population that makes up the movement's rank and file, analysts say." Now, "Several Contra leaders who have defected to the Sandinista cause say they feel the movement's right-wing political allies have taken them for granted." Salvador Talavera, president of the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, the conservative political group started by the demobilized Contras, "signed a 'peace agreement' with the Sandinistas by which the Contras promised not to go to war again should their bitterest foe, Daniel Ortega, win the Nov. 5 presidential election." It "was a big boost for Ortega" and "a stunning setback to the presidential aspirations of Eduardo Montealegre of the conservative Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance."

NYTimes Says Nicaragua Took "Giant Step Backward" With Abortion Law. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) editorializes, "The rights and safety of Nicaragua's women took a giant step backward last week when the country's legislature passed a law criminalizing all abortions, with no exceptions." The Times says Nicaragua's ban "was a clear bid to curry support from the Catholic Church before next weekend's presidential elections."

Bolivia Signs New Energy Deals With Foreign Corporations. BBC.com (10/29) reports that although some "were signed with only minutes to go before the deadline," Bolivia has made new energy deals with 10 foreign gas and oil firms. "After President Evo Morales nationalised the oil and gas industry in May to give the state more control and a larger slice of profits," he gave them "six months to sign contracts giving up majority control of their Bolivian operations." The "deal with Petrobras - the largest foreign investor in the industry - came as a significant boost for Mr Morales as the Brazilians have invested more than $1bn in Bolivian gas. However, Petrobras and the Brazilian government had been angered by the way the Bolivians conducted negotiations."

Venezuelan Town Faces Mining Ban. The New York Times (10/29, A4, Romero, 1.21M) reports La Paragua, Venezuela, "has become a focus of efforts by President Hugo Chávez to halt much of the mining, citing environmental concerns. In September, army soldiers sent here to enforce a mining ban killed six miners, setting off violent protests." The Times adds, "The government has promised to create jobs for miners in tourism or agriculture, and to teach them to plant crops like cassava or corn. But miners say the promises have not been fulfilled, and last year, hundreds near the town of Las Claritas blocked a highway to Brazil and threw Molotov cocktails at troops."

Polls Show Lula With "Insurmountable" Lead In Brazil's Presidential Runoff Election. The New York Times (10/29, A4, Rohter, 1.21M) reports, "Rebuked at the polls four weeks ago because of voter irritation with a corruption scandal and his unwillingness to answer questions about it, Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, heads into a runoff vote on Sunday with a lead that every poll suggests is insurmountable." The "final round of public opinion surveys published Friday shows Mr. da Silva…defeating his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin…by at least 60 percent to 40 percent." He was "able to pull away from Mr. Alckmin over the past several weeks, in part, by labeling him a one-note candidate who spoke more of corruption than of his own plans for Brazil."

The Washington Post (10/29, A14, Reel, 748K) adds, "Bolsa Familia is the cash assistance program that pays more than 11 million low-income families in Brazil about $40 per month in cash if they meet conditions such as ensuring their children regularly attend school and have regular health checkups and vaccinations," and "it has been instrumental in helping President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcome corruption scandals and build a lead of more than 20 points in opinion polls." Poor Brazilians "strongly associate the program with Lula…and surveys indicate that support for Lula among the two-thirds of the population that lives on less than $500 per month is powering his reelection hopes."

The AP (10/29, Astor) notes that "da Silva has revived the populist rhetoric he had largely shed since taking office," and his "Fiery speeches contrasting the lives of Brazil's poor with the wealthy elite have left many Brazilians wondering whether he would push the country to the left." Although "few believe Silva would adopt the radical populism of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, they worry that he could entrench divisions in Brazil" between the rich and poor.

Kabila, Bemba Compete In Congolese Runoff Election. BBC.com (10/28) reports, "Voting has opened for a new president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, in one of Africa's most significant elections for many years. President Joseph Kabila, who came to power after his father Laurent was assassinated in 2001, is facing former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba. … Sunday's run-off will conclude the DRC's first fully democratic polls since independence in 1960 and is aimed at restoring peace to one of Africa's largest and most turbulent states."

DOJ_NMG_0087913

The Washington Post (10/29, A16, McCrummen, 748K) reports, "There is an exuberant, if fragile, sense in eastern Congo these days that the country is inching toward one of the most significant moments in its post-colonial history. In the culmination of the first multiparty elections in 40 years, tens of millions of people are expected at the polls Sunday for the runoff vote for president and to elect, for the first time, provincial legislators tasked with bringing democracy closer to people who have seen decades of epic corruption and two ruthless wars. The process has been largely peaceful, the result of a massive logistical effort by the United Nations, which has deployed 17,500 peacekeepers; international donors, who have given $450 million; and mainly, the Congolese themselves."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Sanders, 918K) reports, "Anxious Congolese returned to the polls this morning to complete the first democratic presidential election in more than 40 years. But fears of renewed violence in this Central African giant largely overshadowed the hope and optimism many had expressed during the first round of voting."

Sudan Denies Accusation Of Bombing Chadian Towns. The AP (10/28) reports, "Chad accused neighboring Sudan on Saturday of bombing four towns along its eastern border, close to Sudan's volatile western Darfur region where thousands have been displaced by three years of conflict." Sudanese army spokesman Brig. Gen. Osman Mohammed al-Aghbash denied the report. The AP adds, "There has been no independent confirmation of the Chadian government's allegations that Sudan's air force attacked the villages of Bahai, Tine, Kayarin and Bamina on Friday."

"Secret Lover" Anti-AIDS Campaign Stirred Controversy In Swaziland. The Washington Post (10/29, A15, Timberg, 748K) reports on a new Swazi anti-AIDS campaign "arrived without warning" with a the message "Your secret lover can kill you," ads that were different from "bland billboards suggesting that more condoms or a positive attitude toward the disease would curb its spread." The new ads disappeared two weeks later "in a frenzy of controversy," but they have "sparked a passionate national debate about how best to combat a disease that, Swazis say, has pushed their country to the brink of collapse. And the ads forced many here to confront how freewheeling sex was fueling an epidemic of early death." The Post writes, "Although polygamy is common -- the king has 13 wives -- even more common, Swazis say, are relationships in which men have only one wife but girlfriends also. Women often maintain several partners as well."

Six-Year-Old Boy Works As Indentured Servant In Africa. The New York Times (10/29, Lafraniere, 1.21M) reports on child labor in Africa, telling the story through the eyes of six-year-old Mark Kwadwo, and says that "no means is the child trafficking trade uniquely African. Children are forced to race camels in the Middle East, weave carpets in India and fill brothels all over the developing world." The UN's International Labor Organization "estimates that 1.2 million are sold into servitude every year in an illicit trade that generates as much as $10 billion annually. Studies show they are most vulnerable in Asia, Latin America and Africa. Africa's children, the world's poorest, account for roughly one-sixth of the trade, according to the labor organization. Data is notoriously scarce, but it suggests victimization of African children on a huge scale."

WPost Condemns Libyan Trial Of Healthcare Workers. In an editorial, the Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K) condemns the Libyan trial of five Bulgarian nurses and a Palesinian doctor who are "are accused of intentionally injecting the AIDS virus into more than 400 Libyan children." The Post describes the charges as "an attempt to deflect Libyans' attention from the shocking state of their own medical system." The Post concludes, "If Libya nonetheless goes ahead with this travesty of justice, it will be saying that it prefers to scapegoat foreigners rather than admit to the weakness of its own medical system. The first victims will be the health workers. But they will be followed by the Libyans themselves, who need a government with the honesty to confront the true causes of HIV infections."

Kristof Calls On World Leaders To Intervene In Darfur. In an op-ed in the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "This past week alone, Sudan expelled the U.N. envoy for Sudan and sent a proxy army to invade eastern Chad. Those moves underscored both the audacity of Sudan's leaders and the fecklessness of the rest of the world's," but Kristoff says, "[T]here's plenty we can do." He proposes several steps, including, "Kofi Annan should appoint a new U.N. Envoy of utmost prominence. … The envoy's job would be to lead an intensive negotiation aimed at achieving a political settlement." Also, "President Bush and European leaders need to use their leverage on four nations in particular to make them part of the solution: China, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Libya."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rasmussen Poll Shows Increase In Confidence On War On Terror. A national Rasmussen Report survey of 1,000 adults (+/- 3%) taken October 25-26 shows a "slight rebound in confidence among the American public" on the war on terror. Right now, 38% say the US and its allies "are winning the war while 29% say terrorists have the edge." Earlier in October, the "public assessment was much more bleak. Just 31% thought the U.S. and its allies were winning while 36% gave terrorists the advantage." But President Bush's handling of Iraq continues to receive low scores, with 50% calling it "poor," and 30% "excellent" or "good."

SouthCom Head Says Guantanamo Bay Meets Geneva Standards. McClatchy (10/29, Rosenberg) reports, "Just days into the job, the Pentagon's new Southern Command chief made an overnight weekend visit to the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay - and declared captive conditions compatible with the Geneva Conventions." Admiral James Stavridis, speaking to the McClatchy-owned Miami Herald, called detainees "a hearty bunch" and assessed interrogations as "amicable conversations between two people." He found the 14 "high-value detainees" to be in "very good shape." About 15 sites carried this story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

TSA's "Observational Techniques" Passenger Screening Program Defended. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (10/29, B3, 748K) Paul Ekman, professor emeritus of psychology at the University of California at San Francisco and pro bono adviser to the Transportation Security Administration's SPOT program, writes, "Critics of the controversial new security program…known as SPOT, for Screening Passengers by Observational Techniques -- have said that it is an unnecessary invasion of privacy, based on an untested method of observation, that is unlikely to yield much in the way of red-handed terrorists set on blowing up a plane or flying it into a building, but would violate fliers' civil rights. I disagree. I've participated in four decades' worth of research into deception and demeanor, and I know that researchers have amassed enough knowledge about how someone who is lying looks and behaves that it would be negligent not to use it in the search for terrorists. Along with luggage checks, radar screening, bomb-sniffing dogs and the rest of our security arsenal, observational techniques can help reduce risks -- and potentially prevent another deadly assault like the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001."

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Maliki Smooth Over Differences Via Videoconference. Coverage of President Bush's videoconference with Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki highlighted the discord over the past week and the inability or unwillingness of Baghdad to curb militia violence. NBC Nightly News (10/28, lead story, 0:40, Jordan, 9.87M) reported the videoconference took place "after a week of growing tension over how Baghdad is coping with the violence. Aides said he is in charge of making Iraq secure and the U.S. is there to help, not run the show. Americans are deeply uneasy about the war. Twenty-nine percent say the US is making progress in efforts to make Iraq more secure, while 60% say the U.S. is losing ground."

The New York Times (10/29, A1, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports Bush "stepped into an increasingly fractious relationship with the Iraqi government in a videoconference with Baghdad on Saturday." An "acrimonious conversation" between Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Maliki appears to represent "a growing schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and its American supporters, a division building for months that burst into full public view this week." The pessimistic article observes criticism by both sides of key figures: Khalilzad is blamed by Iraqi leaders for "intense efforts to bring minority Sunni Arabs into Iraqi politics. Shiite leaders say he has worked so hard to involve Sunnis that he has abandoned the Shiites." Meanwhile, Maliki's "early months as prime minister were widely described in Washington as a disappointment."

The Washington Post (10/29, A19, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports Bush "coaxed" Maliki "back into a common front with the U.S. administration Saturday, soothing the Iraqi leader." The Post calls the past week evidence of "an embarrassing rift" and notes pessimistically that the proposed commission "for speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces, moving ahead on efforts to put Iraq in control of those forces, and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security" follows another commission that was unable to prevent the "explosion" of sectarian warfare.

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Daragahi, 918K) reports Bush "upheld Washington's commitment to his Shiite-dominated government despite its failure to rein in the Shiite militias, which form a nucleus of Maliki's political base." However, the Times also reports in a more optimistic light, "Maliki and U.S. officials have pressured anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to crack down on a powerful and volatile militia nominally under his control. On Saturday, several members of his organization said that Sadr had designated a committee of loyalists to investigate and purge his organization of the most egregious troublemakers."

The AP (10/28) reports Bush "reaffirmed his support for Iraq's prime minister, telling Nouri al Maliki that he isn't 'America's man in Iraq' but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding."

CNN.com (10/28) reports Maliki "referred to the boundary between himself and the United States, telling U.S. President Bush that he answers first to the Iraqi government and people, according to an Iraqi official." The AP (10/28) reports Bush "reaffirmed his support" for Maliki, telling him "that he isn't 'America's man in Iraq' but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding."

Iraqi And US Governments Differ On Timetables. The Washington Post (10/29, Pincus, 748K) reports, "Recent discussion about Iraq has focused on the U.S. and Iraqi governments setting benchmarks for improving stability so the United States can eventually draw down troops, but public statements have made it difficult to determine who has agreed to what. The situation seemed to change over the course of the week, until finally it appeared that little had really happened." The Post lists statements by Khalilzad, Maliki, Bush, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and White House spokesman Tony Snow that resulted in the "videoconference to smooth out the differences that had bubbled up during the week."

Aide Says Iraqi PM Uses US Voters' Angst. The AP (10/29, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports Maliki said Bush "promised to move swiftly to turn over full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government." A close Maliki aide "said later the prime minister was intentionally playing on U.S. voter displeasure with the war to strengthen his hand with Washington." Hassan al-Suneid declared that "issues needed airing at a higher level" than with Khalilzad, adding that Maliki "complained to Bush that Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shiite al-Maliki imperiously."

The Washington Times (10/29, 88K) also reports on the discord, leading, "A festering grievance between Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the United States escalated yesterday with Mr. al-Maliki telling President Bush that America's ambassador in Baghdad acts like a viceroy instead of a diplomat."

October May Be Remembered As War's "Tipping Point." The Washington Post (10/29, Ricks, Baker, 748K) says in a bleak front page story that this month "may be remembered as the month that the U.S. experience in Iraq hit a tipping point, when the violence flared and shook both the military command in Iraq and the political establishment back in Washington. Plans to stabilize Baghdad collided with a surge in violence during the holy month of Ramadan. Sectarian revenge killings spread, consuming a town 50 miles from the capital." US officials

"spoke of setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to take on more responsibility, only to have the Iraqi prime minister call that suggestion election-year grandstanding." President Bush "compared the situation to the 1968 Tet Offensive -- often seen as a turning point in the Vietnam War -- and urged Americans not to become disillusioned.

NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 2, 03:16, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported a rocket attack at a Baghdad market Saturday "killed a person and injured 35 others. The Pentagon said one US Marine was killed in a separate incident bringing the number of troops killed this month to 98."

Iraqis, Americans Live In Two Worlds In Iraq. The New York Times (10/29, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "Part of the problem is that the Americans cannot see for themselves how bad things get when they are not around. ... When Americans move through Iraq, they do so like a giant ship cutting through a thick and treacherous sea. They move slowly, displacing the harsh reality on both sides, carving out a trough of safety around them. But after they pass, reality closes back in, in all its sucking, swirling fury. That reality is terrifying because much of Iraq is a place without rules or laws, in which armed gangs, sometimes dressed as police officers, can come into any house and do exactly as they please."

Troops Work In Villages To Sway Iraqis. The Washington Post (10/29, White, 748K) reports in a relatively cheerful article on troops serving in Mustafar, Iraq, "It is in small villages like these that U.S. soldiers say they are making their biggest strides but also face their biggest challenges. Commanders in Iraq say they can win any battle against armed insurgents and conduct any military operation successfully, but persuading Iraqis to believe in Iraq could end up being the most difficult battle in this war. There are places in Iraq where U.S. troops are greeted with suspicion. And there are others where they confront grave danger. ... But in some of the small towns that ring the southern edge of Baghdad, the situation is quite different. For many residents, the daily dose of roadside bombs and gunshots that plague the capital is glimpsed only on television. Here, U.S. forces work to provide more electricity, to ensure water supplies are clean and to fix roads. The locals appear to appreciate it, but they also appear to genuinely fear what could happen if U.S. forces leave."

Baghdad Enjoys Respite From Violence. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 3, 03:42, Arraf, 9.87M) reported, "In a city where life is a game of chance, a Saturday afternoon escape is playing bingo. This man has just won a mobile phone. He has come here with a group of relatives. It's felt more secure in the past few days he said." Iraqi man: "We haven't heard a lot of explosions in the last two or three days." NBC (Arraf): "Officials and ordinary Iraqis are hoping desperately the relative quiet in Baghdad is not just a temporary lull."

"Little Things" Fade From Iraqi Life. The New York Times (10/29, A6, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports on a discussion among four Iraqi women of life amidst Iraq's dangers: "Their stories began with a familiar theme: the shrinking lives of middle-class families in the capital. Social clubs have emptied out. Weddings have been sparsely attended. But as the circle has become smaller, and as they focus intensely on just staying alive, they said, even the basics are being stripped away. ... Life was also hard under Saddam Hussein, the women pointed out. Plans were equally impossible to build. But the basic fabric of life, visiting family, attending weddings and funerals, was for the most part intact. Now Iraqis are letting go even of those parts."

Returning WPost Correspondent Dismayed By Baghdad's Changes. In the Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) Outlook section, Post reporter Anthony Shadid returns to Baghdad after "nearly a year" of absence and reports, "On my return, it was difficult to grasp how atomized and violent the 1,250-year-old city has become. Even on the worst days, I had always found Baghdad's most redeeming quality to be its resilience, a tenacious refusal among people I met over three years to surrender to the chaos unleashed when the Americans arrived. That resilience is gone, overwhelmed by civil war, anarchy or whatever term could possibly fit. Baghdad now is convulsed by hatred, paralyzed by suspicion; fear has forced many to leave. Carnage its rhythm and despair its mantra, the capital, it seems, no longer embraces life."

Iraq Claims To Have Captured Zarqawi's Cameraman. The AP (10/28) reports, "Iraq's Defense Ministry said Saturday that the Iraqi army captured a man thought to be the personal cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group." Reportedly, "Khalid al-Hayani was detained in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad."

IED-Defusing Specialists' Challenges Profiled. The 5,000-word cover article for the Washington Post Sunday Magazine (10/29) describes the work of soldiers trying to defuse IEDs, "the explosive booby traps that kill more Americans than any other weapon." Writer Whitney Terrell rides along in a minesweeping truck, and says "25,000 improvised explosive devices…have been aimed at American troops since the war in Iraq began, severing limbs and crushing the skulls of U.S. soldiers and journalists alike." Lt. Nate Rawlings' troops – "with whom I am embedded -- are the leading edge of a $6.1 billion Pentagon effort to win the war against roadside bombings in Iraq."

Hoagland Recommends Shultz As Iraq "Policy Czar." In his Washington Post (10/29, 748K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "There seems to be almost no learning curve in Washington's dealing with Iraq's societal and religious cleavages and prickly nationalistic politicians ... This midterm election is a moment of accountability, as Bush acknowledged at the news conference where he sought to fend off intimations of disillusionment. It is the time for voters and citizens to examine recent and past mistakes and omissions of U.S. policy in Iraq and then vote accordingly. ... [Bush] should give a senior Republican wise person complete powers to steer a new course, guided by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton study group and others. George Shultz, Ronald Reagan's secretary of state (and, like Jim Baker, an ex-Marine), is the outstanding candidate for a salvage mission on Iraq."

Iraq Foundation Director Argues Against Partition. In the Washington Post (10/29, 748K), Iraq Foundation executive director Rend al-Rahim writes, "An increasing number of lawmakers in Congress are considering Iraq's partition into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions under the umbrella of a loose confederation. But partition is neither desirable nor feasible. Neat partition lines are impossible because few regions in Iraq are ethnically or confessionally homogeneous. ... A plan to partition Iraq would plunge the country into total civil war far more widespread and bloody than the sectarian and factional violence we are witnessing now."

Rich Predicts Changes Inevitable In Iraq Policy. In the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M), columnist Frank Rich writes after watching a joint appearance by Ambassador Khalilzad and General George Casey, "If there really is light at the end of the tunnel, why after three and a half years can't we yet guarantee light in Baghdad?" Rich continues, "In keeping with the political cynicism that gave birth to this war and has recklessly prolonged it, the only ones being kept in the dark about this inevitable denouement are our fighting men and women. They remain trapped, dying in accelerating numbers ... Mr. Maliki is not cracking down on rampaging militias but running interference for their kingpin, Moktada al-Sadr." Rich predicts, "After Election Day, adults in Washington will step in, bow to the obvious and pull the plug. The current administration strategy -- praying for a miracle -- is not an option. The current panacea favored by anxious Republican Congressional candidates -- firing Donald Rumsfeld -- is too little, too late."

NATO Troops Battle Afghan Insurgents. The AP (10/28, Abrashi) reports that in Uruzgan province, "NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others." A later version of the AP article gives the insurgent death toll as "at least 70." BBC.com (10/29) carries a similar report.

NATO Commander Vows Probe Of Civilian Deaths. CNN.com (10/29) reports NATO Supreme Allied Commander Gen. James Jones promised Afghan President Hamid Karzai that a "full investigation of an incident involving the unintended death of around 70 Afghan civilians would be launched." The AP (10/29, Abrashi) reports Jones "apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them."

NYTimes Continues Study Of Coalition Pursuit Of Taliban. In the New York Times Magazine (10/29), writer Elizabeth Rubin concludes her two-part story with an article on coalition forces' pursuit of the Taliban that tops 5,000 words. She says the "final draft of the U.S. military's latest counterinsurgency manual, written under the direction of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus and Lt. Gen. James Mattis, emphasizes that if you skimp on resources, endurance and meeting the population's security requirements, you lose. Yet for the past five years, the Pashtun provinces have been plagued by a lack of troops and resources. James Dobbins, President George W. Bush's former special envoy to Afghanistan, blames the White House, which he said had a predisposition against nation-building and international peacekeeping. ... 'In manpower and money,' he added, 'this was the least resourced American nation-building effort in our history.'"

Army Could Be Stretched Too Thin. The Houston Chronicle (10/29, Hedges, 535K) reports from Fort Hood, "The quick pace of comings and goings is evidence of an Army strained to the breaking point, with little in reserve if the United States is forced to respond to a new crisis, according to military analysts." Retired Maj. Gen. Barry McCaffrey asks, "What happens if we have to confront North Korea or Iran?" While some military leaders "said the Army is adapting to pressure on staffing and other aspects of its operation," the "anecdotal testimony of strain on families is backed by figures compiled by the Pentagon."

Democrats At Crossroads Over "Antiwar" Legacy. In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) David D. Kirkpatrick writes, "Democrats have spent three decades trying to exorcise the ghost" of George McGovern, but "as they look ahead, Democrats are torn between two visions of their history. Some potential candidates in the 2008 Democratic primary and many liberal activists argue that the Republican responsibility for the Iraq war has, in effect, freed the Democrats from Mr. McGovern's legacy. They say the 2006 elections will provide a mandate for a new antiwar argument: that troops can be pulled from Iraq in order to shore up American security elsewhere in the world. Other strategists and political scientists argue that the Iraq war has given the Democrats a different opportunity to lay to rest their McGovernite image, in part by rejecting calls for a quick withdrawal in Iraq."

Boot Says Military Must Adjust To Decentralized Foes. In his column for the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), Max Boot writes about the need throughout history to adjust to technological revolutions. He argues, "We have an insurmountable advantage in high-end military hardware. ... But all that spending produces weapons systems that aren't much good for pacifying Baghdad or Kandahar. ... Our scientific sophistication gives us a reasonable chance of shooting down a nuclear-tipped missile, but a nuclear suitcase smuggled into the U.S. would be much harder to detect. To stop such stealthy threats, we need to get much better at human intelligence, counterinsurgency, information operations and related disciplines. ... It may sound melodramatic, but the future of U.S. power rests on our ability to remake a government still structured for Industrial Age warfare to do battle with decentralized adversaries in the Information Age."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Groups Aligned With White House Reportedly Plan Sarbanes-Oxley Rollback. The New York Times (10/29, Labaton, 1.21M) reports on its front page that two "influential industry groups with close ties to administration officials" who are "frustrated" with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act "are drafting proposals to provide broad new protections…from criminal cases," as well as "a stronger shield against civil lawsuits from investors." The Times adds, "To alleviate concerns that the new Congress may not adopt the proposals…many are being tailored so that they could be adopted through rulemaking by the S.E.C. and enforcement policy changes at the Justice Department. The proposals will begin to be laid out in public shortly after Election Day, members of the groups said in recent interviews."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ehrlich Aide Was Subpoenaed By US Over Slots. The Baltimore Sun (10/29, Green) reports, "Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. acknowledged yesterday that a top aide received subpoenas from federal prosecutors investigating in 2004 what published reports said was the influence of slot-machine gambling interests in Annapolis, an admission that led to a demand by his Democratic opponent that the administration release full details of the probe." The Sun continues, "The legal requests came from the office of then-U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio, who had been recommended for the post by Ehrlich. … The subpoenas were issued to Paul E. Schurick, the governor's communications director and one of the key figures in Ehrlich's attempts to legalize slot machines, and were first reported this month by The Washington Post. Schurick received the requests on June 2 and June 16 in 2004 as part of a probe into gambling, the paper said, adding that the governor's press office - still run by Schurick - would not comment on them." The Sun adds, "Responding to a question from a caller on Stateline with Governor Ehrlich on WBAL radio yesterday, the governor for the first time spoke publicly about the inquiry. … 'Paul cooperated, produced everything that they wanted and nothing came of it,' said Ehrlich, responding to the caller." The Sun notes, "Later in the day, when asked for more details about what his office had provided to investigators, Ehrlich said, 'How would I know?' and added that the line of questioning was prompted by a Democratic Party memo distributed last week. It could not be learned whether federal prosecutors were targeting specific individuals in their investigation."

Katrina's Effect On San Antonio Crime Unclear. The San Antonio Express-News (10/29, Bensman) reports, "Just days after the first of about 30,000 Louisiana hurricane evacuees began arriving in San Antonio, Mayor Phil Hardberger was asked a simple question he laughingly brushed off. What might be the impact of the influx on city crime rates and services?" The Express-News continues, "More than a year later, the issue remains unaddressed, conspicuously so in light of a 55 percent spike in murders the first eight months of this year, increasing violent crime rates in San Antonio, a stretched police force and widespread media reports linking some evacuees in Houston to similar crime trends there. … So: Did the sudden arrival of about 30,000 evacuees, a group equal to Del Rio in population, cause additional crime? The question, loaded with the kind of politically sensitive racial implications that can discomfit some politicians, is much more than academic. Millions of dollars could be at stake." The Express-News adds, "The San Antonio Express-News spent four months trying to determine whether a link exists between evacuees and crime in San Antonio. Among the highlights were an extensive analysis of crime data and interviews with dozens of street-level officers, community leaders, business owners, residents and evacuees throughout the city: … Steeply declining rates of violent crime and property crime during the first eight months of 2005 suddenly reversed after they arrived, although there is no proof evacuees caused it. Houston, however, has successfully cited a similar coincidence of suddenly rising crime to argue for more federal money. … Of the 55 percent spike in San Antonio's murders this year, three suspects and two victims were found to be evacuees. Several other cases have suspected links, but dozens of cases could neither be included nor excluded as related to evacuees. Unlike Houston, the San Antonio Police Department homicide unit never has been asked to methodically look for such a connection that could be cited in a request for federal funds."

MS-13 Seen As Growing Threat In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (10/29, Mclemore) reports from Pharr, TX, "Shortly after midnight in late September, a Texas National Guard soldier with night-vision equipment spied four figures slipping through the brush and alerted Border Patrol agents. .. The men were arrested, and one in particular stood out for the extensive tattoos across his face, body and arms. … A fingerprint check showed Santos Chileno-Gomez, a 23-year-old Salvadoran, had been deported for an assault on a Long Island, N.Y., police officer. His lengthy criminal record – and the tattoos – labeled him as a member of Mara Salvatrucha 13, a vicious international street gang that federal authorities call one of the most violent in the U.S." The News adds, "Mr. Chileno-Gomez is among 76 MS-13 members apprehended by the Border Patrol in the Rio Grande Valley during the just-ended fiscal year. That total was up from 62 the previous year, showing the gang's resilience to federal efforts aimed at rooting it out and its determination to travel almost at will through Texas to cliques operating throughout the U.S. … And, some police agencies believe, there is evidence that MS-13 has taken sides in the bloody war among drug cartels that's playing out in Nuevo Laredo. … Officials estimate there are up to 10,000 hard-core members of the gang operating in 33 states, the largest clusters living in Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., and the Mid-Atlantic region. But Texas is one of the fastest-growing states for MS-13, simply by virtue of geography."

Mendendez Attorney's Query To Federal Prosecutors Sparks Kean Salvo. The Newark Star-Ledger (NJ) (10/29, Howlett) reports, "Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. yesterday questioned why Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez would enlist the services of one the state's top defense lawyers if he isn't under a federal criminal investigation." The Star-Ledger continues, "Menendez has said the lawyer, Joseph Hayden, contacted the U.S. attorney around the time a subpoena was issued for records from a federally funded nonprofit agency that paid more than $300,000 to rent a row house that Menendez owned in Union City." The Star-Ledger adds, "Hayden was doing a 'favor' for the campaign, Menendez spokesman Matt Miller said, not personally representing Menendez. Miller declined to say who in the campaign reached out to Hayden and asked him to make the call, except to say it was not Menendez. … 'We were trying to find out what was going on,' Miller said of tapping Hayden. 'We were just looking to find out in the midst of all these rumors what the facts were.' … Miller declined to say what the campaign gleaned from Hayden's conversation with federal authorities. 'I'm just not going to go there,' he said." The Star-Ledger notes, "Such a scenario makes no sense, Kean said during a press conference in Mountainside yesterday. … 'Every criminal defense attorney knows that you don't reach out to the U.S. Attorney's Office during a pending criminal investigation unless you are representing a subject, target or witness,' he said."

Raymond Discusses New Hampshire GOP Phone-Jamming Operation. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 6, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "As the election draws near, it turns into the season when dirty tricks can come into play. Neither Republicans nor Democrats can claim the high ground. What is rare is hearing from someone that got caught." NBC (Myers) talked to Allen Raymond, for years a "prominent Republican operative with a reputation for bare-knuckle tactics. … Raymond admits four years ago he went beyond pushing the envelope and crossed the line. He spent three months in prison. Now in a civil suit Democrats are trying to tie his misdeeds to the White House. It happened during a hard-fought battle for the Senate in New Hampshire. Raymond was running a telemarketing firm. He says an old friend from the Republican National Committee came to him with an idea: Use nonstop hang-up calls to tie up Democratic phone lines on Election Day." Raymond: "We were trying to stop them from operating efficiently." NBC (Myers): "On Election Day the plan worked until nervous state Republicans pulled the plug. The Republican candidate won, though there is no evidence that phone jamming made the difference. How common are dirty tricks in Republican and Democratic politics?" Raymond: "Fairly common. Let's be clear on something: The New Hampshire phone jamming was not a dirty trick, it was criminal." NBC (Myers): "He pleaded guilty to conspire to make harassing phone calls," and the RNC "spent an estimated $3 million to defend its high-ranking operative. Others charged, including Raymond, did not get the RNC's support. They think because they paid $3 million to defend this guy they have something to hide." Raymond: "That is a fair assumption to make. They need to answer for that." NBC (Myers): "The RNC and the White House deny authorizing the operation. Raymond is now shunned by his party and, as a felon, unable to vote."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New York Officials Pleased By Fire Department Recruiting Efforts. The New York Post (10/29, Gallahue) reports, "The FDNY's million-dollar diversity drive is starting to pay off as the department heads into its final week of recruiting." The Post continues, "Forced to extend its deadline due to lagging numbers, the FDNY's aggressive campaign to bring minorities into the department has managed to boost its pool of applicants by thousands, the Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta announced yesterday. … 'The results are impressive,' he said. 'We have over 20,000 applicants [who] filed [to take the test] as of yesterday, and 35 percent of those applications are from minorities - and we still have a week to go.' … Applicants have until Nov. 3 to sign up for the test, which is given every four years." The Post notes, "Last year, the city and the FDNY put more than $3 million into the department's Recruitment and Diversity Unit as the Justice Department probed the department for allegedly discriminatory hiring practices. More than 90 percent of the 11,000-member force is white."

The New York Daily News (10/29, Brosh, Singleton) reports, "In May, with the department's hiring practices under investigation by the Justice Department, the FDNY launched a multimillion-dollar ad campaign to lure more minority-group firefighters. In August, it relaxed its hiring requirements - the latest move in an uphill effort to increase the diversity of a department that is 91% white."

Lowell, MA, Seeks Ballot Help In Immigrant Areas. The Boston Globe (10/29, Reid) reports, "In the past in Lowell (MA), voter registration efforts in the city's immigrant communities have fallen short and advocacy groups have charged that voters who speak languages other than English have faced problems at the polls. … During this year's election campaigns, the city and a number of groups have worked to deal with both situations." The Globe continues, "Volunteers from ONE Lowell, an immigrant advocacy group, have spent the past several weeks canvassing neighborhoods throughout the city to register new voters. Translators and bilingual poll workers have been recruited and trained for duty at voting precincts in neighborhoods with the highest population of non-English-speaking residents. Ballot instructions and voting information have been printed in Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese for distribution on Election Day, Nov. 7." The Globe adds, "Gail Cenik, a manager with the city's Election Commission, said her office has concentrated on education to familiarize people with the voting process. … Cenik's comments reflect efforts by the city to correct many of the problems that have plagued the last two elections in Lowell. In March, the US Department of Justice began an investigation into alleged voting rights violations faced by Cambodian-Americans who tried to vote in elections held last November. … The federal investigation was prompted by complaints from the New York-based Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. The advocacy group surveyed the city's polling places in that election and found several problems, including statements that several voters were directed to the wrong polling places and one instance in which a voter's name was misspelled on the voting roll." The Globe notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed the ongoing investigation and declined to provide further details."

Panel Investigating Voting System Firm's Takeover By Venezuelan Company. The New York Times (10/29, Golden, 1.21M) reports on its front page that the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States is investigating the takeover of Sequoia Voting Systems, a "leading American manufacturer of electronic voting systems," by Smartmatic, a "small software company that has been linked to the leftist Venezuelan government of President Hugo Chávez. The inquiry is focusing on the Venezuelan owners" of Smartmatic and is "trying to determine whether the government in Caracas has any control or influence over the firm's operations, government officials and others familiar with the investigation said."

Will Says HAVA Could Muck Up Tallying Of Votes. In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, George Will writes, "The hoariest jest in conservatism's repertoire is that the three least credible assertions in the English language are 'The check is in the mail,' 'Of course I'll respect you as much in the morning' and 'I'm from the government, and I'm here to help you.' Which brings us to the exquisitely named Help America Vote Act. Having fixed Iraq and New Orleans, the federal government's healing touch is now being applied to voting. As a result, days -- perhaps weeks -- might pass after Election Day without the nation's knowing which party controls the House or Senate. If that happens, one reason might be HAVA, that 2002 bit of federal helpfulness. … Democracy is not a mere game. But -- write this on a piece of paper, using a No. 2 pencil -- neither is it an activity from which it is sensible to demand more precision than can reasonably be expected when, on a November Tuesday, 100 million people record billions of political choices."

US Catholic Bishops Release Guidelines On Ministering To Gays. The New York Times (10/29, A18, Goodstein, 1.21M) reports that American Roman Catholic bishops "have drafted new guidelines for ministry to gay people that affirm church teaching against same-sex relationships, marriages and adoptions by gay couples, yet encourage parishes to reach out to gay Catholics who feel alienated by their church." The guidelines "recommend baptizing the adopted children of same-sex couples, as long as the children will be raised as Catholics. It says that gay people may benefit from revealing their 'tendencies' to friends, family and their priest, but should not make 'general public announcements' about it in the parish." The Washington Post (10/29, A9, 748K) reports, "An early draft of the guidelines welcomes celibate gay men and lesbians to take part in parish life while asserting the church's 'right to deny roles of service to those whose behavior violates her teaching.'"

Same-Sex Marriage Debate Mimics Earlier Arguments Over Interracial Marriage. The New York Times (10/29, Liptak, 1.21M) reports, "People on both sides of the same-sex marriage issue say there are important lessons from the earlier debate over laws banning interracial marriages." Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, "said the contrast between the political landscape when the Supreme Court acted in 1967 and that facing proponents of gay marriage today is stark and telling. 'When the court moved to strike down the interracial marriage laws,' Ms. Gallagher said, 'the democratic process was in the process of getting rid of these laws. What's happening now is exactly the opposite: more and more states are moving to protect marriage.'"

Media Ownership Rules Under Scrutiny. The New York Times (10/29, Siklos) reports, "It is hard to find any public policy question that feels less relevant by the minute than whether one person or company should be permitted to own television stations and newspapers in the same market." The Times continues, "Rules barring cross-ownership went into effect in 1975 but were overturned by the Federal Communications Commission three years ago. But, soon after, an appellate court effectively sent the decision back for another go-round, which is under way. This month in Los Angeles, the commission held a public hearing, the first of a series around the country, to look at newspaper-TV cross-ownership but also to examine other, more pertinent questions — for instance, how many radio or television stations a single owner can have in a single market." The Times adds, "A Supreme Court ruling from 1945 may best sum up why the F.C.C. scrutinizes such affairs: to ensure 'the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources.' It's too bad we can't skip months of table-thumping hearings over thousands of pages of studies and filings and just acknowledge that the media landscape is changing quickly. … The reality is that even if media companies could own more TV stations and newspapers in the same city, they might not think that it's such a brilliant idea any more. As the F.C.C.'s chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said recently: 'We need to develop a rule for cross-ownership that reflects current market characteristics, including the struggling nature of today's newspaper industry.'" The Times notes, "The Tribune Company is Exhibit A, of course. Its past success with a triple play of television, newspaper and radio in its hometown of Chicago has not translated into financial brilliance in New York and Los Angeles, where it owns Newsday and The Los Angeles Times, as well as the television stations WPIX and KTLA. Under pressure from its biggest shareholder and a slumping share price, the company has said it is exploring all options, including selling part or all of itself. … In addition to Chicago, there are markets like Atlanta, where the privately held Cox Enterprises owns The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, television, cable and much else. In these places, cross-ownership appears to have served its corporate orchestrators well."

ENVIRONMENT:

Atmospheric Research Center's Management Agreement Up For Bid. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Riccardi, 918K) reports management of the National Center for Atmospheric Research "is up for grabs. Since 1997, National Science Foundation policy has required that all government research institutions be subject to a competitive bidding process when their contracts come up for renewal. Foundation officials say that a formal request for bids is imminent and that the competition will be open to all organizations -- academic, nonprofit and for-profit."

Southern California Wildfire Continues To Blaze. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 4, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that in southern California, "a major wildfire is burning out of control. The fire is still threatening homes. It is happening about 80 miles east of Los Angeles."

US Seeks Arsonist In California Wildfires. The New York Times/AP (10/29, Press) reports, "Calmer winds on Saturday helped crews fighting a huge wildfire that killed four firefighters and critically injured a fifth, while investigators searched for the arsonist who set the blaze roaring through the canyons of Southern California. … Now in its third day, the fire that broke out in uninhabited brushland about 90 miles east of Los Angeles has blackened 39,900 acres, or more than 62 square miles, the authorities said. The fire was 40 percent contained, they added." The AP continues, "A reward for information leading to the arsonist rose to $500,000 on Friday, as $100,000 posted by Riverside County multiplied with matching offers from the state; neighboring San Bernardino County; a Rancho Mirage resident, Tim

Blixseth; and the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, which has a casino in nearby Cabazon. … Forecasters predicted winds would ease and temperatures would drop slightly throughout the weekend, which could help as crews work in steep terrain to build fire lines around the blaze." The AP notes, "Investigators were looking into whether the wildfire was related to other blazes in recent months, including a canyon fire last weekend, though a sheriff's spokesman said there was no immediate indication of a serial arsonist. .. .Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire broke out west of the San Jacinto Mountains."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Meth Labs Curbed Under New Rules. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (10/29, Jarvis, Svokos) reports, "Several times a day, pharmacists throughout North Texas get blasted by sniffling, sneezing allergy and sinus sufferers who hate what they have to go through to get their Sudafed." The Star-Telegram continues, "First, consumers must show a photo ID, and then they must sign their name while someone on the other side of the counter fills in a log. It can take five minutes or more to get any medication that contains pseudoephedrine, the popular decongestant that criminals have used to make methamphetamine. … 'It makes me very, very aggravated and irritated,' said Mandi Elias of Arlington, who shopped recently at the south Arlington SuperTarget. 'It's just so frustrating because I'm used to picking it up at the counter and going.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "Such retail inconvenience is succeeding, however, in making it tough for would-be meth cooks to buy enough decongestant to produce the highly addictive substance that sheriffs nationwide identify as the country's No. 1 drug problem. … New laws limiting how much pseudoephedrine consumers can buy at a time have slashed the numbers of clandestine meth labs, which have blown up in rural areas and residential neighborhoods, law enforcement experts say. … But just as quickly, Mexican drug cartels have stepped in to fill the void. Mexican manufacturers now buy large quantities of decongestant tablets from China, Panama and India to make 'ice,' what some experts say is a purer, more potent form of the drug." The Star-Telegram notes, "The federal Combat Meth Act took effect just last month. Signed by President Bush in March, the law limits pseudoephedrine sales to 3.6 grams per day and 9 grams every 30 days. … It also requires purchasers to provide identification and sign a logbook. Sellers must keep the products behind the counter or under lock and key and must register online with the U.S. Attorney General. .. .Texans have had more than a year to get used to a similar state law."

Marshals Lead Pittsburgh Sweep Of Sex Offenders. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/29, Ove) reports, "Squads of federal marshals and police rounded up hundreds of sexual predators and gang members in the eastern half of the United States as part of a nationwide manhunt that included 26 arrests in the city of Pittsburgh on Wednesday." The Post-Gazette continues, "Deferring to the U.S. Justice Department, Pittsburgh police said they couldn't discuss the charges or provide any details. … But some of those caught here were sex offenders; others were fugitives with warrants for a variety of other felonies." The Post-Gazette adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez will announce the national results on Thursday in Washington, D.C., and locally U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan plans a news conference to detail the arrests in the 25-county Western Pennsylvania district. … The roundup is the second part of a national effort to hunt down sex offenders. The first phase was in April, when the marshals arrested 1,102 fugitives on various sex offense charges in 27 states west of the Mississippi River. … A similar operation last year, which targeted mostly violent repeat offenders, netted 10,340 fugitives across the United States, the largest fugitive apprehension in history. In this region, more than 100 were captured. … This time the marshals and local police concentrated heavily on Megan's Law violators and other sexual predators, including those who have failed to register as sex offenders or are not living at the addresses where their Megan's Law form says they should be."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Activists Claim CIS Erecting Barriers To Citizenship. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Watanabe, 918K) reports, "Immigrant advocacy groups are decrying an array of proposed federal measures, including application fee increases and online filing requirements, that they fear will sharply reduce the ability of some legal immigrants to become U.S. citizens. As President Bush signed a controversial bill last week authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant rights groups charge that the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services is erecting a virtual 'second wall' that would disproportionately hurt Mexican immigrants, who tend to be less educated and earn lower incomes than others. Last week, a coalition of more than 230 religious, labor and immigrant rights groups delivered a letter to citizenship bureau Director Emilio Gonzalez, expressing strong concern about application fee increases that could double to $800, a 'digital barrier' of a mandatory online filing system, extensive new paperwork and a revised history and civics test they fear could be more difficult." Some fear the Bush Administration

"is seeking to tighten access to citizenship to bar potential new Democratic voters. But US immigration officials flatly deny any partisan motives."

TAX:

NYTimes Blames Bush For Failing To Rework AMT. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "One of President Bush's be-very-afraid lines this campaign season is that Democrats, if elected, will raise taxes. What he doesn't say is that if you are one of tens of millions of Americans who make between $75,000 and $500,000 a year, your taxes are already scheduled to rise starting next year — because of laws that Mr. Bush championed and other actions he failed to take. The higher taxes stem from the alternative minimum tax. … Mr. Bush set the trap in 2001 — and in 2003, 2004 and 2006. In each of those years, he flogged for new tax cuts without requiring corresponding long-term changes in the existing rules for the alternative tax. It was well known that failure to update the alternative tax would create perverse interactions with the new tax cuts, causing filers' tax bills to drop because of the cuts, only to shoot back up again from the alternative levy."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow Said To Have Succeeded In Changing Tone Of White House Briefings. In a 5,000 word profile of White House Press Secretary Tony Snow for the New York Times Magazine (10/29), Rolling Stone's Ben Wallace-Wells writes, "For the most part, Snow's two predecessors in the Bush White House tended to look as if they regarded the twice-daily meetings with the press as painful procedures. Still, these are anxious days for the White House, with the president's approval ratings stuck below 40 percent — the sort of number that has a way of emboldening the reporters and making the atmosphere in the press room particularly aggressive. So the Bush White House has turned to Snow…in the hope that he can change the tone and project a confident, prime-time sort of calm. Gone already is the firing squad of the Scott McClellan days, and there is little echo of the testy, you-don't-need-to-know authority of President Bush's first press secretary, Ari Fleischer. Snow's style is basically cheery: Gee, isn't it fun to run the world?"

GAO's Walker Warns Mounting Debt And Entitlements Will Prove Disastrous. The AP (10/28, Crenson) says the GAO's David Walker "sure talks like he's running for office. 'This is about The future of our country, our kids and grandkids,' the comptroller general of the United States warns a packed hall at Austin's historic Driskill Hotel. 'We the people have to rise up to make sure things get changed.' … The accountant-in-chief's professional opinion is that the American public needs to tell Washington it's time to steer the nation off the path to financial ruin." According to the AP, "The vast majority of economists and budget analysts agree: The ship of state is on a disastrous course, and will founder on the reefs of economic disaster if nothing is done to correct it."

Prospects For McConnell-Reid Senate Previewed. The Washington Post (10/29, A4, Babington, 748K) writes that whether Republican Mitch McConnell or Democrat Harry Reid "prevails as the Senate's next majority leader, one thing seems certain: Either one will show more interest in the institution's often obscure traditions" than exiting Majority Leader Bill Frist. But what that means as a practical matter "is less certain. Some congressional scholars say it could mean greater bipartisan accord because McConnell and Reid are consummate deal-makers whose top priority is legislative achievement, whereas Frist's presidential ambitions have shadowed his comments and deeds as majority leader. But both men are also dogged by questions about financial dealings that could provide ammunition for opponents in the next Congress, which is virtually sure to be narrowly divided."

Thune's Role In Providing $2.3 Billion In Loan Guarantees To Railroad Scrutinized. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Havemann, 918K) reports that when Sen. John Thune "narrowly lost a bid for the Senate in 2002, his career followed a familiar pattern: He became a Washington lobbyist. He soon gained as a client a little-known Midwestern railroad. The Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad Corp. may have been small, but its ambitions were not. It was seeking more than $2 billion in federal loan guarantees to help finance a major renovation of its entire rail network and an expansion into the coal fields of Wyoming's Powder River Basin." According to the Times, now that Thune "helped attach a provision to last year's huge transportation bill, prospects for DM&E's $2.3 billion in loan guarantees are looking brighter. The federal government now is in a position to approve one of the largest loan guarantees in its history." The transportation bill "did not mention DM&E, but by raising the government's loan guarantee authority tenfold, to $35 billion, it made the railroad's request more likely to succeed. Whatever the outcome of the DM&E aid request, the fact that a lawmaker who is a former lobbyist helped it along speaks volumes about how business sometimes gets done in Washington."

Many NIH Research Scientists Consider Leaving Over New Ethics Guidelines. The AP (10/28, Beamish) reports, "Nearly 40% of the scientists conducting hands-on research at the National Institutes of Health say they are looking for other jobs or are considering doing so to escape new ethics rules that have curtailed their opportunity to earn outside income. Most scientists say the ethics crackdown is too severe, and nearly three-quarters of them believe it will hinder the government's ability to attract and keep medical researchers, according to a survey commissioned by the government's premier medical research agency."

NASA Seen As Likely To Approve Hubble Repair Mission. The Washington Post (10/29, A3, Kaufman, 748K) reports that on Tuesday NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will announce whether the Hubble telescope "will be repaired or will be allowed to gradually run out of steam. NASA said Friday that a series of events and briefings will follow the announcement at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt -- the kind of activity that often accompanies a decision to go ahead with a big mission. But agency officials said that no decision had been reached and that Griffin will study the pros and cons over the weekend."

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Not Winning Midterm Support For Republicans. CNN (10/28, Holmes) reported, "As Republicans fight to keep control of the House and Senate, President Bush touts economic growth as a key reason Americans should support the GOP. But this year, many voters appear to be tuning out that message." CNN (Schneider) continued, "For over 30 years, polls for CNN and 'Time' magazine have been asking people, 'How well are things going in the country today?' In economic bad times, no more than 40% say things are going well. … In good times, 60% or more say things are going well. … What happens when the number who say things are going well falls in the middle? Then you don't get a pocketbook election. The election is about something else. … So where are we in 2006? According to a CNN poll by the Opinion Research Corporation, about half the country says things are going well, while half say things are going badly. Here's the good news. The stock market has reached record highs. Gas prices have dropped. Now here's the bad news. Wages are stagnant. Home values are dropping. Manufacturing jobs are fleeing overseas. The punch line? For most voters, 2006 is not a pocketbook election. It's about something else. More than anything else, war."

In a Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) op-ed, Yale University's Jacob Hacker writes, "In the final days of this fall's campaign, Republicans have turned to an unexpected issue: the economy. President Bush touted the nation's prosperity last week, insisting that 'a strong economy is going to help our candidates.' And why not? The Dow is soaring. Unemployment is low. Inflation is tame. Gas prices are falling. And the overall economy has been growing steadily. … There's just one problem: Despite the sunny talk and favorable numbers, voters aren't happy with the economy. Though they've become somewhat more positive in recent weeks, they remain strikingly dissatisfied -- and favor Democrats by wide margins on economic issues." With voters feeling that "their jobs, health care, pensions and family finances" may be at risk, Republican "bragging about the economy may appear not as saviors, but as out of touch."

Economy Dragging On Republicans In Midwest. NBC Nightly News (10/28, story 5, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) ran a feature on voters in Ohio, where "it is the economy hurting Republicans who are locked in tight races across the state. The unemployment average is a full point higher than the national average, and according to polls two-thirds of Ohioians think the economy is bad and getting worse. … All of the good economic news the President has talked about during the campaign surging stock market, falling gas prices and low unemployment is not being felt throughout the industrial Midwest."

Armey Says Republicans "Have No One To Blame But Ourselves." In a Washington Post (10/29, B1, 748K) op-ed, former House Majority Leader Dick Armey writes, "Somewhere along the road to a 'permanent majority,' the Republican Revolution of 1994 went off track. For several years, we had confidence in our convictions and trusted that the American people would reward our efforts. And they did. But today, my Republican friends in Congress stand on the precipice of an electoral rout." Republican lawmakers "forgot the party's principles, became enamored with power and position, and began putting politics over policy. Now, the Democrats are reaping the rewards of our neglect -- and we have no one to blame but ourselves."

Kinsley Says "New Yellow Dogs" Putting Party Above Candidates' Merits. In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, Michael Kinsley writes, "In a remarkable editorial on Wednesday, the New York Times endorsed Diane Farrell for Congress from a district in Connecticut. Who is Diane Farrell? I have no idea, and the Times seemed to have not a lot." Rep. Christopher Shays "has held the seat for almost 20 years and been endorsed by the Times 'in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent' -- until now." The Times decided to "'strongly endorse' Shays's opponent, entirely because she's a Democrat. Or rather, because she is not a Republican: 'Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup.' … People just love to say, 'I evaluate each candidate on his or her own merits' -- even when it's not true. But this year does seem to be different. … These New Yellow Dogs are voting for the Democrat, simply out of anger at or frustration with the Republican Party."

WPost Says Democrats Will Need To Offer Better Proposals If They Take Control. Under the headline "What Democrats Would Do," the Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K) editorializes that the party's "agenda is a hodgepodge of good ideas, bad ideas and no ideas." It is "heavy on ideas -- raising the minimum wage, letting the government negotiate Medicare drug prices -- that may have more popular appeal than real-world impact. … Other proposals sound good but are bad policy. Screening 100 percent of cargo containers at the point of origin would be expensive, time-consuming and impractical. The vow to 'prevent outsourcing of critical components of our national security infrastructure -- such as ports, airports and mass transit -- to foreign interests that put America at risk' is more Dubai ports demagoguery." Democrats "will need to do better than what they've proposed in 2006 if they are given the chance to govern in 2007."

Chait Says Democrats "Actually Have An Agenda." In his Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) column, Jonathan Chait writes that Democrats "actually have an agenda. Republicans aren't saying why the Democratic agenda is wrong, or why their own is better. They're just ignoring it. If you're like most people, you probably have no idea what that agenda is. Let me list it: Put new rules in place to break the link between lobbyists and legislation. Enact all the recommendations made by the 9/11 commission. Raise the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. Cut the interest rate on federally supported student loans in half. Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients. Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds. Impose pay-as-you-go budget rules, requiring that new entitlement spending or tax cuts be offset with entitlement spending cuts or tax hikes. Republicans disagree with all these items."

LATimes Decries Racial "Suggestion" In Today's Campaign Ads. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) editorializes that while campaign ads "clearly pandering to prejudice" are "yesterday's style. Today's is all about suggestion." In Massachusetts, Kerry Healey (R), "in a contest for governor with black Democrat" Deval Patrick "is running a commercial that shows a nervous white woman being stalked. It ends with: 'Deval Patrick, he should be ashamed -- not governor,'" alluding to Patrick's "support for a rapist he believed was not guilty until a DNA test proved him wrong. … Then there is the appalling flier recently put out by Democrats attacking Georgia Gov. George Ervin 'Sonny' Perdue. It shows a photograph of a civil rights marcher being beaten to the ground by a white officer with the caption: 'Remember this? Their last attempt to stop us from voting.' Beneath is a photo of Perdue, the state's white governor, signing a voter identification bill into law, and the words: 'Their current attempt to stop us from voting. Don't let the Bush/Perdue Republican Mafia take away our vote!' Requiring an ID to vote is hardly the equivalent of racial disenfranchisement." The Times says the Republican ad targeting Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee is "the most masterful of the genre." The Times concludes, "These ads and commercials themselves may not be overtly racist, they just hope you are."

Bush Begins Cross-Country Campaign Swing In Indiana, South Carolina. NBC Nightly News (10/28, lead story, 3:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) was the only network to air a newscast last night, and it led by reporting that President Bush "hit the campaign trail today. The President stopped for congressional Republican candidates and took aim at Democrats, saying they don't have a plan to win in Iraq." NBC (Jordan): "Nine days until Election Day and this is the first time voters got a chance to see the President in person for free. He took the opportunity to urge support for Republican candidates and his policy in Iraq. President Bush came out swinging on the campaign trail, stopping for a Republican congressman in a tight reelection bid." Bush: I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success: There isn't one." NBC (Jordan): "In South Carolina at a rally with 5,000 US forces, President Bush said Iraq was central to winning the war on terror." Bush: "If the United States of America were to leave before the job is done, the enemy will follow us here."

Major national newspapers focus on the Indiana event, and report the crowd was energetic and enthusiastic. The Washington Post (10/29, A7, Abramowitz, 748K) reports Bush "plunged into retail politicking for the first time this campaign season" in a visit to Sellersburg, Indiana, in the district of IN9 Rep. Mike Sodrel (R), who faces a tough race against ex-Rep. Baron Hill (D). The Post says Bush told a "raucous crowd of several thousand Republican partisans on Saturday that the Democrats would raise taxes and retreat from Iraq" if they win congressional control. The crowd "interrupted the president repeatedly with loud applause and chants of 'USA! USA!'" as Bush cast the elections as a "decisive turning point in the affairs of the country. 'The outcome of this election will determine how much money you have in your pocket,' Bush shouted, his voice seeming to crack at points. 'The outcome of this election will determine whether this government does its most fundamental job, and that is to protect the American people.'" Bush said he "was going to 'sprint to the finish line,' and rallies are planned in the coming week in Georgia, Texas, Nevada and Montana."

The Washington Times (10/29, Curl, 88K) says the President "yelled himself hoarse in his first public political rally of the 2006 election campaign, whipping thousands of supporters into chants of 'USA!' as he criticized Democrats for being weak on national security and anxious to increase taxes." The Times says the "Republican stronghold" will be an "early harbinger of whether Republicans hold control" on Election Day. Indiana's polls, along with Kentucky's, will be the first to close on November 7.

The New York Times (10/29, A24, Rutenberg, 1.21M) runs its story under the headline "A Warm Welcome For Bush The Campaigner, In Indiana," saying the President addressed "wildly cheering supporters," telling them that "Democrats did not want to investigate, prosecute or even detain terrorists and had no plan for Iraq. And, introducing a relatively new line in his election-year stump speech, Mr. Bush criticized the 'activist' New Jersey Supreme Court's ruling" on same-sex partnerships.

The AP (10/28) says Bush is now "campaigning aggressively ahead of the high-stakes" elections, and told the Indiana crowd that Democrats "should not be trusted to control Congress because they have no idea how to win in Iraq. 'I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success. There isn't one,' Bush told thousands of energized Republicans packed into a high school gymnasium. 'They are in agreement on one thing -- they will leave before the job is done, and we will not let them.'"

CNN (10/28, Quijano) reported, "President Bush hit the campaign trail this morning, first stopping off in Indiana. … At his first public campaign rally this election season, President Bush tried to go on the offense, hitting Democrats on the issue analysts say is Republicans' biggest political liability: Iraq." President Bush: "And all the people listening here, I want you to think about the Democrat plan for success: There isn't one." Quijano: "With a little over a week to go until the congressional midterm elections, both the President and first lady Laura Bush tackled domestic politics Saturday, each campaigning in different states." First Lady Laura Bush: "And thanks for coming to support Congressman Tom Reynolds and Congressman Randy Kuhl, both to be re- elected to the United States Congress."

Bush Said To Be Sticking To "Friendly Country." The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Hennessy-Fiske, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports on the event under the headline "Bush Picks His Battles In Friendly Country," also noting the "raucous crowd," the "USA" shouts, and how they stomped their feet and shook "dozens of red, white and blue pompoms." But the rest of the report focuses on how Bush is "playing to his base of conservative Republicans in such strongholds as Sellersburg, Statesboro, Ga., and Sugar Land, Texas. With Republican control of Congress at risk, the president's visits and tone could determine the fate of a handful of close races. Besieged Republican candidates have distanced themselves from the president in recent debates, TV ads and closed fundraisers as his approval rating remained below 40% this month. It has become increasingly difficult for the party to take advantage of the office of the president, GOP strategists say. Democrats in Maryland, Missouri and Pennsylvania have launched ads that remind voters of their opponents' support for Bush."

President Highlights Stark Differences Between Parties. Also in the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), Ronald Brownstein writes that "Bush and Republicans in many of the nation's key races are presenting divergent, even contradictory, visions of how Washington should operate after next week's election. Around the country, GOP incumbents and challengers alike are running against the relentless partisan conflict that defined the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency and have colored virtually every day of Bush's." While "Republicans almost everywhere are presenting themselves as flexible and independent problem solvers who will reach across party lines to build consensus on difficult issues," Bush is "moving in the opposite direction. As he often does when he's under political pressure, he's accentuating the disagreements between the parties and presenting the differences in the starkest possible terms. He's displayed that instinct most clearly in the highly charged way he has framed the debate over Iraq and the war on terrorism."

The Boston Globe (10/29, Milligan, 425K) says the "increasing unpopularity of the Iraq war is making some voters tire of the defiant demeanor showcased by the majority party in recent years, analysts say -- a special problem for those whose political style most resembles President Bush."

Rove Giving "Virtuoso Performance" As Midterms Enter Endgame. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Hamburger, Wallsten, 918K) runs a generally positive front-page feature on Karl Rove, saying the "top strategist is in rare form for the midterm endgame." Focusing on a recent trip to bolster "endangered" Rep. Tom Reynolds, the Times says Rove "delivered a fiery speech to 500 party activists, then shook every available hand and posed for snapshots like a rock star. He toured suburbs recently trashed by a snowstorm. He also found time to huddle with local strategists. But the most significant element of Rove's effort…may have occurred behind closed doors, when the White House strategist met with a federal disaster relief official contemplating how to respond to the storm. Four days after the meeting, Reynolds announced that President Bush would authorize millions of dollars in federal disaster aid for the area." The Times says that while polls show Democrats "extending their leads in pivotal races across the country," the "man largely responsible for the Republicans' glory days -- and arguably still the most powerful political operative in the United States -- is far from discouraged." Instead, Rove "is giving a virtuoso performance designed to prevent the Democrats from taking control of the House and Senate or, if that is no longer possible, to hold down the size of the Democratic victory to make it easier for the GOP to come back in 2008."

Democrats Race To Catch Up With GOP's GOTV Advantages. The New York Times (10/29, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports on its front page that Democrats "are pushing into high gear this weekend a sharply expanded campaign to get their voters to the polls," confronting a facet of the endgame that traditionally favors Republicans. Party leaders "expressed anxiety" that Republicans would "again out-organize them in the approximately 20 House and 3 Senate races that both sides agree will determine the outcome of the midterm elections." While Democrats "have invested heavily in catching up" with the GOP's "sophisticated get-out-the-vote operation," DNC Chairman Howard Dean said the rival party "continued to have a clear superiority in identifying voters they can persuade to vote for their candidates and then getting them to cast ballots." Dean said, "I think we've closed the gap, but I don't think we are there yet. It's going to take some time. I think we could match them in 2008, if everything goes right, in voter turnout." But other Democratic leaders disputed Dean's view, saying they were "increasingly confident about their party's ability to achieve parity, and perhaps regain its dominance, against the Republican get-out-the-vote machinery."

NRSC's Forti, DCCC's Lapp Have Campaigns' Final Days In Their Hands. The Washington Post (10/29, Vandehei, Cillizza, 748K) runs a front-page feature on the NRSC's Carl Forti and the DCCC's John Lapp, who "run the independent expenditure arms of their parties' campaign committees, the place where many of the negative ads that voters are seeing are financed, produced and strategically placed on television stations across the country. In the final days of the campaign, they will easily outspend the candidates themselves in many of the most competitive House races. They will decide the final images that many voters see in this campaign. Warning for the fainthearted: Most of the ads will be dark and accusatory." Officials in both parties said "one bad call could make or break a House race," and there is "no precise formula for determining the smartest choices."

Broder Says Bush Still Sees Democrats Only As "Opponents." In his Washington Post (10/29, B7, 748K) column, David Broder says Bush is "not yet ready to think of Democrats except as opponents." Broder recalls that it was "the combination of a Democratic president, Bill Clinton, and the Republican Congress elected in 1994 that finally got a grip on budget deficits and produced the only balanced budgets of modern times," and expresses hopes that immigration, tax, and Social Security reform could all advance if there is again a power split.

WPost Poll Shows Democrats Leading Maryland Gubernatorial, Senate Races. On its front page, the Washington Post (10/29, Barnes, Mosk, 748K) reports a new Post poll indicates a "strong Democratic tide in Maryland threatens to swamp" Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) and hold the state's open US Senate seat. The poll of 1,003 registered voters who said they were "absolutely certain to vote" (+/- 3%), taken October 22-26, shows Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D) at 55% and Ehrlich at 45% in the gubernatorial race. In the Senate race, MD3 Rep. Ben Cardin (D) is at 54%, Lt. Gov Michael Steele (R) 43%, and third-party candidate Kevin Zeese 1%. The Republican campaigns "disputed the poll, saying it was too different from recent polls that they had seen that showed the races much closer." Ehrlich campaign manager Bo Harmon said, "It is simply unrealistic to think that a governor with approval ratings as high as this, who has provided record education funding and cut crime around the state is losing by 10 points to the mayor of the deadliest city in the country." And Steele spokesman Doug Heye said, "It is a dead heat, and Michael Steele is gaining ground every day."

Steele Crashes State NAACP Convention To Criticize Cardin. The Washington Times (10/29, Miller, 88K) reports Steele "made an unscheduled appearance at the NAACP state convention" in Baltimore Saturday, where he criticized Cardin "for paying only lip service to black voters." Steele said, "I'm tired of listening to leadership that fails to deliver." Cardin told the NAACP that "returning a Democrat to Maryland's Senate seat would help the party take control of the chamber and challenge President Bush's policies."

O'Malley Charges Ehrlich With Use Of "Coded" Racial Language. The Washington Post (10/29, C5, Wagner, 748K) reports O'Malley also addressed the NAACP gathering, where he accused Ehrlich "of using racially 'coded, charged language' when talking about Baltimore's schoolchildren" and accused Ehrlich of "pursuing policies unfriendly to African Americans." Ehrlich, "who entered the room after O'Malley had finished speaking, offered no direct response from the podium, instead listing the African Americans he has appointed to key positions and the programs he has supported. Afterward, he called the mayor 'uniformly negative.'"

Third-Party Senate Hopeful Zeese Profiled. The Washington Post (10/29, C6, Wan, 748K) profiles Zeese.

Webb Blasts "Unprincipled, Small-Minded, Power-Hungry" Allen. The Washington Post (10/29, C6, Craig, Shear, 748K) reports Virginia Senate candidate James Webb (D) "delivered his strongest criticism" of Sen.

DOJ_NMG_0087930

George Allen (R) "of the fall campaign, vigorously defending himself against Allen's charges that he wrote sex-laced passages in his fiction novels. He called on voters to reject what he called the 'smear tactics' of Allen and his campaign," particularly on the Allen camp's release of sexually explicit excerpts of Webb's novels." Webb said, "The fish rots from the head down. Our government should no longer be in the hands of a group of unprincipled, small-minded, power-hungry character assassins."

The Washington Times (10/29, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Webb said Allen "crossed the line when he used salacious excerpts from his wartime novels to question his character and respect for women." Speaking in Annandale, Webb said, "I've lived in the real world, and I reported the real world in my writings. … I have written what I have seen, and that is the duty of a writer -- to help people understand the world around us with all of its beauty and all of its flaws." The Allen campaign's decision to highlight Webb's novels "angered Democrats and disappointed at least one Republican. 'It's so dirty,' Michelle Malkin, a conservative columnist, said on Fox News. 'It looks desperate. It looks pathetic, and it looks so immature. … This is fiction.'"

NYTimes Endorses Lamont In Connecticut Senate Race. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) endorses businessman Ned Lamont (D) in the Connecticut Senate race, saying that the "fatal problem" with incumbent Sen. Joseph Lieberman "is not that he was wrong about the invasion" of Iraq, "but that he has not shown any capacity to grow and change." Lieberman "has changed his tone but not his underlying conviction that he has been right all along." He and President Bush "are still on the very same page, encouraging the American people to believe that there is a happy ending for American involvement in Iraq, and that all it takes is the perseverance to keep marching toward the end of the rainbow." Lamont "has run a far less polished campaign than Mr. Lieberman, but the more we see of him, the more impressed we are by his intelligence and his growing sophistication about the issues facing the nation. He is very much in the Connecticut mold of basically moderate, principled politicians, and his willingness to take on Mr. Lieberman when no one else dared to do it showed real courage and conviction. He would make a good senator. More important, he has the capacity to continually become a better one."

Campaign Is Most Expensive In Connecticut History. The New York Times (10/29, A30, Medina, 1.21M) writes that while Lieberman "may have lost the Democratic primary to a novice politician, his bid in the general election has come with all the financial advantages of a major party candidate and an 18-year incumbent." Lieberman's "financial prowess" has prompted Lamont "to dig deeper into his pockets, putting $12.7 million into the campaign so far." The race "has quickly become the most expensive in the state's history, with Mr. Lieberman spending $11.5 million and Mr. Lamont spending $8.6 million through the end of September. And there is no sign of slowing down."

Bloomberg Plays Big Role In Lieberman Reelection Effort. The AP (10/28) writes that if Lieberman wins, "it's a safe bet New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will be high on his thank-you list. Bloomberg, a Republican who shares Lieberman's independent streak, is playing a prominent role helping to raise money" for Lieberman, and "has also dispatched several campaign operatives to Connecticut to help Lieberman reach GOP and independent voters as the race closes."

Kean Has Two-Point Lead In Rasmussen New Jersey Senate Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely New Jersey voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 25, finds state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) at 43% and US Sen. Bob Menendez (D) at 41%.

Bayonne Development Role Shows Two Sides Of Menendez. The New York Times (10/29, Kocieniewski, Rivera, 1.21M) runs a front-page report on the role of Menendez in the construction of a new waterfront development in Bayonne, New Jersey. While Menendez "is not directly involved" in the project, "his influence can be seen throughout it." The project "is being built with the help of nearly $30 million in federal funds that Mr. Menendez secured using his trademark policy expertise and aggressive politicking." It will contain "movie studios and shops, marinas and waterfront parks, and 6,600 homes." But the project "has also produced considerable work for some of his chief political supporters." The project "displays the two contrasting images of Mr. Menendez -- one a fiery advocate who brings home federal aid for his constituents, the other a political empire builder who detractors say pushes too much largess toward his friends."

Corker, Ford Meet In Final Televised Tennessee Senate Debate. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (10/29, Locker, 172K) reports TN9 Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) "drove home his message for change" while Bob Corker (R) "emphasized his 'Tennessee life' and values in Saturday night's final televised debate" of the Tennessee Senate campaign. Neither candidate "unveiled new themes in their meeting at Vanderbilt University. And some attacks that dominated the previous two debates in Memphis and Chattanooga were absent. But the negative TV attack ads of the past three weeks surfaced at the end of the face-off." Ford said, "I was a little surprised to see the smut and the slime coming into my living room during family time." Corker said he "didn't like the ads and that he asked his national party to remove them. He asked Ford to join him in calling for all ads not put up directly by the two candidates' campaigns to cease. But he said after the debate that the national Democratic Party is spending $2.7 million on ads compared to $813,000 by the national GOP over the last two weeks."

Brooks Says Senate Would Miss Santorum's Antipoverty Efforts. In his New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) column, David Brooks writes, "Every poll suggests that Rick Santorum will lose his race to return to the U.S. Senate. That's probably good news in Pennsylvania's bobo suburbs, where folks regard Santorum as an ideological misfit and a social blight. But it's certainly bad for poor people around the world. For there has been at least one constant in Washington over the past 12 years: almost every time a serious piece of antipoverty legislation surfaces in Congress, Rick Santorum is there playing a leadership role. … The bottom line is this: If serious antipoverty work is going to be done, it's going to emerge from a coalition of liberals and religious conservatives. Without Santorum, that's less likely to happen."

GOP Hopes Of Pickup Fading In TX17. Under the headline "GOP Hopes Fade For Taking District Bush Calls Home," the Washington Times (10/29, Aynesworth, 88K) reports that while Texas Republicans "spent much of this year thinking they had a good chance to defeat" TX17 Rep. Chet Edwards (D). But now, Republican Van Taylor's campaign, "though well-funded, seems bogged down."

Democrats Could Gain Up To Eight GOP-Held Governor's Offices. The Washington Times (10/29, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Democrats "are quietly poised to win a majority of the nation's gubernatorial offices" on November 7. The "latest polls" show Democrats could pick up currently Republican-held governorships "in eight states: Alaska, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Nevada and Ohio." DGA Communications Director Bernie Campbell said, "It's a volatile climate out there. A combination of things is working in our favor -- voter confidence in Democrats and building on the past accomplishments of our current governors."

Recently Unknown Palin Poised To Win Alaska Gubernatorial Race. The New York Times (10/29, A25, Yardley, 1.21M) profiles ex-Wasilla, Alaska, mayor Sarah Palin, who, until she "trounced Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican primary," was "hardly known" outside Wasilla. But now she has a "sizable lead in most polls" over ex-Gov. Tony Knowles (D). Palin "stands out in a state that has seen few fresh faces in politics. She is untainted by government scandal and unburdened by political debt. She is a conservative Christian who opposes abortion." She is "portraying herself as a needed outside agent of change" at a time when the FBI "is investigating links between Republican leaders in the Legislature and a major player in the oil industry."

Crist Leads Davis By Six Points In Florida Gubernatorial Poll. The St. Petersburg Times (10/28, Smith) reports Florida gubernatorial a poll of 800 voters (+/- 3.5%) for the newspaper by Schroth/Eldon and the Polling Company, taken October 22-25, shows state Attorney General Charlie Crist (R) at 48% and FL11 Rep. Jim Davis (D) at 42%.

Beebe Has Eight-Point Lead In Arkansas Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely Arkansas voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 22, finds state Attorney General Mike Beebe (D) at 49% and Asa Hutchinson (R) at 41%.

Ritter Leads By 12 Points In Colorado Gubernatorial Poll. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 500 likely Colorado voters (+/- 4.5%), taken October 22, finds Denver District Attorney Bill Ritter (D) at 51% and CO7 Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) at 39%.

Gibbons Willing To Take Polygraph Over Assault Allegation. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) reports NV2 Rep. Jim Gibbons (R), running for governor, "said he'd be willing to take a polygraph to prove he did not assault" Las Vegas cocktail waitress Chrissy Mazzeo. Mazzeo "has said Gibbons pushed her up against a wall at a Las Vegas restaurant Oct. 13 and made a sexual advance while he and a prominent GOP operative were walking her to her truck." Gibbons says she "tripped and he caught her, then walked away."

Female Candidates Well-Positioned In Races In Western States. The New York Times Magazine (10/29, Starr) runs a feature on women seeking office in Western states. In WA8, Darcy Burner (D) "appears to have a good shot," and in AZ8, Gabrielle Giffords (D) "is favored to win." Nevada Democratic gubernatorial nominee Dina Titus is "headlining an almost all-female ticket," and NM1, where Rep. Heather Wilson (R) faces state Attorney General Patricia Madrid (D), "will send a woman to Congress no matter which party prevails." The West is said to be "well poised to retain its status as an incubator of female leadership."

More Than One-Third Now Seek Political Information Online. The AP (10/29, Lester) reports, "Increasing numbers of people looking for political news are going online -- with more than a third now saying they check the Internet for such information." An AP-AOL News poll found they are "more likely to be younger, better educated and male than the population in general." While 35% "say they go to the Internet for political updates about campaigns and candidates, that number grows to 43 percent of likely voters -- and they tend to be more liberal than conservative."

Bush's Use Of "Internets" And "The Google" Examined. CNN (10/28, Nguyen) reported, "President Bush is a 21st century president, right? We know that, but like many of his fellow Baby Boomers, he still appears to have a 20th century vocabulary." CNN (Moos) continued, "He can handle a power saw, but when it comes to the power of the Internet…" President Bush: "I hear there's rumors on the Internets." Moos: "Not once, but at least twice, President Bush has inexplicably added an 's.' … And now the leader dubbed 'Googler-in-Chief' by the 'Wall Street Journal' has struck again. During a CNBC interview, the President was asked if he ever Googles." Bush: "Occasionally. One of the things I've used on the Google is I can pull up maps." Moos: "'The Google?' It may be petty, but 'the Google' had techno geeks agog. I wonder on which one of the Internets he uses the Google on."

WPost Supports Review Of Virginia's Mental Health Laws. The Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K), in an editorial, writes, "Increasing numbers of mentally ill people in Virginia end up on the streets, in court or in jail, instead of in treatment, where they belong. Chief Justice Leroy R. Hassell Sr. of the Virginia Supreme Court has launched a commission to revamp state mental health laws, including the state's outmoded criteria for civil commitment, which provide emergency treatment only when people are an 'imminent danger' to themselves or others. … At a recent hearing, however, Sen. Kenneth W. Stolle (R-Virginia Beach) warned the court not to overstep its role by getting involved in policy." The Post contends, "Justice Hassell should be applauded instead of criticized."

Nuclear-Armed Iran Seen As Grave Danger To US, Israel, Sunnis. In an 8,000-word article for the New York Times Magazine (10/29) titled, "Islam, Terror And The Second Nuclear Age," Noah Feldman, a law professor at New York University and adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, writes, "A nuclear Iran means, at the very least, a realignment of power dynamics in the Persian Gulf. It could potentially mean much more: a historic shift in the position of the long-subordinated Shiite minority relative to the power and prestige of the Sunni majority, which traditionally dominated the Muslim world. Many Arab Sunnis fear that the moment is ripe for a Shiite rise." Near the end of the article Feldman concludes the US "has strong reason to block its enemy Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons…because the Islamic Republic of Iran as currently constituted is definitionally anti-American. There need not be a direct threat of Iranian first use against either the United States or Israel for this reason to weigh heavily. A nuclear Iran will be a stronger and more effective enemy in pursuing anti-American policies under the banner of Islam. … If and when Iran does have the bomb, its enhanced power and prestige will certainly be lent to policies that it conceives as promoting the Islamic interest."

Journalist Warns Discussions Of Iran And Iraq Sound Similar. In the Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K), journalist Jon Sawyer comments about the "déjà vu" caused by current discussion of Iran as a threat: "Four weeks ago, Congress enacted and President Bush signed the Iran Freedom Support Act, a resolution very much in the spirit of the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act. ... But if the confrontation over Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program ends in war — initiated by this administration or the next — you can bet this law will be cited as proof that Congress was onboard all along. The congressional action isn't the only sign of déjà vu. Recent months have seen the creation of an 'Iran directorate' at the Pentagon, using some of the same personnel as the Office of Special Plans" that was "accused of massaging raw intelligence on Iraq to make the case for war look far more solid than in fact it was."

Russia Surpasses US In Arms Sales To Developing World. In a front page article, the New York Times (10/29, Shanker, 1.21M) reports that "an annual study by the Congressional Research Service that is considered the most thorough compilation of statistics available in an unclassified form" found that "Russia surpassed the United States in 2005 as the leader in weapons deals with the developing world, and its new agreements included selling $700 million in surface-to-air missiles to Iran and eight new aerial refueling tankers to China." Those "sales to improve Iran's air-defense system are particularly troubling to the United States because they would complicate the task of Pentagon planners should the president order airstrikes on Iran's nuclear weapons facilities." Also, those "extensive trade relations" have partly been behind Russian officials' "expressed reluctance to vote for the most stringent economic sanctions" on Tehran. Additionally, "Russia's weapons sales to China…worry Pentagon planners" as "Taiwan remains a potential flash point between Beijing and Washington."

Previously, the US "regularly dominated" the "highly competitive global arms bazaar in the developing world" since the fall of the USSR. However, the report finds "France ranked second in arms transfer agreements to developing nations, with $6.3 billion, and the United States was third, with $6.2 billion."

US Considers Deploying Patriot System Near Tokyo. The AP (10/29, Greimel) reports, "Washington unofficially informed the Japanese government it is considering putting Patriot Advanced Capability 3 surface-to-air interceptor missiles around Yokota Air Base in Tokyo's western suburbs and around Yokosuka Naval Base, south of the capital, the Nihon Keizai newspaper reported without saying how it got the information." The Pentagon has "already confirmed that the first batch of equipment for the PAC-3 missiles arrived in Okinawa in southern Japan, where the bulk of U.S. forces in the nation are stationed." The Los Angeles Times (10/29, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

Domestic Concerns Said To Shape US Foreign Aid. The New York Times (10/29, Dugger, 1.21M) reports on its front page, "Britain, Ireland and Norway have all sought to make aid more cost effective by opening contracts in their programs to fight global poverty to international competition. The United States, meanwhile, continues to restrict bidding on billions of dollars worth of business to companies operating in America" and "American consulting firms that carry out antipoverty programs abroad — dubbed beltway bandits by critics — do work that some advocates say local groups in developing countries could often manage at far less cost." While "those who favor tying aid to domestic interests say that it not only preserves jobs and supports American companies, but helps ensure broad political support for foreign aid, which is not always popular," the "skepticism of foreign aid is frequently rooted in the perception that the money is not well spent." The federal government's condom purchases show "the tradeoffs that characterize foreign aid American-style." Asian produced condoms are cheaper, but Alabama Congressmen have protected their local plant's contract, as "Without the government contract," the company, Alatech, "would go out of business."

Tight Energy Markets Fund, Distort Diplomacy In Favor Of Hostile Nations. The Washington Times (10/29, Sands, 88K) reports, "Exploiting tight global energy markets and soaring gas prices in recent years, leading energy producers around the globe are using their export windfalls to challenge U.S. interests, intimidate U.S. allies and, in some cases, bankroll terrorist and insurgent groups fighting U.S. forces," as "hundreds of billions of dollars swelling the coffers of regimes hostile to the United States." Flynt Leverett, a former top Middle East adviser in the Bush administration, and Pierre Noel, a research fellow with the French Institute of International Relations, say "Major producers such as Venezuela, Russia and Iran have teamed up with emerging energy consumers -- notably China -- in an 'axis of oil' to frustrate U.S. foreign-policy objectives." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "conceded earlier this year she underestimated the ways the 'energy question' distorted international relations."

Chirac Said To Be Under "Unrelenting" Attack In France. The New York Times (10/29, A3, Sciolino, 1.21M) reports that French president Jacques Chirac "has been under unrelenting — indeed unprecedented — attack," and it has "crescendoed since Mr. Chirac suffered what has been called a mild cerebral attack a year ago, focusing on his age, his leadership and his legacy." This "disillusionment with Mr. Chirac is not only personal but also a reflection of the dread among the French public that their nation has lost its glory abroad and its way at home." His "1995 campaign promises to 'mend the social fracture' in France and reduce unemployment, among other things, have been unfulfilled," and "As the end of his political career draws near, the fear of him has receded, and the time to settle scores has come." However, "Chirac is not a politician who can go quietly into the night," and he "has refused to announce that he will not run for a third term next spring, saying that he will announce his decision next March." Still, "conventional wisdom is that Mr. Chirac plans to retire but refuses to become a lame duck."

French Youths Set Bus Ablaze, Seriously Burn Woman. The AP (10/28) reports, "A group of marauding teenagers set fire to a bus Saturday in the southern French port city of Marseille, seriously wounding a passenger and leaving three others suffering from smoke inhalation," when "three or four young people burst onto a bus in the southern French city and tossed inside a bottle of flammable liquid before fleeing." One of the passengers, a 26-year-old woman, "suffered second- and third-degree burns on her arms, legs and face." Scattered violence resulted in six police officers with minor injuries and 47 arrests. "Bands of youths torched two public buses, and in troubled neighborhoods around the country, youths set fire to a total of 277 vehicles."

Eastern Europe Sees Rise Of Populism, Nationalism. The Washington Times/AP (10/29, Gera) reports, "Political life has fallen into disarray in Eastern Europe, and many are asking what has gone wrong in the 2½ years since these former communist countries joined the European Union." Some "specialists on the region say people are simply exhausted after years of economic sacrifices made to join the EU and NATO. They now lack the clear goals that drove them toward the West" and "discontent is mounting as the instant riches many thought would come from EU membership have failed to materialize." Jiri Pehe, a political analyst and director of New York University in Prague, notes "we see now…a rise of populists and nationalism," but "also stressed that the 'democratic framework is very strong, and it's supported by the outside,' thanks to the region's integration with the West."

Abbas Considering Calling On Jordan PLO Troops Against Hamas. The Washington Times/AP (10/29, Teibel) reports that according to the Palestinian officials, "Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas hopes to beef up his loyalist forces with Palestine Liberation Organization troops from Jordan… as rival Palestinian factions bolstered their ranks in anticipation of a feared civil war." While "Israel has objected in the past to letting members of the Jordan-based Badr Brigade enter Palestinian areas," the officials say "Israeli officials said they would consider allowing them in" due to the "intensifying" conflict between Fatah "and forces loyal to the militantly anti-Israel Hamas government." However," Israeli authorities were not immediately available for comment yesterday."

Fox Orders Police Into Oaxaca Following Killings. The Washington Post (10/29, A14, Roig-Franzia, 748K) reports that following the shooting death of U.S. journalist Brad Will and two protesters, Mexican "President Vicente Fox on Saturday ordered federal police to seize control of strike-ravaged Oaxaca de Juarez," a move he had resisted "Despite pressure from Oaxaca's tourist industry." As "federal officers have been accused in the past of inciting violence," Mexican presidents usually are "reluctant to use force." This five-month conflict "has pitted the governor of the state of Oaxaca against a coalition of citizen groups and striking teachers demanding his ouster," and "the demonstrations have left the region a shambles and scared away the tourists who are the foundation of the city's economy." While strikers blame "the killings on plainclothes paramilitary members affiliated with Gov. Ulises Ruiz's Institutional Revolutionary Party," the governor's office says it was "members of the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, an umbrella group that includes union members and indigenous groups that have joined the teachers' protest." This "spike in violence also seemed to suggest that there will be a long wait before Oaxaca's stunning colonial streets are once again crawling with camera-toting tourists. After the shootings, the U.S. ambassador in Mexico, Tony Garza, warned Americans to stay away."

The New York Times (10/29, A4, Lacey) adds that federal riot police officers and soldiers are "poised to end an increasingly violent protest," although it is "unclear…whether the federal troops intended to take over Oaxaca by force or to merely put pressure on the protesters to continue the monthslong negotiations to end the impasse." While "the federal government issued a statement ordering the protesters to 'immediately hand over streets, plazas, public buildings and private property' so that officials could 'guarantee public order and adherence to the law, as well as preserve respect for the population's individual guarantees,'" the "blunt" response from Florentino López, spokesman for the APPO was, "We're going to resist the attack." Meanwhile, "the mayor of a nearby town said the five men being detained for possible involvement in Mr. Will's killing were…police officers and local officials."

The AP (10/29, Romero) identities that mayor as Mayor Manuel Martinez Feria of the nearby town of Santa Lucia del Camino, and he identified the men "as two members of Santa Lucia's city council, two of that town's police officers and a former justice of the peace from another town." Additionally, "U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said in a statement that the shooters may have been Oaxaca police, and the Mexico City newspaper El Universal published photos Saturday identifying some of the men firing at protesters as local officials."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Enriquez, Johnson, 918K) adds, "by Saturday evening, there were signs that both the protesters and federal officials might be stepping back from a confrontation." APPO leader Flavio Sosa "indicated that his group would continue to maintain its barricades but would not fight back if the federal forces attempted to dismantle them." Meanwhile, Arturo Chavez Chavez, deputy secretary of state, said "that the federal forces had been sent only to prevent more violence and were not 'contemplating any type of action' on Saturday or today."

Castro Makes TV Appearance. The AP (10/28) reports, "The ailing Fidel Castro appeared on Cuban state television for the first time in more than a month Saturday, looking thin and tired but walking and ridiculing recent rumors of his death," and saying "they were the work of his enemies." Castro "said his recovery would be long and not without risk," but added, "I'm not the least bit afraid of what will occur." The BBC (10/29) also covers this story on their website.

Contras Divided Over Support For Ortega. The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Tobar, 918K) reports that a "split in the Contras highlights a growing frustration among the rural population that makes up the movement's rank and file, analysts say." Now, "Several Contra leaders who have defected to the Sandinista cause say they feel the movement's right-wing political allies have taken them for granted." Salvador Talavera, president of the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, the conservative political group started by the demobilized Contras, "signed a 'peace agreement' with the Sandinistas by which the Contras promised not to go to war again should their bitterest foe, Daniel Ortega, win the Nov. 5 presidential election." It "was a big boost for Ortega" and "a stunning setback to the presidential aspirations of Eduardo Montealegre of the conservative Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance."

NYTimes Says Nicaragua Took "Giant Step Backward" With Abortion Law. The New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) editorializes, "The rights and safety of Nicaragua's women took a giant step backward last week when the country's legislature passed a law criminalizing all abortions, with no exceptions." The Times says Nicaragua's ban "was a clear bid to curry support from the Catholic Church before next weekend's presidential elections."

Bolivia Signs New Energy Deals With Foreign Corporations. BBC.com (10/29) reports that although some "were signed with only minutes to go before the deadline," Bolivia has made new energy deals with 10 foreign gas and oil firms. "After President Evo Morales nationalised the oil and gas industry in May to give the state more control and a larger slice of profits," he gave them "six months to sign contracts giving up majority control of their Bolivian operations." The "deal with Petrobras - the largest foreign investor in the industry - came as a significant boost for Mr Morales as the Brazilians have invested more than $1bn in Bolivian gas. However, Petrobras and the Brazilian government had been angered by the way the Bolivians conducted negotiations."

Venezuelan Town Faces Mining Ban. The New York Times (10/29, A4, Romero, 1.21M) reports La Paragua, Venezuela, "has become a focus of efforts by President Hugo Chávez to halt much of the mining, citing environmental concerns. In September, army soldiers sent here to enforce a mining ban killed six miners, setting off violent protests." The Times adds, "The government has promised to create jobs for miners in tourism or agriculture, and to teach them to plant crops like cassava or corn. But miners say the promises have not been fulfilled, and last year, hundreds near the town of Las Claritas blocked a highway to Brazil and threw Molotov cocktails at troops."

Polls Show Lula With "Insurmountable" Lead In Brazil's Presidential Runoff Election. The New York Times (10/29, A4, Rohter, 1.21M) reports, "Rebuked at the polls four weeks ago because of voter irritation with a corruption scandal and his unwillingness to answer questions about it, Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, heads into a runoff vote on Sunday with a lead that every poll suggests is insurmountable." The "final round of public opinion surveys published Friday shows Mr. da Silva…defeating his opponent, Geraldo Alckmin…by at least 60 percent to 40 percent." He was "able to pull away from Mr. Alckmin over the past several weeks, in part, by labeling him a one-note candidate who spoke more of corruption than of his own plans for Brazil."

The Washington Post (10/29, A14, Reel, 748K) adds, "Bolsa Familia is the cash assistance program that pays more than 11 million low-income families in Brazil about $40 per month in cash if they meet conditions such as ensuring their children regularly attend school and have regular health checkups and vaccinations," and "it has been instrumental in helping President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcome corruption scandals and build a lead of more than 20 points in opinion polls." Poor Brazilians "strongly associate the program with Lula…and surveys indicate that support for Lula among the two-thirds of the population that lives on less than $500 per month is powering his reelection hopes."

The AP (10/29, Astor) notes that "da Silva has revived the populist rhetoric he had largely shed since taking office," and his "Fiery speeches contrasting the lives of Brazil's poor with the wealthy elite have left many Brazilians wondering whether he would push the country to the left." Although "few believe Silva would adopt the radical populism of Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, they worry that he could entrench divisions in Brazil" between the rich and poor.

Kabila, Bemba Compete In Congolese Runoff Election. BBC.com (10/28) reports, "Voting has opened for a new president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, in one of Africa's most significant elections for many years. President Joseph Kabila, who came to power after his father Laurent was assassinated in 2001, is facing former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba. … Sunday's run-off will conclude the DRC's first fully democratic polls since independence in 1960 and is aimed at restoring peace to one of Africa's largest and most turbulent states."

The Washington Post (10/29, A16, McCrummen, 748K) reports, "There is an exuberant, if fragile, sense in eastern Congo these days that the country is inching toward one of the most significant moments in its post-colonial history. In the culmination of the first multiparty elections in 40 years, tens of millions of people are expected at the polls Sunday for the runoff vote for president and to elect, for the first time, provincial legislators tasked with bringing democracy closer to people who have seen decades of epic corruption and two ruthless wars. The process has been largely peaceful, the result of a massive logistical effort by the United Nations, which has deployed 17,500 peacekeepers; international donors, who have given $450 million; and mainly, the Congolese themselves."

The Los Angeles Times (10/29, Sanders, 918K) reports, "Anxious Congolese returned to the polls this morning to complete the first democratic presidential election in more than 40 years. But fears of renewed violence in this Central African giant largely overshadowed the hope and optimism many had expressed during the first round of voting."

Sudan Denies Accusation Of Bombing Chadian Towns. The AP (10/28) reports, "Chad accused neighboring Sudan on Saturday of bombing four towns along its eastern border, close to Sudan's volatile western Darfur region where thousands have been displaced by three years of conflict." Sudanese army spokesman Brig. Gen. Osman Mohammed al-Aghbash denied the report. The AP adds, "There has been no independent confirmation of the Chadian government's allegations that Sudan's air force attacked the villages of Bahai, Tine, Kayarin and Bamina on Friday."

"Secret Lover" Anti-AIDS Campaign Stirred Controversy In Swaziland. The Washington Post (10/29, A15, Timberg, 748K) reports on a new Swazi anti-AIDS campaign "arrived without warning" with a the message "Your secret lover can kill you," ads that were different from "bland billboards suggesting that more condoms or a positive attitude toward the disease would curb its spread." The new ads disappeared two weeks later "in a frenzy of controversy," but they have "sparked a passionate national debate about how best to combat a disease that, Swazis say, has pushed their country to the brink of collapse. And the ads forced many here to confront how freewheeling sex was fueling an epidemic of early death." The Post writes, "Although polygamy is common -- the king has 13 wives -- even more common, Swazis say, are relationships in which men have only one wife but girlfriends also. Women often maintain several partners as well."

Six-Year-Old Boy Works As Indentured Servant In Africa. The New York Times (10/29, Lafraniere, 1.21M) reports on child labor in Africa, telling the story through the eyes of six-year-old Mark Kwadwo, and says that "no means is the child trafficking trade uniquely African. Children are forced to race camels in the Middle East, weave carpets in India and fill brothels all over the developing world." The UN's International Labor Organization "estimates that 1.2 million are sold into servitude every year in an illicit trade that generates as much as $10 billion annually. Studies show they are most vulnerable in Asia, Latin America and Africa. Africa's children, the world's poorest, account for roughly one-sixth of the trade, according to the labor organization. Data is notoriously scarce, but it suggests victimization of African children on a huge scale."

WPost Condemns Libyan Trial Of Healthcare Workers. In an editorial, the Washington Post (10/29, B6, 748K) condemns the Libyan trial of five Bulgarian nurses and a Palesinian doctor who are "are accused of intentionally injecting the AIDS virus into more than 400 Libyan children." The Post describes the charges as "an attempt to deflect Libyans' attention from the shocking state of their own medical system." The Post concludes, "If Libya nonetheless goes ahead with this travesty of justice, it will be saying that it prefers to scapegoat foreigners rather than admit to the weakness of its own medical system. The first victims will be the health workers. But they will be followed by the Libyans themselves, who need a government with the honesty to confront the true causes of HIV infections."

Kristof Calls On World Leaders To Intervene In Darfur. In an op-ed in the New York Times (10/29, 1.21M) Nicholas Kristof writes, "This past week alone, Sudan expelled the U.N. envoy for Sudan and sent a proxy army to invade eastern Chad. Those moves underscored both the audacity of Sudan's leaders and the fecklessness of the rest of the world's," but Kristoff says, "[T]here's plenty we can do." He proposes several steps, including, "Kofi Annan should appoint a new U.N. Envoy of utmost prominence. … The envoy's job would be to lead an intensive negotiation aimed at achieving a political settlement." Also, "President Bush and European leaders need to use their leverage on four nations in particular to make them part of the solution: China, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Libya."

TERRORISM NEWS:

New Southcom Leader Approves Of Conditions At Guantanamo Bay (SCCD/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

The State College Centre Daily/McClatchy, October 29, 2006

MIAMI - Just days into the job, the Pentagon's new Southern Command chief made an overnight weekend visit to the U.S. Navy base at Guantanamo Bay - and declared captive conditions compatible with the Geneva Conventions.

Navy Adm. James Stavridis said Saturday he met with about 300 U.S. military personnel and saw about 50 of the 435 captives held at the base, including the so-called high-value terrorist suspects who had recently been moved there from secret CIA custody.

"I went and saw their facility," the admiral told The Miami Herald in a telephone interview after a 24-hour visit to the remote Navy base in southeast Cuba.

He declined to give specifics on where the latest arrivals are being kept, and under what circumstances. But he declared them "in appropriate conditions commensurate with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. I laid eyes on it; they're in good shape in that regard."

After being stung by a U.S. Supreme Court decision earlier this year, the Bush administration reversed course and declared that - although enemy combatants, not prisoners of war - the alleged al-Qaida and Taliban captives were entitled to the protections.

They were just this month granted their first visits with the International Committee of the Red Cross, after up to four years in secret U.S. captivity and so-called CIA "black sites."

In the course of the site inspection, the admiral said, he saw detainees in a range of locations - being interrogated, playing soccer and exercising individually - and found them "a hearty bunch."

Interrogations, he said, struck him as "amicable conversations between two people."

Referring to the 14 high-value detainees in particular, he said they were in "very good shape."

President Bush ordered the men sent to the detention camps for possible trial around Labor Day, including suspected Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed - who published reports allege was subjected to a rough interrogation technique called water-boarding, and at one point purportedly confessed to wielding the knife that beheaded Wall Street Journal correspondent Daniel Pearl, in January 2002 in Pakistan.

In parallel, the first Navy admiral to oversee military operations in Latin America and the Caribbean also met with about 300 sailors and soldiers at the base - from senior commanders to camp guards - and declared himself impressed with their professionalism in what he called "a stressful environment down there."

U.S. forces at Guantanamo, he said, are "interacting daily with very, very dangerous terrorists" in typical one-year tours that he described as "hardship duty" that separates them from their families.

His Miami-based staff, he said, would propose improvements in housing and other activities for them.

As he took the job Oct. 19, Stavridis said he'd visit the controversial camps first, and then follow up later with trips to Colombia and Central America, where U.S. forces work with those host countries. Cuba has virtually no engagement with the U.S. military under four-decade-old U.S. policy.

During his visit, Stavridis said he met senior detention camp staff, "looked every one of them in the eye and said we're going to run this camp in a transparent and legal fashion."

Separately, he said, he also toured the portion of the base where the U.S. military might house migrants found at sea during a rafter crisis similar to the huge numbers of Haitians and Cubans who were interdicted by the U.S. in the mid-1990s.

He declared the base suitable for "very barebones" humanitarian relief and would develop contingency plans - although he said he didn't foresee any crisis on the horizon.

During the `90s, the U.S. Navy base threw up tent camps around the 45-square-mile base to house a migrant population that swelled at one point to about 40,000.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

How To Spot A Terrorist On The Fly (WP)

By Paul Ekman

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

The man in the cheap brown jacket stood slumped in line, staring at the ground. His hands were fidgety, reaching repeatedly into his inside jacket pocket, or patting it from the outside. A momentary look of anguish, just 1/15th of a second or so, occasionally flashed across his face -- the inner corners of his eyebrows would go up, so that his brows sloped down from the center of his forehead, his cheeks would rise, and the corners of his lips would pull down slightly. He was exhibiting what I call a micro-expression, a sign of an emotion being concealed.

The question was: What was he concealing? And why?

To the behavior-detection officers I was with at Boston's Logan International Airport, his combination of mannerisms -- the micro-expression, the slumped posture, the pocket-patting -- was unusual enough to raise a red flag. They called a uniformed state police officer, who asked the man the purpose of his travel. It turned out that he was on the way to the funeral of his brother, who had died unexpectedly. That was the reason for the bowed head. The frequent chest-patting was to reassure himself that he had his boarding pass. The micro-expression was an attempt to conceal his grief.

The man was not a terrorist, nor a malefactor of any kind, but just an innocent traveler carrying some extra emotional baggage that day. So why single him out for questioning because of a fleeting expression and a sad-sack posture?

Critics of the controversial new security program I was taking stock of -- known as SPOT, for Screening Passengers by Observational Techniques -- have said that it is an unnecessary invasion of privacy, based on an untested method of observation, that is unlikely to yield much in the way of red-handed terrorists set on blowing up a plane or flying it into a building, but would violate fliers' civil rights.

I disagree. I've participated in four decades' worth of research into deception and demeanor, and I know that researchers have amassed enough knowledge about how someone who is lying looks and behaves that it would be negligent not to use it in the search for terrorists. Along with luggage checks, radar screening, bomb-sniffing dogs and the rest of our security arsenal, observational techniques can help reduce risks -- and potentially prevent another deadly assault like the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

A lot has been said about the 9/11 hijackers' unusual behavior in the days before they boarded their ill-fated flights. Several of them were repeatedly questioned, but no one recognized their lies. An airport screener later said he had been suspicious of one because of his strange demeanor on the day of the attacks. But the screener had no training that would have given him the confidence to act on his suspicions.

The hijackers' lies -- to visa interviewers and airport check-in workers -- succeeded largely because airport personnel weren't taught how to spot liars. They had to rely on their hunches. The people who might have saved the lives of many Americans were needlessly handicapped.

Imagine if that screener had been taught to discern the signs of deception in a person's facial expressions, voice, body language and gestures. With such training, he could have been confident enough to report the hijacker's behavior. SPOT, which the Transportation Security Administration introduced this year at 14 U.S. airports, including Washington's Dulles International, is the first attempt at using observational techniques as part of our security approach, and it is promising. Preliminary findings show that the overwhelming number of those who are taken out of line and detained for further investigation were intending to commit or had committed some kind of wrongdoing: They were wanted criminals, drug smugglers, money smugglers, illegal immigrants -- and, yes, a few were suspected terrorists.

SPOT's officers, working in pairs, stand off to the side, scanning passengers at a security checkpoint for signs of any behaviors on the officers' checklist, such as repeated patting of the chest -- which might mean that a bomb is strapped too tightly under a person's jacket -- or a micro-expression.

The items on the SPOT checklist are culled from law enforcement experience and research on deception and demeanor. What about your face, voice and body betrays the fact that you're lying? I've been studying this question for nearly 40 years, ever since I began researching it in the 1970s with Maureen O'Sullivan of the University of San Francisco and, several years later, with Mark Frank of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

In our studies, we recorded interviews set up in such a way that we knew when a person was lying. Afterward, we replayed the videotapes over and over in slow motion to identify the expressions and behaviors that distinguish lying from truth-telling. We spent hours identifying the precise moment-to-moment movements of the facial muscles based on my Facial Action Coding System (FACS) -- a catalogue of every conceivable facial expression that I created and published in 1978 -- to get comprehensive evidence of the kinds of facial looks that accompany spoken lies. Once such expressions are identified, people can be quickly trained to recognize them as they occur.

We also looked at the behavioral signs that accompany the act of thinking up an answer on the spot (e.g., an increase in pauses) and signs of emotion in the face, voice or gesture that contradict the words being spoken ("The answer is definitely no" accompanied by just a slight nod of the head).

The facial expressions we identified allowed us to correctly determine who was lying 70 percent of the time; when the rest of demeanor is added, it pushes accuracy close to 100 percent.

Tools like this are indispensable to the future of airport security, and more are coming. Within the next year or two, maybe sooner, it will be possible to program surveillance cameras hooked to computers that spit out FACS data to identify anyone whose facial expressions are different from the previous two dozen people in line.

Someday, remote surveillance devices may identify anyone whose blood pressure and heart rate are much higher than those of the previous two dozen people. While this will provide an important new way of knowing that something is amiss, it does open a Pandora's box. Legislation to protect privacy and prevent misuse of such a technique should be enacted now.

Meanwhile, short-term research on several questions -- whether SPOT misses people whose behaviors are on its checklist; whether other behaviors should be included on the list; and whether additional training would increase observers' accuracy -- could help improve the program.

Civil libertarians have raised the expected concerns about using observational techniques at airports: that SPOT spots more than just terrorists; that minorities, who fear discrimination and might act more nervous than others, may be unfairly singled out; that most of the people identified are innocent.

But the day I spent at Logan confirmed for me that SPOT violates no one's civil rights. Few people were identified. Nearly always, the answers to initial questions made further investigation unnecessary. No record was made, and the passenger lost no time.

Observational techniques are not a substitute for all the other techniques we now use to catch would-be terrorists. But they add another layer to transportation security. They are now being used at fewer than one in 10 major U.S. airports. We need to use them everywhere.

WAR NEWS:

Seeking To Ease Rift, Bush Confers With Iraq Premier (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise
The New York Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087945

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 — President Bush stepped into an increasingly fractious relationship with the Iraqi government in a videoconference with Baghdad on Saturday after days of angry comments by Iraqi leaders about what they see as American meddling.

The 50-minute conference between Mr. Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki took place after an acrimonious conversation late Friday between Mr. Maliki and the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad. According to an aide to Mr. Maliki, the Iraqi leader said that he was "a friend of the United States, but not America's man in Iraq."

The sharp remarks appear to be part of a growing schism between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and its American supporters, a division building for months that burst into full public view this week. Mr. Maliki spoke out angrily on Wednesday against the idea of American deadlines for action on stabilizing Iraq. Mr. Khalilzad publicly detailed the benchmarks the day before.

Iraqi leaders say that the United States, in particular Mr. Khalilzad, has been too meddlesome in internal affairs.

In the videoconference, Mr. Maliki, sitting beside Mr. Khalilzad in the Green Zone, opened with praise for Mr. Bush, according to Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. "History will record that because of your efforts Iraq is a free country," Mr. Maliki said, echoing a statement he made on his trip to Washington three months ago, according to Mr. Snow, who sat in on the session.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Maliki made "no demands, and it was a very cordial discussion." But the prime minister, he said, made clear that he wanted to move quickly toward "an Iraqi assumption of command and control" over forces operating in Baghdad and elsewhere.

A Maliki spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, said the prime minister had said the Iraqi government wanted more control over its army, which operates under Americans.

The meeting, the second in 12 days for Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki, was clearly part of a White House effort to diffuse tensions between the two governments.

The push for more Iraqi control comes just as American military commanders are saying the Iraqi Army needs more time to improve. America's top military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., said this week that it would be another 12 to 18 months before Iraqi troops would be ready to take over.

A central irritant for the Shiite leaders is what they say is an American preoccupation with Shiite militias — often linked to political parties — that have been responsible for much of the bloodshed here in the past year. Shiites fault American officials, particularly Mr. Khalilzad, for treating militias as enemies on a par with the Sunni insurgency.

"The forces need to know one clear fact," said one prominent Shiite politician. "Who is the real enemy here? It is the Saddamists and the takfiris." Takfiris are Sunni extremists.

That preoccupation has distracted American military policy, Shiite leaders say, and led to gaps in protection of Shiite areas vulnerable to attacks by Sunni militants, a position that American military commanders strongly dispute. Leaders argue that the Iraqis should be allowed to protect these areas themselves, an assertion that raises a distant but real American fear — that the government could use the largely Shiite army selectively, or that it could even become one side of a civil war.

Mr. Maliki leads a government that is a fragile coalition between Sunnis, Kurds and other groups, but with the arguments made in recent days, appears to be placing himself firmly inside the Shiite camp, lending an increasingly sectarian tinge to the Iraqi political landscape.

One major lever the Iraqis have is the United Nations agreement that extends legal authority for foreign troops to be here. Senior officials are trying to amend the agreement, which expires on Dec. 31, in order to give the government more control over parts of the army sooner, a process American officials are watching worriedly.

In Washington, the administration has sought to smooth relations, particularly as midterm elections near.

Part of the Shiites' anger seems to center on Mr. Khalilzad. A Sunni Muslim born in Afghanistan, Mr. Khalilzad has been most closely associated with his intense efforts to bring minority Sunni Arabs into Iraqi politics. Shiite leaders say he has worked so hard to involve Sunnis that he has abandoned the Shiites.

The meeting on Saturday, whose participants included Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, was also notable for what was not discussed. Mr. Bush did not raise the White House frustrations with the comparatively small number of Iraqi troops dedicated to the latest effort to secure Baghdad. Nor was there discussion, Mr. Snow said, of seeking to further incorporate the militia of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr into the army.

In recent days, other officials have stressed that Mr. Bush is doing all he can to bolster Mr. Maliki, whose early months as prime minister were widely described in Washington as a disappointment. But several officials have noted recently that Mr. Bush has promised to support Mr. Maliki only as long as he makes what Mr. Bush calls "hard decisions."

"No one has said what happens if he stops making those decisions," one senior official said early this week. "I don't think anyone knows."

Mr. Maliki took issue even with aspects of the enterprise that Americans have gone to great lengths to make work.

The White House, in a statement, said the leaders had agreed on the goals of accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi Security Force, Iraqi assumption of command and control over its forces, and transferring responsibility for security to the government of Iraq. A working group was set up to achieve them.

The military on Saturday announced the death of another American soldier from "enemy action" on Friday in Anbar Province in western Iraq. It has also said a soldier was killed in Diyala Province on Thursday. The deaths bring the toll for American troops this month to 98, the highest for one month in more than a year.

Also on Saturday, 11 Iraqi soldiers were kidnapped at a fake checkpoint in the heavily Sunni village of Adhaim, north of Baghdad. South of Baghdad in the town of Iskandariya, five Iraqis were killed and 11 wounded in a car bombing.

David E. Sanger and Jim Rutenberg contributed reporting from Washington, and Abdul Razzaq al-Saiedi from Baghdad.

Bush, Iraqi Premier Act To Close Rift After Week Of Tension (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 -- President Bush coaxed Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki back into a common front with the U.S. administration Saturday, soothing the Iraqi leader in a 50-minute video link-up after a week of missteps and sharp words exposed tensions between the two allies.

Both leaders declared themselves "committed to the partnership" and prepared to work "in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror," the White House said in a statement after the Baghdad-Washington teleconference.

Bush and Maliki also agreed to create a top-level committee to come up with recommendations for speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces, moving ahead on efforts to put Iraq in control of those forces, and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security. Maliki's spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, said the recommendations would include timelines.

The proposed commission, which is to include Iraqi government ministers, U.S. Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, will be at least the second high-level U.S.-Iraqi commission established here since the summer of 2005 to try to speed up Iraq's takeover of security and the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Since formation of the first panel, sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites has exploded, taking Iraqi civilian casualties this summer to the highest level of the war and helping to push American combat deaths this month to their third-highest figure since U.S. troops entered Iraq in March 2003.

For the Bush administration, Saturday's accord gave hope of closing an embarrassing rift that broke open just as Bush was trying to show that his much-criticized Iraq policy was adapting to the increasing violence. Congressional elections, just 10 days away, are focused heavily on the unpopular 3 1/2 -year-old war.

Maliki had sought Saturday's talk, aides said, because he was unhappy over what he took as Washington's dictating of terms to his government. The Iraqi leader was intent on showing that Khalilzad "was no L. Paul Bremer," the Associated Press quoted one Maliki aide as saying, referring to the American appointed to run Iraq shortly after the U.S. invasion.

The falling-out between the two administrations had its roots in growing U.S. frustration -- expressed privately by American officials -- over what is seen as the slowness of Maliki's roughly five-month-old government to quell both a Sunni Arab insurgency and the even bloodier Shiite-Sunni sectarian struggle.

DOJ_NMG_0087947

Feathers were ruffled Tuesday, when Khalilzad held a news conference with Casey to announce what he said were new commitments from Iraq's government on timelines and reforms meant to speed the day when U.S. troops could leave.

Maliki angrily denied any such commitment in a news conference the next day, and he followed up with interviews stressing that he and his government were independent of the United States.

Point made, White House spokesman Tony Snow said after Saturday's videoconference. "He's not America's man in Iraq," Snow told reporters. "The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

Snow said that Bush assured Maliki of continuing U.S. support despite midterm election criticism of the war. "Both leaders understand the political pressures going on. But the president told him: Don't worry about politics in the United States because we are with you, and we are going to be with you," Snow said.

Maliki's spokesman called the statement of U.S. support gratifying.

"The agreement shows there is a strategic alliance between the two countries for fighting terrorist groups and full support between President Bush and his administration to the government of Maliki," Dabbagh said. "It's a clear message to all in Iraq and the world that the administration supports the Maliki cabinet."

The U.S. military on Saturday reported the combat death of a U.S. Marine in Anbar province, raising to 98 the number of U.S. personnel killed in October.

In other violence around Iraq, one person was killed and 35 wounded in Baghdad when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in the southern neighborhood of Dora.

Police also found 10 bodies of victims of apparent sectarian violence -- seven around Baghdad and three in Baqubah, 35 miles northeast of the capital.

In Kirkuk, 10 armed men stormed the house of a female rights activist, Halima Ahmad Hussein al-Jubouri, and killed her in front of her children, police Capt. Emad Khidir said.

At least 12 other people were reported killed in shootings and bomb attacks nationwide. The number of killings that reach public notice each day is a fraction of that logged by Iraq's morgues and hospitals.

Other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraqi Premier Makes His Case To Bush (LAT)

Maliki, in a talk with the president aimed at easing tensions, asks for more control over security forces.

Iraq's prime minister pressed President Bush on Saturday to give his government a freer hand to fight Sunni Arab insurgents and neutralize the Shiite Muslim militias knocking the country off balance, in a conversation meant to smooth tensions that had flared over security disagreements and election-year rhetoric.

Bush, in a 50-minute videoconference with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, upheld Washington's commitment to his Shiite-dominated government despite its failure to rein in the Shiite militias, which form a nucleus of Maliki's political base.

Maliki and U.S. officials have pressured anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to crack down on a powerful and volatile militia nominally under his control. On Saturday, several members of his organization said that Sadr had designated a committee of loyalists to investigate and purge his organization of the most egregious troublemakers.

The committee has already expelled and publicly denounced 30 self-styled Sadr movement members, said Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a member of parliament loyal to the cleric.

Saturday's conversation between Bush and Maliki followed a week of recriminations between U.S. officials in Baghdad and the Iraqi government over the potential disbanding and disarming of Sadr's Al Mahdi army and other paramilitary groups allegedly responsible for the kidnapping, torture and killing of thousands of Sunni Arab men.

At least 20 such slaying victims, some bearing electrical drill and hot-iron wounds on their bodies and gunshot wounds to the head, were discovered Saturday in Baghdad.

At a private meeting Friday, Maliki demanded of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad that he respect Iraq's sovereignty, aides to the prime minister said. Maliki's reported message came in the face of mounting American demands for his government to take security steps against Sadr.

Khalilzad and other U.S. officials have referred to timelines that the Iraqi government must abide by or face unspecified consequences.

But there was no mention of timelines or deadlines in a joint statement issued Saturday after Bush and Maliki spoke, just a commitment to "accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi security force, and transferring responsibility for security" to Iraqis.

"As leaders of two great countries, we are committed to the security and prosperity of a democratic Iraq and the global fight against terrorism which affects all our citizens," the statement said.

With nine days left before Americans go to the polls, Bush has tried to bolster support for the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq by acknowledging setbacks and embracing a schedule of benchmarks for Iraq's political progress.

But Maliki's opposition to deadlines and his criticism that the U.S. attitude toward his government has encouraged the insurgents have put the Bush administration on the defensive.

"There are no strains in the relationship," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Saturday.

He added that Maliki was "not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister — he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

Maliki asked Bush to give him the power to consolidate authority over security forces. The hodgepodge security arrangement in Baghdad, he told Bush, was allowing insurgents to flee one area for another after staging attacks, said Haidar Abadi, a confidant of the prime minister and a leader of his Islamic Dawa Party.

Maliki asked Bush to let his security forces enter areas controlled by U.S. forces, Abadi said.

"He asked the president to allow the Iraqi government to have a stronger and freer hand in managing the security situation in Iraq," he said. "We don't have control over the movement of security forces."

Sharp disagreements over the handling of the Shiite militias have frayed relations between Maliki's government and U.S. officials in Baghdad.

Khalilzad has demanded that the Iraqi government take the same zero-tolerance stance toward Shiite militias that it has with regard to Sunni Arab insurgents. But Maliki told Bush he had a different formula for disarming the Shiite fighters, Abadi said.

There are signs that Maliki's approach is producing some results.

Shortly after he visited Sadr in his Najaf home to discuss security issues, the cleric created the purging committee and gave it the power to investigate those purporting to act in the name of his organization and expel those involved in criminal activity.

The committee is headed by Sheik Mohammed Fartusi and Sheik Ali Kufi, two captains in the Sadr movement.

"The committee has great authority," Sheik Hazem Araji, a Sadr deputy in Baghdad, said in an interview. "Any violator will be kicked out of the Mahdi army and their name will be publicly announced."

Maliki told Bush that the Shiite militias would disappear when the Sunnis' campaign of bombing and shooting civilians and officials and attacking Shiite holy sites subsided.

There were few signs Saturday that such a prospect was on the horizon.

At least one U.S. service member was reported killed in Iraq, bringing to 98 the number of American troops killed here this month. The Marine, assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Friday of combat injuries sustained in the western province of Al Anbar, the military said.

Insurgents blew up a minor Shiite shrine near the northern city of Kirkuk on Saturday, placing a bomb in the tomb of Imam Ismael in the village of Shikha.

Authorities found the bodies of four Iraqi soldiers in northern Baghdad. Twelve other soldiers were kidnapped while driving through a Sunni insurgent stronghold north of the capital.

Bush Reaffirms Support For Iraq's Prime Minister (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Saturday reaffirmed his support for Iraq's prime minister, telling Nouri al Maliki that he isn't "America's man in Iraq" but a sovereign leader whom the U.S. is aiding.

Playing down tensions over a U.S. plan for benchmarks toward reducing the violence, the leaders said they were "committed to the partnership" and would work "in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror."

In a statement after a 50-minute video conference, Messrs. Bush and Maliki outlined three goals: speeding up the training of Iraq's security forces; moving ahead with Iraqi control of its forces; and making the Iraqi government responsible for the country's security. A special group of high-level Iraqi ministers will work with the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to recommend how best to achieve those goals.

"As leaders of two great countries, we are committed to the security and prosperity of a democratic Iraq and the global fight against terrorism which affects all our citizens," according to their joint statement.

Mr. Maliki had squabbled with the Bush administration this week over his objections to a timeline proposed by Washington for bringing security to Iraq. "There are no strains in the relationship," Mr. Snow said.

During the video hookup, Mr. Maliki told Mr. Bush, "History will record that because of your efforts, Iraq is a free country," according to White House press secretary Tony Snow.

"What you've got in Maliki is a guy who is making decisions," Mr. Snow said after the session. "He's making tough decisions, and he's showing toughness and he's also showing political skill in dealing with varying factions within his own country. And both leaders understand the political pressures going on."

Mr. Maliki was quoted by a close aide as having told Mr. Khalilzad on Friday, "I am a friend of the United States, but I am not America's man in Iraq."

In response, Mr. Snow told reporters Saturday, "He's not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

"In this prime minister, you have somebody in the Iraqi government who wants to take charge, who wants to take responsibility, is working on all fronts, on the economic side, on the security side, and on the political reconciliation side," the spokesman said. "And he believes it's important to do whatever he can to build greater faith and trust with the Iraqi people in the democracy. So the president's very happy actually with the way the prime minister is working."

After a tense week in U.S.-Iraqi relations, the prime minister and the U.S. ambassador issued a rare joint statement Friday in which Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to a "good and strong" relationship with the U.S.

The joint statement said that Iraq "made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward." Mr. Maliki had issued several public statements this week declaring that the U.S. had no right to impose "timetables" on his government. That contradicted Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad's assertion that the Maliki government had already agreed to set timelines for curbing violence and solving other problems. The statement was issued after the two men met "to discuss our ongoing efforts to bring peace and security to Iraq and create a better future for all Iraqis," the highly unusual joint statement said.

Calm Gives Way to Chaos

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the death of a Marine in Anbar province of Baghdad on Friday, raising to 98 the number of American forces killed in Iraq in October, already the fourth-deadliest month since the Iraq war began in March 2003.

The relative five-day calm in Baghdad in the five days since the end of the holy month of Ramadan ceded ground Saturday to a fresh outbreak of bloodletting.

Clashes erupted Saturday between U.S. and Iraqi troops and gunmen in the city of Ramadi, an insurgency stronghold where scores of militants staged a military-like parade last week not far from the local U.S. base. The troops used loudspeakers to ask residents to stay indoors.

One person was killed and 35 wounded when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in Baghdad's turbulent southern neighborhood of Dora, police Lt. Mohammed al Baghdadi said. A second person was killed and nine were wounded when a bomb went off in a minibus in an eastern Baghdad district.

Iraqi Prime Minister: 'I'm Not America's Man' (CNN)

CNN.com, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Saturday referred to the boundary between himself and the United States, telling U.S. President Bush that he answers first to the Iraqi government and people, according to an Iraqi official.

The clarification first came up Friday during a private meeting between al-Maliki and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, according to an Iraqi parliament member who is also al-Maliki's senior aide.

"I consider myself a friend of the U.S., but I'm not America's man in Iraq," al-Maliki told the U.S. ambassador, according to Hassan al-Seneid.

The prime minister told Khalilzad that as head of a national unity government, he must win the approval of Iraq's parliament before acting on any proposals, al-Seneid said.

Al-Maliki repeated the message to Bush during a video conference Saturday, in which the two leaders discussed transferring power to Iraqi forces, Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow agreed with al-Maliki's stance. "He's not America's man in Iraq," The Associated Press quoted Snow as saying. "The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister -- he's the leader of the Iraqi people. He is, in fact, the sovereign leader of Iraq."

"There are no strains in the relationship," Snow added, according to AP.

Bush and al-Maliki agreed on three goals during their 50-minute talk: accelerating the training of Iraqi security forces; eventual control by Iraq of its forces, and the transfer of security responsibilities to the Iraqi government.

Absent among those goals was the dismantling of militias, which have been blamed for leading death squads and sectarian vendettas against Iraqi civilians.

On Saturday, Iraqi authorities found the bodies of 25 people across Baghdad -- all believed to be the victims of Sunni-Shiite violence. Some, with hands and feet bound, showed signs of torture, police said.

Al-Maliki has been critical of the setting of timelines and the U.S. military effort, particularly a raid in Baghdad's Sadr City to detain a death squad leader this week.

Bush and al-Maliki agreed to form "a high level working group to put forward recommendations on how to reach those goals," according to their joint statement. The group would include Iraq's national security adviser, ministers of defense and interior, U.S. Gen. George Casey and Khalilzad, the statement added. Women's rights leader killed

Violence in Iraq killed at least three people and wounded scores more on Saturday.

Police were also investigating the killing of a women's rights leader in Iraq.

Gunmen reportedly stormed Faliha Ahmed Hassan's house in Hawija, about 43 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and shot her to death on Friday evening.

Also in Hawija, gunmen on Saturday morning killed an Iraqi soldier and wounded three others in an attack on a joint Iraqi army and police patrol, a Kirkuk police official said.

Iraqi security forces were also targeted in eastern Baghdad. A roadside bomb wounded two Iraqi police officers in charge of guarding an oil industry facility Saturday morning, an Iraqi police spokesman said.

Also in eastern Baghdad, a bomb planted in a parked minibus exploded on Palestine Street, killing a civilian and wounding eight others, Iraqi emergency police said.

In a separate attack in the southern neighborhood of Dora, eight mortars exploded at a bus station, killing a civilian and wounding 30 others, Iraqi emergency police said.

And, in what has become a common occurrence, Iraq police found 10 bullet-riddled bodies thought to belong to victims of Sunni-Shiite sectarian vendettas.

West of the capital in Anbar province, a U.S. Marine with the Regimental Combat Team 5 died Friday after being wounded in battle, the U.S. military said Saturday.

The U.S. military death toll for the war is 2,811. So far this month, 98 troops have died. The deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq was November 2004, with 137 killed.Other developments

The Iraqi Army has captured the cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain former leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, a spokesman for Iraq's Ministry of Defense said Saturday. During the capture of Khaled al-Khayyali, documents and tapes were seized that detailed past crimes committed by al-Zarqawi, operations that had been carried out and more operations that were planned, said spokesman Mohammed al-Askari. Al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

U.S.-led coalition forces killed a terrorist suspect and detained 10 Iraqis believed responsible "for the movement of foreign fighters" into the country during a raid south of Baghdad on Saturday morning, the U.S. military said. The raid was part of an effort to cut back on the number of car bombs and roadside attacks on the military there, the military added.

Timetables? Depends On Who's Talking (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Recent discussion about Iraq has focused on the U.S. and Iraqi governments setting benchmarks for improving stability so the United States can eventually draw down troops, but public statements have made it difficult to determine who has agreed to what. The situation seemed to change over the course of the week, until finally it appeared that little had really happened.

On Tuesday, U.S. ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told a Baghdad news conference that the Iraqi government had agreed to benchmarks and timelines. "Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed," he said. "Iraqi leaders have agreed to a timeline for making the hard decisions needed to resolve these issues."

He added that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani has "made these commitments public" and that the United States will support the Iraqis "in their effort to meet these benchmarks."

Khalilzad described some of the specifics: Over the next 12 months, "assuming that the Iraqi leaders deliver on the commitments that they have made," there will be action on allowing constitutional amendment, disarming militias, making laws to administer oil revenue and improving security institutions.

On Wednesday in Baghdad, however, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki contradicted Khalilzad.

"I affirm that this government represents the will of the people, and no one has the right to impose a timetable on it," he said. "The Americans have the right to review their policies, but we do not believe in a timetable."

Hours later, in Washington, President Bush staked out a middle ground. He said that Iraq had indeed agreed to a schedule but that specific benchmarks were in the works.

Iraq has "agreed to a schedule for resolving issues, such as disarming illegal militias and death squads, sharing oil revenues, amending the Iraqi constitution and reforming the de-Baathification process," Bush said. "The first objective is to develop benchmarks that the [Iraqi] government agrees with and that we think are important."

On Thursday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld made benchmarks seem further down the road. Benchmarks are "still in discussions," he said. They will cover political, economic and security issues "to see how we get from where we are through this year and through next year and accomplish the things that are in our mutual interest."

Friday, White House press secretary Tony Snow cast the issue in even broader terms. "What you do have is collaborative efforts to try to work toward a series of goals, political, economic and security. . . . The Iraqis have already published a lot of their economic and political goals. And as I've also explained, for obvious reasons, you don't really go public with a lot of the security stuff, because it in fact tips your hand."

Later Friday, Maliki and Khalilzad met. They released a statement that still did not resolve whether the two governments are setting out specific deadlines.

It read: "Iraq and the United States are committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people. The Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved, with timelines, to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people. The United States fully supports their goals and will help make them a success."

Yesterday, Bush and Maliki had a 50-minute videoconference to smooth out the differences that had bubbled up during the week. Afterward, they released a statement that made no mention of timelines, benchmarks or schedules.

DOJ_NMG_0087952

"We have three common goals: accelerating the pace of training the Iraqi Security Force, Iraqi assumption of command and control over Iraqi forces, and transferring responsibility for security to the Government of Iraq," the statement said.

Aide: Iraqi Leader Using U.S. Angst (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 29, 2006

After a hastily arranged video conference with George Bush, Iraq's prime minister said Saturday that the U.S. president promised to move swiftly to turn over full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government. A close aide to Nouri al-Maliki said later the prime minister was intentionally playing on U.S. voter displeasure with the war to strengthen his hand with Washington.

Hassan al-Suneid, a member of al-Maliki's inner circle, said the video conference was sought because issues needed airing at a higher level than with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

Al-Suneid said the prime minister complained to Bush that Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shiite al-Maliki imperiously.

"The U.S. ambassador is not (L. Paul) Bremer (the former U.S. administrator in Iraq). He does not have a free rein to do what he likes. Khalilzad must not behave like Bremer but rather like an ambassador," al-Suneid quoted al-Maliki as saying.

The remarks were the fourth time in a week that al-Maliki challenged the U.S. handling of the war. The ripostes flowed from an announcement by Khalilzad on Tuesday that al-Maliki had agreed to a U.S. plan to set timelines for progress in quelling violence in Iraq.

Al-Maliki's anger grew through the week until on Friday, al-Suneid said, the prime minister told Khalilzad: "I am a friend of the United States, but I am not America's man in Iraq."

After Saturday's talks, White House spokesman Tony Snow said of al-Maliki: "He's not America's man in Iraq. The United States is there in a role to assist him. He's the prime minister — he's the leader of the Iraqi people."

Snow said that reports of a rift between the United States and Iraq were wrong and that Bush had full confidence in al-Maliki.

"What you've got in Maliki is a guy who is making decisions. He's making tough decisions, and he's showing toughness and he's also showing political skill in dealing with varying factions within his own country. And both leaders understand the political pressures going on."

Snow said Bush told al-Maliki not to worry about U.S. politics "because we are with you and we are going to be with you."

Al-Suneid, however, said al-Maliki was intentionally using the displeasure of American voters over Bush's handling of the war to strengthen his position.

"It's al-Maliki's chance to get what he wants. It's a chance for al-Maliki to force a better deal for himself," he said.

Al-Suneid said Bush accepted Iraq's position that a renewal of the U.N. mandate for the U.S.-led military force was conditional on swift action to hand full control of the Iraqi army to the Baghdad government and the withdrawal of coalition forces from Iraqi cities and towns when the army is ready to take control.

Bush also agreed to set up a joint military operations room early next year that would give Iraqi authorities a say in the movement of U.S. and Iraqi troops, al-Suneid said. That is meant to head off unannounced raids like one Wednesday in Baghdad that targeted an alleged Shiite death squad leader.

Al-Maliki, who depends heavily on Shiite politicians whose parties have heavily armed militias, complained angrily about the U.S.-backed raid and demanded he be consulted before such operations in the future.

The United States said the death squad leader was on a preapproved list and the raid to capture him did not require specific Iraqi government approval. The man was not caught.

It was not clear whether al-Maliki's tough stance in recent days is a matter of conviction or a bid to bolster support among his domestic constituency — or both.

A joint statement issued after the video conference between al-Maliki and Bush said both sides "are committed to the partnership our two countries and two governments have formed and will work in every way possible for a stable, democratic Iraq and for victory in the war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0087953

It said the two sides agreed to form a working group "to make recommendations on how these goals can be best achieved." It will consist of the U.S. military commander, Gen. George Casey, Khalilzad and Iraq's national security adviser and ministers of defense and interior.

Al-Maliki has grown increasingly prickly as the Americans have pressed him to rein in Shiite militias and crush death squads that have sprung up since a Shiite shrine was bombed by Sunni insurgents in February. Thousands of Sunnis have died in revenge attacks, many under brutal torture.

The Sunnis, particularly disaffected insurgents, have fought back vigorously in a sectarian bloodbath verging on civil war.

The U.S. military on Saturday reported the combat death of a U.S. Marine in Anbar province, raising to 98 the number of U.S. personnel killed in October — the fourth deadliest month for American forces since the war began in March 2003.

Violence also returned to the capital after a relative five-day calm following the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

One person was killed and 35 wounded when a rocket slammed into an outdoor market in Baghdad's turbulent southern neighborhood of Dora, while a bomb in a minibus killed a second person and wounded nine in an eastern district, police said.

Police also found 10 bodies of victims of apparent sectarian violence — seven in several parts of Baghdad and three in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of the capital.

Eleven other people were reported killed in shootings and bomb attacks nationwide.

Iraqi Leader Critical Of U.S. Envoy (WT)

The Washington Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A festering grievance between Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the United States escalated yesterday with Mr. al-Maliki telling President Bush that America's ambassador in Baghdad acts like a viceroy instead of a diplomat.

Hassan al-Suneid, a member of Mr. al-Maliki's inner circle, said a hastily arranged videoconference with the president was needed because issues needed airing at a higher level than with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

Mr. al-Suneid also said the prime minister complained to Mr. Bush that Mr. Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, was treating the Shi'ite Mr. al-Maliki imperiously.

"The U.S. ambassador is not [L. Paul] Bremer. He does not have a free rein to do what he likes. Khalilzad must not behave like Bremer, but rather like an ambassador," Mr. al-Suneid quoted Mr. al-Maliki as telling the president. Mr. Bremer had the power to make laws by decree, many of which are still in force today.

The exchange punctuated one of the bloodiest months since the U.S. invasion.

The military announced yesterday that a Marine died from wounds in Anbar province on Friday, bringing the U.S. death toll so far this month in Iraq to 98, the highest since January 2005.

Since the summer, Iraqis have been dying at a rate of about 3,000 a month, prompting Mr. al-Maliki's government this month to stop releasing body counts to the United Nations.

Mr. Bush's Republican Party faces possible loss of control of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections, with dismay over his Iraq policy a critical factor in voter intentions.

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed talk of a rift between Iraq's leader and the United States.

"There are no strains in the relationship," Mr. Snow told reporters at Andrews Air Force Base after the 50-minute videoconference.

Mr. Snow said that Mr. Bush told Mr. al-Maliki not to worry about U.S. politics "because we are with you, and we are going to be with you."

Yesterday marked the fourth time in a week that Mr. al-Maliki challenged the U.S. handling of the war. The ripostes flowed from an announcement by Mr. Khalilzad on Tuesday that Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to a U.S. plan to set timelines for progress in quelling violence in Iraq.

Mr. al-Maliki, who depends heavily on Shi'ite politicians whose parties have heavily armed militias with links to death squads, complained angrily about the U.S.-backed raid and demanded he be consulted before such operations in the future.

The United States said that the death-squad leader was on a preapproved list and that the raid to capture him did not require specific Iraqi government approval. The man was not caught.

Tipping Point For War's Supporters? (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

In Past Month, Even Stalwarts Have Called for Change in Iraq Policy

As the fighting in Iraq swerved toward civil war in February, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) expressed "a high degree of confidence" that a new government would take charge and that by the end of the year the conflict "won't be the same."

As October opened, Warner returned from Iraq with a far grimmer assessment. "The situation," he said, "is simply drifting sidewise." His judgment gave voice to Republican doubt that had been suppressed in a campaign season. Lawmakers who had vowed to "stay the course" called for change. One GOP senator declared Iraq "on the verge of chaos." By last week, President Bush was saying he too is "not satisfied" and is looking for a fresh approach.

October 2006 may be remembered as the month that the U.S. experience in Iraq hit a tipping point, when the violence flared and shook both the military command in Iraq and the political establishment back in Washington.

Plans to stabilize Baghdad collided with a surge in violence during the holy month of Ramadan. Sectarian revenge killings spread, consuming a town 50 miles from the capital. U.S. officials spoke of setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to take on more responsibility, only to have the Iraqi prime minister call that suggestion election-year grandstanding. Bush compared the situation to the 1968 Tet Offensive -- often seen as a turning point in the Vietnam War -- and urged Americans not to become disillusioned.

"October has been very busy from a standpoint of operations on the ground and certainly back here in Washington," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

DOJ_NMG_0087955

With Iraq again dominating the national dialogue right before key midterm elections, "there's an expectation in the air that after the election, the partisanship and the politically charged environment will dissipate somewhat and people can start looking for ways to work together on this issue," Bartlett said.

Republicans are anxious about what happens in the meantime; polls show wide discontent. "Republicans are responding to the nervousness of the American people," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "People have begun to wonder about the basic premise that the Iraqi people are capable of solving their problems politically."

If October does prove to be a turning point for the Iraq war, historians are likely to point to two events, one in domestic U.S. politics and the other in Iraq.

The first was Warner's visit to Baghdad. As the chairman of Armed Services, a stalwart Bush supporter and a pillar of the Republican establishment, he rattled much of Washington with his dour assessment Oct. 5. If events have not improved in 60 to 90 days, he said, the Bush administration should find a new course. While still opposed to a precipitous troop withdrawal, Warner made clear that staying the course is no longer a viable option.

Warner's comments proved to be the starting gun for a race toward an exit strategy. Other Republicans had nursed similar doubts but kept quiet for fear of giving Democrats ammunition in a tough campaign cycle. Warner's remarks freed them to express their own misgivings.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Republican from the president's state of Texas, began talking about the need for a different approach in Iraq, such as partition. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen, who maintained in September that he would not "second-guess" the war, said that "mistakes have been made, and progress has been far too slow." More Republican candidates called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to be fired.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a strong Bush supporter, was struck that Warner's comments echoed those of the ranking Democrat on Armed Services, Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), who has advocated putting more pressure on the Iraqi government.

"They reminded me of some of the things Senator Levin has been saying for some time," Cornyn said last week. "We fought to allow Iraqis to control their own future, and I'm a little concerned about our making demands on them as if we are an occupying force."

In Iraq, meanwhile, the key moment was the realization by top commanders in mid-October that sending 12,000 U.S. troops back into Baghdad did not have the calming effect that had been hoped for. As Shiite-Sunni tensions erupted in the city, civilian casualties doubled in a matter of months, with 2,660 deaths in September alone.

"Operation Together Forward has made a difference in the focus areas, but has not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said Oct. 19, using the U.S. military name for the Baghdad operation. In other words, the U.S. military had played its ace in the hole -- it had asserted itself in Iraq's most important city -- yet had not been able to improve deteriorating security in the capital.

A Marine colonel said he is seeing a major shift even inside the military. "There's a concern now that there wasn't previously," said the colonel, who remains on active duty and is not authorized to speak publicly on political matters. "Folks that took things at face value in the past are asking more questions."

Searching for a way out, Washington has focused new attention on the work of the Iraq Study Group, a panel of well-connected luminaries led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). Recommendations from the group, once seen as a sop to Congress, are expected in late December or early January and promise to be the first major subject tackled by the members of the next Congress.

People familiar with the group's option papers expect it to recommend either a scaling back of U.S. ambitions in Iraq, making stability rather than democracy the top priority, or, less likely, a slow but steady withdrawal of U.S. forces.

In the wake of Warner's revelation and the unchecked violence in Iraq, Bush's language in discussing the war changed markedly. As late as the end of August, he was still describing his policy as "stay the course." But with Democrats pounding away in campaign advertising, saying he refused to recognize the unfolding disaster in Iraq, the White House officially jettisoned the phrase this month, saying it did not adequately describe the administration's flexible approach.

DOJ_NMG_0087956

"We've never been 'stay the course,' " Bush told an interviewer. The concept will not die that easily, though. On Friday night, Vice President Cheney told reporters traveling with him on Air Force Two that "the United States' ability to stay the course and get the job done is a very, very important piece of business."

As congressional Republicans peeled away from the president, the White House grew more isolated. Debate over a National Intelligence Estimate's conclusion that Iraq had become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists and several books critical of the administration's handling of the war kept interfering with the White House message.

Democrats, once deeply divided over the war, coalesced around the idea of a phased withdrawal and aired television ads on Iraq in most of the competitive races around the country. Republican candidates, on the other hand, started ignoring Karl Rove's advice to talk about the war. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) told an interviewer that "the challenge is to get Americans to focus on pocketbook issues, and not on the Iraq and terror issue."

Other conservatives grew more skeptical that there is anything the United States can now do to fix Iraq. "I don't know what the new course would be," said Richard N. Perle, former head of the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board and an early supporter of the war. "The options are extremely limited now. The new course that's necessary is new Iraqi leadership."

The last full week of October underscored the fitful attempts by the White House to get on top of the situation. U.S. officials announced plans for benchmarks for Iraqis to assume more security duties, but Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said his government had not agreed to any deadlines. Bush called his second news conference in as many weeks to assure the American public that he is "not satisfied" with the way things are going, while still asserting that "absolutely, we're winning."

Inside the White House, officials were glum, trying just to get through the election in hopes that after the rhetoric fades there might be a chance for both parties to fashion a new approach. "I'm not disparaging new ideas; I'm welcoming new ideas," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said in an interview. But, he noted, "no one I know has come up with a silver bullet."

Hadley described the administration's three top priorities: a political agreement among Iraqi sects, enhanced security with Iraqis taking more of the lead and greater international support. "There's an opportunity to try to figure out how to do better," he said. "A lot of it is not a conception issue; it's an execution issue. It's an execution issue for the American government, and it's an execution issue for the Iraqi government."

All the while, in the background was the drumbeat of U.S. deaths in Iraq, with October's toll of 98 so far the worst in a month since January 2005. Iraqi forces have recently paid an even heavier price, with 300 troops dying during the month of Ramadan, the U.S. military said.

A series of grim events on the ground in Iraq deepened fears that the nation is sliding closer to a full-blown civil war. A battle between two towns -- one Shiite, one Sunni -- on opposite banks of the Tigris River earlier in the month epitomized the factors tearing the country apart. A vengeance killing blamed on Sunni Arab insurgents based in the farm hamlet of Duluiyah prompted a killing spree targeting Sunnis across the river in the predominantly Shiite city of Balad. The U.S. military and residents of both Duluiyah and Balad accused the towns' police of taking part in the killings.

Looking for protection, Shiites in Balad turned not to their elected government or to the U.S. military but to Shiite militias, summoning them from Baghdad. By the time the killing ebbed three days later, at least 80 people were dead. Balad was all but empty of Sunni families, which had lived among Shiites for generations.

The militias blamed in many of the Sunni deaths belong to two Shiite religious parties that dominate Iraq's five-month-old government. Maliki, a Shiite, has used his position to block U.S. efforts to crack down on militias. Last week he denounced a U.S.-backed Iraqi raid into Sadr City seeking the most notorious of the death-squad leaders. U.S. officials had not notified Maliki before the raid.

The White House said reports of a rift were overblown, but privately U.S. officials wondered about the Maliki government's competence. Maliki's comments last week underscored a growing divide. "If anyone is responsible for the poor security situation in Iraq," he said, "it is the coalition."

Looming over this deteriorating situation is the fact that, despite the training of 310,000 Iraqi soldiers and police officers -- close to the number once thought necessary to ensure security -- those new forces have not brought calm to the capital and the area around it.

DOJ_NMG_0087957

Experts disagree whether the past month represents the beginning of the end of the U.S. involvement in Iraq. But there was little question among them about whether it will be remembered as a major turning point. "We are at a real crossroads," said Graham, who sits on the Senate Armed Services panel. "Personally," said James Burk, a military expert at Texas A&M University, "I think the 'experiment' . . . is over."

But Dov S. Zakheim, who was a senior Pentagon official under Rumsfeld, said he thinks this is simply the beginning of a new phase in the U.S. effort in Iraq.

"Everyone knows that if we leave Iraq, not only will that country have little hope of regaining any form of stability, we will likely destabilize the entire region," he said. So the current turmoil reflects the "recognition in all policy circles that we are about to enter a new phase."

Iraq And Americans: One Land, Two Worlds (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD

ABU HUSSEIN is a 31-year-old Iraqi who works on an American military base. He used to commute. But last year his life collapsed and now he lives at work.

His story is familiar. He quickly moved his family out of Iraq after his children's doctor and a neighbor, both Shiites, were killed in their Baghdad neighborhood on the same day. His family was denied residency in Jordan, so he moved them back to Iraq, but to a southern city that had no jobs.

Now he sleeps on a cot in the base. He works day and night for two months at a stretch. He counts himself lucky. "The base is the safest place in all of Baghdad," he said.

Last week, an intense debate was taking place in the United States about how long American troops would have to stay in Iraq to keep security. But in the view of many Iraqis, that is something Americans have never been able to offer. And the longer they stay, the less confidence Iraqis have that the Americans will be able to do so. That distrust has hardened over three and a half years, adding ever more distance between two worlds: That of the American soldiers who are trying to do a job here, and that of the Iraqis and the grim realities that they must live with and the Americans try to navigate.

Part of the problem is that the Americans cannot see for themselves how bad things get when they are not around.

No one knows this better than Iraqi workers on bases. Like stowaways from another world, they adopt a kind of American identity. They take names like Joe and Ozzy. They learn how to swear and talk American slang.

These Iraqis know all too well what life is like outside. Abu Hussein tried for years to get them to protect Iraqis coming in and out of the base by shielding the civilian parking lot to hide the license plates from the eyes of Iraqis who hate those who work for Americans. Blast walls were erected only recently. "Everybody knows I'm going to leave from the gate," Abu Hussein said, his face tight with worry. "I have no weapon. I am isolated."

An American soldier, on the other hand, "is in a Humvee with armor and weapons."

Indeed, the divide is so profound that an American private had to dress in full battle armor this month to walk 20 paces outside the gate to an Iraqi employee parking lot in order to pick up a book.

When Americans move through Iraq, they do so like a giant ship cutting through a thick and treacherous sea. They move slowly, displacing the harsh reality on both sides, carving out a trough of safety around them. But after they pass, reality closes back in, in all its sucking, swirling fury.

That reality is terrifying because much of Iraq is a place without rules or laws, in which armed gangs, sometimes dressed as police officers, can come into any house and do exactly as they please.

This broad challenge for the Americans — making security last past the moment the Humvee on patrol rolls away from the house — could be seen last week in even the smallest ways in Ur, a sliver of residential blocks just north of Sadr City, the impoverished Shiite district where unruly militias are strong.

DOJ_NMG_0087958

The Americans began sweeping in late in August, going house to house looking for weapons. It had been more than a year since they had patrolled Ur, and residents were surprised to see them.

The neighborhood was mostly middle class and heavily Shiite, but while the Americans were gone its northeast corner had become the site of brutal executions: Authorities found 90 bodies there in the heat of August, most of them victims of Shiite death squads that had driven into the area from Sadr City.

"They killed openly, they did not hide," said a worker in eastern Ur who said he witnessed as many as 40 daytime executions, over several months, near a shop where he works. An Iraqi Army checkpoint was less than a mile away.

After the sweeps, fewer bodies were found, but the hard part — keeping the area clear of killings — had only just begun.

A deep fear had settled in the neighborhood's northeastern edge, the area closest to the militia stronghold.

At dusk on a recent Sunday, Sgt. Andrew Pokora stood in a courtyard with a nervous Shiite woman. Her husband had spoken to American soldiers before and they had found the conversation useful. It was the third time Americans had come to the house in recent weeks.

"What do you need from him?" asked the wife, her voice tense. "Every day Americans are coming here. The neighbors are asking why."

The neighbors were suspicious because the family had moved only recently from a hard-line Sunni neighborhood, Ameriya, from which Shiites were being driven out. They had not yet proved to their neighbors that they could be trusted, even though a sticker portraying a Shiite cleric was stuck to their battered white door.

Outside that door spread a vast expanse of dirt fields and garbage where gangs of men who like the cleric move. They call themselves the army of the Mahdi, a Shiite saint, and are known as brutal killers.

"Danger for us, for me, for my husband!" the woman told the Americans, standing firm as other family members wandered out into the small darkening courtyard. "They will say we are your client."

Sergeant Pokora, a bright, young soldier from Connecticut, relented. He wrote down the man's telephone number, thinking it best to call the husband later.

Even in safer areas, engaging Iraqis on the topic of their lives is difficult. Earlier that afternoon, the sergeant had sunk into a spongy couch in the living room of a housewife in Ur, trying to gain her confidence. "Do you feel safe when you see the police?" he asked, through a teenage interpreter.

She replied in a quiet voice, nodding slightly. Three tiny children with saucer eyes stared.

"She says she feels happy when she sees them," a translator told him.

"Ask her how she feels when American troops come through her neighborhood."

Another phrase in Arabic.

"Happy," the translator said.

The sergeant smiled and squinted in mock skepticism.

"Tell her to be honest," he said. "It's Ramadan."

And he didn't give up. He urged her to come to an American base if she had a tip. He said they would pay for it.

The Iraqi and American worlds in Iraq were not always quite so separate. In 2003, Iraqis lined up at the gate of the Rustimiya base waiting their turn to ask for jobs. Now the road is empty, with discarded plastic bags swirling in the wind.

American soldiers in northern Baghdad went to a public swimming pool shortly after the invasion in 2003. The former head of the Olympic Committee, Ahmed al-Hijiya, tried to organize a soccer game between an American military unit and a semi-professional Iraqi team earlier this year, but requirements for blast walls torpedoed the suggestion. In July, Mr. Hijiya was kidnapped from his office in central Baghdad. He and 23 other victims, 20 of them guards, are still missing, according to the Olympic Committee's office manager.

Today, the approach to the base is empty and ominous: A two-story watch tower peers down at anyone seeking entry, the guards shouting barely intelligible words in English. Guns are pointed. Nerves are keyed up.

Earlier this month, four teenagers who had worked as cleaners in Rustamiya were killed by gunmen who followed them to their homes in Nahariya, a suburb near the base, a worker who knew them said. A translator was killed the same week.

On a recent Friday morning, an Iraqi man wearing glasses stood alone near the highway outside the base, staring at approaching cars, as if he was remembering license plates.

In Iraqi Villages, Troops See Strides And A Big Challenge (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

MUSTAFAR, Iraq -- The smell of baking bread wafted over the dusty central square as children clamored to get closer to the U.S. troops and their hulking armored vehicles. Lt. John Sirhal tried fruitlessly to keep order among a group of boys waiting for M&Ms, while Capt. Adam Sawyer calmly walked up to businessmen hawking their wares.

Samir Hassan, a 53-year-old shopkeeper, said he was happy with the U.S. forces who have maintained peace around his home. But the Iraqi police who have set up a checkpoint at the entrance to Mustafar have made the residents uneasy, he said, as have the Shiite militias that operate just miles away.

"We feel safe here," Hassan said, waving his arm at the throngs of people in the streets on a recent day. "But now we can't go to Baghdad. We need to have security in Iraq. The government has no control, and I don't trust the Iraqi forces."

It is in small villages like these that U.S. soldiers say they are making their biggest strides but also face their biggest challenges. Commanders in Iraq say they can win any battle against armed insurgents and conduct any military operation successfully, but persuading Iraqis to believe in Iraq could end up being the most difficult battle in this war.

There are places in Iraq where U.S. troops are greeted with suspicion. And there are others where they confront grave danger. More than 90 American servicemen have been killed in hostile action across Iraq this month.

But in some of the small towns that ring the southern edge of Baghdad, the situation is quite different. For many residents, the daily dose of roadside bombs and gunshots that plague the capital is glimpsed only on television. Here, U.S. forces work to provide more electricity, to ensure water supplies are clean and to fix roads. The locals appear to appreciate it, but they also appear to genuinely fear what could happen if U.S. forces leave.

Lt. Col. Mark Suich, commander of the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment, is on the leading edge of the campaign to win over a swath of land south of Baghdad that includes Mustafar. He said the key to success in Iraq is to hand over control to the Iraqis, but that doing so could take time.

"Ultimately, they need to see the government functioning, especially in the area of security," said Suich, 42, of Greenville, Pa. "It's a long process to make people change their minds. It's stuff you can't do overnight."

In Mustafar, residents are just beginning to trust the Iraqi police, a ragtag group that periodically makes the short trek from its checkpoint into town to buy lunch or gifts. So far, no one has tried to sneak weapons past the checkpoint, and there has been no violence in the village for weeks.

It has also been peaceful in nearby Abu Hillan, a tiny collection of houses of Sunni Arabs along a strip of dirt road. Residents there recently teamed with a neighboring town and with U.S. soldiers to tap into an electrical substation, boosting their daily availability of electricity from about two hours to more than 20.

"We're happier now," said Othman Ibrahim, 23, a fireplug of a farmer with coarse hands and soft eyes. "We like the U.S. soldiers because they came in and made things better. But we don't trust the Iraqi army, and while there are still militias, we're never going to trust them."

Ibrahim also has difficulty trusting the government. Though he likes the idea of democracy, he said, he isn't sure what difference it has made or will make.

"We are farmers, and we know nothing about democracy," he said, shaking his head. "We see no changes because of it."

Sawyer, who commands the regiment's C Troop and spends much of his time working to improve services in the region, said it could be years before large-scale improvements are made.

"I can't fix electricity overnight, but we can come in and do the little things, and those little things do matter," Sawyer said, shortly after surveying a vacant building he hopes to turn into a medical clinic. "You will gain more from these things than you can possibly gain from using your weapon. It's all about taking baby steps."

DOJ_NMG_0087960

Suich acknowledges that his squadron is fighting two main battles, one with armed insurgents and one with the idea of a new Iraq. He said he plans to build locals' trust of Iraqi troops by gradually dispatching them on joint patrols with their U.S. counterparts.

"We have to be patient, we have to be persistent, and we have to go back to them and go back to them," Suich said.

At a compound for Special Operations forces near Baghdad, civil affairs officers are working to speed things up by offering medical services and interest-free business loans.

On a recent afternoon, dozens of families lined up to see doctors and to receive gifts such as shoes, school supplies and board games.

"There's no doubt in my mind that we have terrorists coming through the gate here, and we help them, too," said Maj. Stephen Przybelski, a civil affairs officer from Green Bay, Wis. "Maybe we'll turn someone. I don't know how many we can turn, but if we can turn one or two, how many people's lives have we saved?"

One of the clinic's main forces is Dr. Turki, an Iraqi American who lives in Centreville, Va., and returned to Iraq to help her country. Turki, who didn't want to give her full name for security reasons, said she treats many Iraqis who are afraid to be seen with U.S. forces but really want their help.

She said she has high hopes.

"It's so hard these days, and I feel so sad for what is going on here," she said. "I wish one day to open my eyes and see peace all over Iraq."

After Sirhal, the lieutenant, handed out candy to children in Mustafar, he paused and looked out over the villagers who were smiling and waving.

"This really does make me proud," said Sirhal, 27, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "You see how they are here? It could be like this everywhere. We just have to be patient."

Iraqis See The Little Things Fade Away In War's Gloom (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 28 — The things the women missed were almost too small to notice at first.

Simple numbers and dates began to elude their memories. They were hugging their children less. Past pleasures, eating and listening to music, began to feel flat. They were shouting at their husbands like army commanders.

Small as they seemed, these scraps of life were the effects of the war as discussed by four Iraqi women on a cloudy Saturday afternoon in a women's center in Baghdad.

Their stories began with a familiar theme: the shrinking lives of middle-class families in the capital. Social clubs have emptied out. Weddings have been sparsely attended. But as the circle has become smaller, and as they focus intensely on just staying alive, they said, even the basics are being stripped away.

"All the elements of society have been dismantled," said Fawsia Abdul al-Attiya, a sociologist and a professor at Baghdad University. "You are afraid because you are a woman, a man, a Sunni, a Shiite, a Kurd.

"All these things start to change society."

In a room in the Amal Women's Network that was strewn with remnants of a morning meeting — a half-eaten piece of cake, an orange peel, some crumpled tissues — the women talked about the changes forced on their lives by that fear.

One of the women, a senior employee in an Iraqi ministry that is now run by religious Shiites, recalled recently walking through the gate of her office building with several colleagues, two wearing form-fitting dresses with bare heads and a third in a hijab, when security guards pulled the third woman aside.

"They told her to tell her friends to be more cautious," she said, leaning out of her high-backed chair. She asked that her name not be used because it would be recognized. She has received two threats on her life.

Her own office was a measure of just how far relations between Iraqis have unraveled. She has worked with her colleagues for 21 years, but in the past year, strange new alliances and rivalries have emerged. In business trips abroad, lists of those permitted to go were compiled along sectarian lines. Shiites chose Shiites. Sunnis chose Sunnis.

DOJ_NMG_0087961

Basma al-Khateeb, a 47-year-old mother of three, shook her head sadly at the familiar tale. "We never dreamed it would be like this," she said.

Ms. Khateeb, who runs a program for youths at the center, said she missed the very simple pleasures that gave life its texture.

"Walking. Riding a bicycle down the street. We gave up so many things we used to do," she said. "Now we call them accessories."

Private lives have been dented and squeezed into uncomfortable positions. Houda, a 40-year-old layout designer for a magazine in Baghdad who would not give her last name, said the violence had cast her and her husband in the roles of emergency room doctors, shouting orders and performing urgent tasks. Little time remains for intimacy. The last time she remembers feeling happy together was a year ago.

"Something has changed," she said. "There is a kind of dryness between us now."

One conversation that comes up daily is about leaving Iraq, but there are no answers.

It is a daily struggle not to shout at her two teenage girls, one that she usually loses. She has stopped hugging and kissing them, a strange byproduct of extreme stress, she said. Recently, her 15-year-old called to say she missed her, though they had not been apart.

"I feel surrounded by threats," she said. "When I go to work. When they go to school."

As the violence tears the fabric of society, breaking communities and long-established social networks, even peoples' thinking is muted. Plans for the future are too painful, too breakable, many Baghdad residents say, and so their thoughts stay fixed on the immediate.

"The events are too big to comprehend, and the mind stops thinking," Ms. Attiya said. The result, she said, is a distracted population with vastly diminished ambitions.

With jobs too difficult or too dangerous to find in many cases, young people in particular have put aside their dreams. In such an environment, the allure of populist leaders and militias offering protection, a sense of purpose and belonging has become compelling.

For the women — secular, middle class, employed and part of an increasingly slender slice of Iraq's population — the effects have been on a more personal scale.

Many reported a new difficulty with memory, particularly of numbers and dates.

For Houda, it happened in front of a television set. She sat down to turn on her favorite Egyptian television show a few days ago, and for several minutes she could not remember the channel.

"It was a blankness," she said. "My brain is loaded. It is not active like before."

The feeling is particularly intense for those who have lost a close relative, especially a child. Haifa Hassan, an English teacher whose 12-year-old son was kidnapped while he walked home from school this summer and then brutally killed, has a face like a mask. She finds it hard to smile, and when she does, it is more a grimace.

She has trouble sleeping at night. She tries to nap, but when her husband enters the bedroom, her eyes are often open, staring ahead.

"My son dies every day," she said, recalling his small body and neck with rope marks. She left Iraq with her husband and remaining son this month.

Life has become so hard that many Iraqis find it too painful to partake of the world outside. Houda said she can no longer stomach movies, bright things that show varnished, perfect lives. She has not watched a movie all the way through in more than a year.

Life was also hard under Saddam Hussein, the women pointed out. Plans were equally impossible to build. But the basic fabric of life, visiting family, attending weddings and funerals, was for the most part intact. Now Iraqis are letting go even of those parts.

The ministry employee sat at the table looking agitated. She attended the funeral for the mother of a good friend this month. The family was Christian, large and respected in the community, and before the war, such a funeral would draw hundreds.

Instead, 10 people came to the church service, and only one, the dead woman's son-in-law, risked following the casket out to the cemetery. Even her daughter stayed home.

Those who escape to Jordan or Syria or the Kurdish enclave in northern Iraq describe stumbling around for days, extremely disoriented.

One of the women recalled that when she saw her children in a mall in Jordan, she was overcome by a feeling of indescribable relief. The lights were bright. Her children were safe, and drinking fruit shakes. But they were also melancholy, tinged with the memory of what had been lost.

Hana Edwar, the director of the women's center, said she brought a group of young people to a scenic lakeside resort in Iraqi Kurdistan in September. When a group gathered there for prayer, one young man joked that he did not need to pray because he was already in heaven.

"Really, you feel how much we miss these things," Ms. Edwar said. "How much we miss them."

A year ago, there was still so much hope, she said, "but now the light is so weak."

A stanza by her favorite poet, Muhammad al-Jawahiri, runs constantly in her mind.

"Oh open-handed Tigris!" it says. "Our ambitions have fallen so low that even the simplest among them is not promised."

This Is Baghdad. What Could Be Worse? (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

There was an almost forgettable exchange earlier this month in the Iraqi National Assembly, itself on the fringe of relevance in today's disintegrating Iraq. Lawmakers debated whether legislation should be submitted to a committee to determine if it was compatible with Islam. Ideas were put forth, as well as criticism. Why not a committee to determine whether legislation endorses democratic principles? one asked. In stepped Mahmoud Mashadani, the assembly's speaker, to settle the dispute.

"Any law or decision that goes against Islam, we'll put it under the kundara!" he thundered.

"God is greatest!" lawmakers shouted back, in a rare moment of agreement between Sunni and Shiite Muslims.

Kundara means shoe, and the bit of bluster by Mashadani said a lot about Baghdad today.

It had been almost a year since I was in the Iraqi capital, where I worked as a reporter in the days of Saddam Hussein, the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, and the occupation, guerrilla war and religious resurgence that followed. On my return, it was difficult to grasp how atomized and violent the 1,250-year-old city has become. Even on the worst days, I had always found Baghdad's most redeeming quality to be its resilience, a tenacious refusal among people I met over three years to surrender to the chaos unleashed when the Americans arrived. That resilience is gone, overwhelmed by civil war, anarchy or whatever term could possibly fit. Baghdad now is convulsed by hatred, paralyzed by suspicion; fear has forced many to leave. Carnage its rhythm and despair its mantra, the capital, it seems, no longer embraces life.

"A city of ghosts," a friend told me, her tone almost funereal.

The commotion in the streets -- goods spilling across sidewalks, traffic snarled under a searing sun -- once prompted the uninitiated to conclude that Baghdad was reviving. Of course, they were seeing the city through a windshield, the often angry voices on the streets inaudible. Today, with traffic dwindling, stores shuttered and streets empty by nightfall, that conceit no longer holds.

Even the propaganda, once ubiquitous and often incongruous, is gone. One piece I recalled from two years ago: a map of Iraq divided into three colored bands. In white, it read, "Progress." In red, "Iraq." In white again, "Prosperity." The promises are now more modest: "However strong the wind," reads a new poster of a woman clutching her child, "it will pass." More indicative of the mood, perhaps, was one of the old banners still hanging. Faded and draped over a building scarred with craters from the invasion, it was an ad for the U.S.-funded Iraqi network, al-Iraqiya. In Arabic, its slogan reads, "Prepare your eyes for more."

As I spoke to friends, some for the first time in more than a year, that was their fear: more of the kundara.

"When anyone is against you, when anyone has differences with me, I will put a kundara in his mouth, I will shove a kundara down his throat, I will hit him with a kundara, and so on," another friend told me.

"We live in a kundara culture today."

I had first met Karima Salman during the U.S. invasion. She was a stout Shiite Muslim matriarch with eight children, living in a three-room apartment in the working-class district of Karrada. Trash was piled at her entrance, a dented, rusted steel gate perched along a sagging brick sidewalk. When I visited last year, the street, still one of the safer ones in Baghdad, exuded a veneer of normalcy. Makeshift markets overflowed with goods piled on rickety stands: socks imported from China, T-shirts from Syria and stacks of shoes, sunglasses and lingerie. Down the street were toys: plastic guns, a Barbie knockoff in a black veil, and a pirate carrying an AK-47 and a grenade. There was a "Super Mega Heavy Metal Fighter" action figure and a doll that, when squeezed, played "It's a Small World."

On this day, the metal stands were empty, as were the streets.

"Praise God," Karima said as I asked how she was. In a moment, her smile faded as she realized the absurdity of her words. "Of course, it's not good," she said, shaking her head. "There's nothing that's ever happened like what's happening in Iraq."

On June 23, 2005, three car bombs detonated in Karrada, outside her home, wrecking the Abdul-Rasul Ali mosque and spraying shrapnel that sliced into the forearm of one of her five daughters, Hiba. Friends at school nicknamed her "Shrapnel Hiba." Two months ago, yet another bomb hurled glass through their window, cutting the head of Hiba's twin sister, Duaa. Four stitches sealed the wound. Over that time, Karima lost her job as a maid at the Palm Hotel, where she had earned about $33 a month.

"People are too scared to come," she said matter of factly.

Next to her sat her son Mohammed. During the invasion, Mohammed, an ex-convict, had joined a motley unit of a dozen men patrolling Baghdad's streets as part of the Baath Party militia. Now he had entered the ranks of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia loyal to a young cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr, and blamed for many of today's sectarian killings in Baghdad. Karima's son-in-law Ali had been an officer in the American-equipped police force, earning $300 a month. He quit after receiving a death threat. Now he, too, had joined the Mahdi Army.

"Not all of them are good," Karima told me, casting a glance at her son.

Stocky and a little surly, Mohammed smiled. "Who else is going to protect Iraq?" he asked.

They debated the causes of the violence that, these days, is the topic of almost every conversation. Radical Sunnis, the Americans, Iranian agents, other militias. "Even the Egyptians," Karima offered. "And the Sudanese," Mohammed added.

"Brothers are killing their brothers," she said.

Stories poured forth: a bomb amputating the arm of a 10-year-old neighbor; another killing Marwan, the barber.

"If they brought the Israelis, the Jews, and they ruled Iraq, it would be better," said Karima, her face framed by a black veil. Sunlight bathed the room; electricity, as usual, was cut off. "It would be a million times better than a Sunni, a million times better than a Shiite."

Her first grandchild, 2-month-old Fahd, sat next to her. His expression was rare in Baghdad: eyes expectant, fearless.

"Is it not a pity to bring a baby in a world like this?" she asked. "It's a shame."

Her eldest daughter, Fatima, looked on.

"One-third of us are dying, one-third of us are fleeing and one-third of us will be widows," she said.

"This is Iraq," Karima added.

The last time I had visited Faruq Saad Eddin, he and his wife, Muna, had argued over whether their eldest son should have left the country. We sat in Jihad, a neighborhood so dangerous now that a stranger risks death by entering it. A generator droned in the background; occasional bomb blasts thundered in the distance, probably homemade mines targeting U.S. patrols. An urbane former diplomat, Faruq had been upset. He worried about what would become of his ancient land if its capable fled.

"You can't just cut out and run away," he told me. "This is our country and sooner or later our children will come back. The resilience of the people, that's what 11,000 years means," he said. "Someone who has 11,000 years, 100 years to lose here or there is not that much."

On April 17, Faruq and Muna left Iraq at the insistence of their son, who had paid a year's rent for an apartment in Jordan. A month later, a car bomb detonated outside their Baghdad home, shattering the windows in the room where we once had shared bitter coffee.

DOJ_NMG_0087964

On a cool morning in the Amman neighborhood of Umm al-Summaq, Faruq shook his head at the arbitrariness of fate.

"We would have been killed, no doubt about it," he said.

"We are all stranded, here and there, Iraqis," he added.

A friend once compared the elderly who are reluctant to leave Baghdad to the blind. Take them away from the familiarity of their home, garden and street, and they become lost and disoriented. Faruq has sought new routines: morning strolls, e-mails to friends, a voracious appetite for news and late-night updates on his favorite baseball team, the St. Louis Cardinals. His apartment overlooked the rolling hills of Amman, glowing in the morning's soft sun; his granddaughter Mayasa played giddily next to him with a stuffed toy.

"I should feel happy," he said.

He shook his head again, a gesture that meant he wasn't.

"We have a heavy heart, really," he said after a few moments of silence. "Just knowing what's happening makes us grieve."

I had come to know Wamidh Nadhme in 2002, before the invasion. A professor of political science at Baghdad University, he was a forthright voice in those tense, uneasy days when Hussein was still in power. He tried to speak with complete honesty despite the possible consequences of doing so in a police state. With an ever-present Dunhill cigarette, he would slowly field questions back then, reasoning out every intricate response, surrounded by his French-style furniture, worn Persian carpets and a framed piece of papyrus from Egypt, where he had spent time in exile as a young activist. But on this visit, reason eluded him, as did explanation.

"I find myself unable to understand what's going on," he said.

Wamidh had settled into what he called "withdrawal." He still visited the university once a week, but Baghdad was simply too dangerous to venture outside. After nightfall, the streets of his neighborhood of Adhamiya look like they might an hour or so before dawn: dark, without traffic, and menacing. As we talked, helicopters rumbled overhead. Gunfire burst almost continuously.

"You feel like the country is exploding," he said.

We traded stories. One I had heard from a friend: Insurgents stopped a driver at a checkpoint. They opened his trunk. "Why do you have a spare tire?" the insurgent asked solemnly. "You don't have trust in God?"

Well into 2005, Wamidh has bristled at the notion of a sectarian divide, even as the very geography of Baghdad began to transform into Shiite and Sunni halves divided by the Tigris River. Like many Iraqis, he blamed the Americans for naively viewing the country solely through that sectarian prism before the war, then forging policies that helped make it that way afterward. He ran through other "awful mistakes": the carnage unleashed by Sunni insurgents affiliated with al-Qaeda, the assassination of a Shiite ayatollah in 2003 who may have bridged differences, the devolution of Sadr's movement today into armed, revenge-minded mobs.

As Wamidh finished, he flashed his customary modesty. "Perhaps you could correct me?" he offered.

I asked him whether it would become worse if the American military withdrew.

He looked at me for a moment without saying anything, as though he were a little confused.

"What could be worse?" he asked, knitting his brow.

I saw Wamidh again a week later, and the question had lingered with him. "I sometimes wonder what I would do if I were the Americans," he said over a traditional Ramadan dinner. His answer seemed to hurt him. "I have no idea, really."

"It's like a volcano that has erupted. How do you stop that?"

On April 9, 2003, Firdaus Square became the lasting image of the U.S. entry into Baghdad. In its center was a metal statue of Hussein in a suit, his arm outstretched in socialist realist fashion. Like an arena of spectators, columns of descending height encircled him, each bearing the initials "S.H." on their cupolas. By early afternoon that day, hundreds of Iraqis swarmed around the statue with one task in mind: bring it down. It marked the fall. A year later, amid uprisings by Sunni insurgents in Fallujah and Sadr's militia in Baghdad and the south, it spoke of occupation. The square was deserted, guarded by U.S. tanks whose barrels read, "Beastly Boy" and "Bloodlust." Soldiers, edgy, had orders to shoot anyone with a weapon. At times, music blared over speakers on a Humvee.

One song: "Ring of Fire," by Johnny Cash.

As I stood in Firdaus Square this day, after invasion, liberation and occupation, I wondered what word described Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0087965

"This is a civil war now," Harith Abdel-Hamid, a psychiatrist, had told me, trying to diagnose the madness. "When you see hundreds of people killed every day, corpses of people tortured in the streets every day, what else does it mean?"

"Call it what you will," he said, "but it is a civil war."

Perhaps. But I felt as though I was witnessing something more: the final, frenzied maturity of once-inchoate forces unleashed more than three years ago by the invasion. There was civil war-style sectarian killing, its echoes in Lebanon a generation ago. Alongside it were gangland turf battles over money, power and survival; a raft of political parties and their militias fighting a zero-sum game; a raging insurgency; the collapse of authority; social services a chimera; and no way forward for an Iraqi government ordered to act by Americans who themselves are still seen as the final arbiter and, as a result, still depriving that government of legitimacy.

Civil war was perhaps too easy a term, a little too tidy.

I looked out on the square. On one side were rows of concrete barricades and barbed wire, having faded almost organically into the landscape. In another direction, a billboard read: "Terrorism has no religion." Across the street, a poster portraying Iraqi police pleaded: "We are the heroes fighting for the sake of Baghdad." In the middle of the square, on the stone perch where Hussein's statue once stood, were torn scraps of other posters: "Your voice," "the nation," "patriotism," "dialogue," "building the future." The words were isolated, without context, like fragments of a clay tablet.

Sirens soon pierced the square. Two armed police escorts, headed in opposite directions, rushed along the street. Each frantically waved at the other to pull over. Guns dangling from the window, they fired volleys into the air to intimidate each other.

In time, the one with fewer rifles and fewer men let the other pass. They were playing by the rules of the kundara.

In the square, Salam Ahmed sat with a friend, Saad Nasser, under the statue, looking out at the scene.

"They died under Saddam, and they're dying now," Salam said.

Unshaven, wearing a baseball cap, Saad looked at the ground. He was grim, angry and dejected.

"No one can stop it but God," he said. "Only God has the power."

Iraq: Army Has Al-Zarqawi's Cameraman (AP)

AP, October 29, 2006

Iraq's Defense Ministry said Saturday that the Iraqi army captured a man thought to be the personal cameraman for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the slain leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, the country's most feared terrorist group.

Spokesman Mohammed al-Askari told al-Iraqiyah television that Khalid al-Hayani was detained in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

He declined to say when the capture occurred or give al-Hayani's nationality, saying that could hinder future operations against terrorists. He said videotapes and documents were found in al-Hayani's possession but did not describe their contents.

The Jordanian-born al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. airstrike June 7 in Diyala, had appeared in several videos posted on militant Internet sites.

One clip often played on Middle Eastern TV news channels showed him clad in black and firing a machine gun. An earlier one purported to show al-Zarqawi with his face covered, speaking to the camera before he slit the throat of a Western hostage.

The Bomb Squad (WP)

By Whitney Terrell

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Their job: Hunt down and disarm the explosive booby traps that kill more Americans than any other weapon. Try not to die doing it.

1ST LT. NATE RAWLINGS IS STANDING IN THE CAMP LIBERTY MOTOR POOL, just west of Baghdad, trying to figure out why a NASCAR track dryer should be welded to one of his minesweeping trucks. In such situations, Rawlings -- who is 6-2, 230 pounds -- resembles an offensive lineman who has been asked to dance ballet. His brow furrows, his comic-book square chin dips with respectful curiosity. But he'd like to make sure that this step is really necessary. "What happens if [it's] hit with shrapnel?" he asks the Asymmetric Warfare Group man.

DOJ_NMG_0087966

The Asymmetric Warfare Man -- who has what I can only hope is an irrational fear that if I use his name, insurgents will go to America and hunt down his family -- bites his lip. A retired officer, he has his web belt cinched so tight that it acts as a corset, flaring out his rib cage. He's here to help the Army combat unconventional weapons by inventing contraptions such as the dryer, which is supposed to blow dirt off of buried bombs. Also, his wife kicked him out. ("Go!" is what he remembers her saying. "You've been wanting to since Day One of the war. You'll hate yourself if you don't.")

"This gas can, okay, it sits right here?" The Asymmetric Warfare Man squats beside the dryer, which resembles a lawn mower engine bolted to a jet turbine bolted to an elbow of air-conditioning duct. He taps its exposed gas can, and continues. Maybe if Rawlings mounted some fire retardant next to the gas can, it would powder in a blast? Render the fuel inert? And then act as a fire retardant for the whole thing? "That's not too bad," the Asymmetric Warfare Man declares, gaining momentum. "Whaddya think?"

"I don't like it," Rawlings says.

Neither do I, given that I'm going to be riding in one of these minesweeping trucks tomorrow. The shrapnel Rawlings mentions is an all-too-likely possibility, considering the 25,000 improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, that have been aimed at American troops since the war in Iraq began, severing limbs and crushing the skulls of U.S. soldiers and journalists alike. It doesn't help that Rawlings's soldiers -- with whom I am embedded -- are the leading edge of a $6.1 billion Pentagon effort to win the war against roadside bombings in Iraq.

They're IED hunters. It's their job to find the bombs that the insurgents plant. It's Rawlings's job to make sure they don't get blown up trying.

"When I first started," Rawlings shouts as the dryer revs up for a demonstration, "I used to sit by the radio 14 hours a day. I'd stay till 4 in the morning, whatever it took, listening to my guys out on patrol until I was sure they'd made it home okay."

Rawlings isn't supposed to worry this much. Part of the Pentagon's spending has paid for specially armored trucks -- such as the RG-31 we've been inspecting -- designed to protect his soldiers from IED blasts. On the other hand, as we drive back to his headquarters, we pass another unit's RG-31: Its engine compartment and four-foot-tall front tires are gone; the ballistic windows in its cab and armored bed are spiderwebbed from an IED attack that wounded two.

"Yeah, well," Rawlings says. "That vehicle looked a lot better when we first towed it in. People have been stripping parts from it."

It's hard to tell whether he's reassuring himself or me.

It's even harder to try to bridge the gulf between Rawlings's language -- this war's now-familiar lexicon of "flaks" and "mortar pits" and scouts who disappear in a "fine red mist" -- and what I know of his life as a history major at Princeton University, where he graduated in 2004. A "big, beefy rugger player from Chattanooga" -- in the words of his writing professor, John McPhee -- Rawlings was the kind of romantic enthusiast that I remember emulating when I attended Princeton in the early '90s. In addition to rugby, he wrestled and acted as the social chair of Tiger Inn, a notoriously rowdy club, while at the same time studying with historian Sean Wilentz and researching a thesis on a Confederate ancestor in Tennessee. Rawlings also considered military service a family responsibility, and, following in the footsteps of his uncle and grandfather, who fought in Vietnam and WWII, respectively, he joined ROTC three weeks before 9/11. That decision has led him to a desk in this plywood-floored tactical operations center, or TOC, surrounded by soldiers from E Company, 1st Battalion, 22nd Infantry's Ironclaw team. His deployment didn't kill his romantic streak -- in an e-mail last winter, he described his first firefight by writing, "Teddy Roosevelt would have found that engagement rather sporty" -- but after six months in Iraq, that part of him seems to be struggling against the messiness of the fight against IEDs.

Until recently, he tells me, most IED patrols were done on foot -- a process that often involved uncovering bombs by hand. When I express disbelief, Rawlings cites the experiences of Sgt. Willard Peterson, who is sitting in a dusty leather chair five feet away from us.

"Effective but dangerous" is Peterson's verdict on this method, delivered in the same tone that he has already used to tell me that Army life is "slightly incompatible" with his Mormon upbringing.

"I lost a lot of friends like that," Peterson says, describing how, during a foot patrol, one friend decided to search for bombs beside a wall covered with anti-American graffiti. He found one. "It was an ambush," Peterson explains. "Blew that wall up and killed him."

Despite his Ivy League background, Rawlings is clearly at home in the ramshackle confines of the TOC, which serves as a clubhouse for the soldiers who live in rows of blindingly white trailers out back. He can be found there at all hours, and is always willing to stop what he's doing and engage in discussions on the value of the energy drink Rip It ("That stuff will keep you up forever"), evaluations of insurgents' seized weapons ("What's that, a flintlock musket?") or mildly didactic history lessons ("What is unique about Harry S Truman's name? His middle initial doesn't need a period after it"). The prevailing mood of the place is a half-goofy, half-gallows humor -- for platoon assignments, Rawlings has written FIND BOMBS, BLOW UP BOMBS on the dry erase board behind his head -- that I recognize from the hunting clubs I grew up with.

This afternoon, as Peterson calmly recites the multiple ways that an IED can be triggered and, thus, kill, Rawlings launches into a spirited defense -- against withering remarks from skeptics -- of a French movie whose director, he claims, "is supposed to be the next Hitchcock." Meanwhile, he's fixing a torn cardboard cutout used to stencil E Company's numbers on the Ironclaw vehicles, and shouting modifications to Peterson's lecture -- "The worst thing the insurgents do is put the bombs out right after our trucks go by" -- through its panels. Then a call crackles over the radio, and its 20-year-old operator shouts out: "Hey, they found a cache -- the infantry patrol. They got anti-tank mines, rockets, ball bearings, cellphones!"

All the makings for an IED.

And that, of course, is where my hunting club analogy fails. Because Ironclaw teams are really being hunted, every bit as much as they are doing the hunting.

The company's commander, Capt. Samuel Olan, strides out of his office to plot the weapons caches on a glossy aerial map of western Baghdad, where E Company began patrolling a month ago. Things have been pretty quiet. But the discovery of these new weapons stockpiles, combined with a recent order to repaint his Ironclaw trucks -- and thus cover the markings of the more experienced unit his men have replaced -- tells Olan that the honeymoon is about to end.

"They're going to give us a welcome party," he says. "Because they know -- especially now that we're putting new numbers on the vehicles. They think, 'These guys are here from the States. They don't know anything.' It's like in high school -- you see the new kid and say, 'Let's go fight him!'"

Fortunately, the man who ushers me out of Camp Liberty's gates the next morning hardly qualifies as a new kid. At 24, Sgt. Kristopher Tate is on his second tour in Iraq, and yet his face remains fresh and animated -- a young Sugar Ray Leonard, if the champ had also fancied gold teeth. Tate's looks have gotten him a lot of attention from women who work at the bases surrounding E Company's headquarters. But what he'd wanted to be was a ballplayer, a center fielder. "My dream stopped because I went to a small school," he told me. "LaPoynor High School in Larue, Texas. Nobody scouted me."

Except the Army.

Now a career soldier, Tate leads the RG-31 in which I've been assigned to ride -- and the convoy behind it -- with the casual confidence of the athlete he used to be. "You got something?" he shouts up at his gunner, whose tan boots are dancing nervously on the gunner's platform beside my seat.

The gunner, Pfc. Jeffrey McGorvin drops down in a squat. He's about 5-4 -- too short to use the .50-caliber's sling seat -- Jersey-accented and apple-cheeked.

"There's this white rock with wires coming off the top," he says.

"Keep going," Tate tells his driver who has (in my opinion) reasonably hit the brakes. "Even if that is an IED, we got to set up security. Gonna have to pass it, anyway." Until this moment, I've been using Tate's vehicle as an armored tour bus and gawking at the Iraqi countryside. That's what the RG-31 is designed to be. From the outside, it resembles a cross between a covered pickup and a Land Rover. But its great tactical advantages are the spacious, shatterproof windows that wrap the cab and the armored back bed, where Tate and I sit in air-conditioned comfort next to a cooler of Gatorade. The soldiers inside -- the "window lickers," as they're called -- have a 360-degree view of the roadway, marred only by the matte black circles of gun ports and the occasional divot left by an AK-47 round. The day is sunny and beautiful, the roads are clear, the soldiers seem relaxed (though later they explain that they were unnerved by the lack of traffic, which often precedes an IED attack) and, as I gawk, I've been trying to describe the territory that my country is spending more than $300 billion to pacify. If you ignore the palm trees, much of it resembles western Kansas -- dry, distant plains, fields of irrigated corn and wheat, white-green stands of trees shimmering along the waterways -- which is a disappointment, because, for that kind of money, I think Kansas would've come along quietly.

But that's just in the rural areas. The rest, the gutted industrial ruins, the cinder-block strip malls, the apocalyptic fields of pureed brick where U.S. forces have bombed something, all of this is much more difficult to define. From house to house the scenery radically shifts, as if someone were channel-surfing through different worlds. Shaded, landscaped mansions bunkered with parked Mercedes share blocks with goat herders and thatch-roofed huts; in the towns, the Iraqis stare poker-faced, dressed in white robes and oil-stained mechanics' jumpsuits alike.

For the last half-hour, I've almost forgotten about IEDs. "That's what we're looking for," Tate says. "Something different. Something that doesn't fit."

Tate points over my shoulder to a mundane landscape of dusty grass along a highway that is backed by a canal and then a raked hayfield in which a flock of pigeons has landed to eat. No ominous music plays; there's no sound, beyond the grind of the RG's transmission and Tate's measured breathing. And then I notice a tiny white rock with a pair of wires drifting out of it and burrowing into the grass. "All right, let's do an interrogation," Tate says as the RG-31 speeds up, fleeing the object's theoretical blast range. In Army-speak, bombs are interrogated just as insurgents are; the difference is that everybody hopes the bombs stay quiet. "Go on and bring the Buffalo up here."

The Buffalo is the star of the Ironclaw program, and, like any star, it has its own press kit, music video, theme song and testimonial page. These are all available at the Web site run by its producer, Force Protection Inc., which describes its product as "able to withstand bomb blasts that would shred a lesser vehicle" and "a regular truck but on steroids." The 27-foot-long machine comes equipped with a mechanical arm and claw (thus the "Ironclaw" team), five-inch-thick windows and steel-lined, blast-proof tires. But its secret weapon is the revolutionary "V-shaped hull design" that will part the shock waves and shrapnel column of an IED just as a boat hull parts water.

That's what I'm told, at least. But to me, the Buffalo looks like a phone line repair truck.

Accompanied by a young pair of fruit stand vendors and an Iraqi in a melon truck, my RG crew watches from a safe distance as the Buffalo, operated by Sgt. Brett Eggleston and three other soldiers, creeps a mere 10 feet from the potential IED and unfolds its mechanical arm to interrogate. Eggleston can park that close thanks, in part, to the "electronic countermeasures" that many Army vehicles carry and which are designed to block the cellphone calls that frequently trigger IEDs. Still, cellphones aren't the only way to detonate surplus artillery rounds -- the favored payload for these weapons. Some insurgents tape frayed wires inside a cardboard tube (called "crush wires"); when a Humvee runs this over, the wires complete a circuit, ignite a blasting cap and, thus, detonate the bomb. Even IEDs with cellphone triggers include a washing machine timer as a backup; when it winds down, the rounds blast off. This tends to make interrogations a nerve-racking ordeal. "We don't know what it feels like in here" when an IED goes off, one Buffalo crewman, Spec. Brendon Croteau, has acknowledged to me. "We haven't been blown up yet."

And this is where the whole expedition turns . . . well, into a "Wizard of Oz" moment for me. Because as I peer through the haze of the Iraqi noon, the Buffalo's claw ponderously raking the grass beside the road, I realize that the heart of the Pentagon's program for defeating IEDs is: 1) buy some armored trucks with big windows; 2) send young soldiers out to drive up next to bombs; 3) investigate with a phone truck.

As Tate points out later: "I've seen tanks destroyed. I've seen Bradleys destroyed . . . There's only so much armor can do."

Fortunately, this particular wired rock turns out to be an irrigation pump. After another hour or so, I'm dropped off at a nearby patrol base.

Fifteen minutes later, Tate's RG-31 nearly runs over an IED.

McGorvin -- dubbed "the Jedi master" by his fellow soldiers for his ability to, as they put it, "detect ordnance" -- tells me about it the next day as he fidgets on a torn couch behind the TOC. He explains that he sensed the bomb a mile before he reached it -- noticing first the grinning face of a taxi driver who squatted down behind his cab to key a Motorola phone. A few minutes later as the convoy rumbled through a small town, McGorvin felt it again outside a cluster of mud wattle shacks, their yards suspiciously empty.

DOJ_NMG_0087969

Then, all at once, his RG-31 passed a mound of dirt with a cone of rusty metal showing through its side. McGorvin's gaze locked on a sliver of blue plastic tucked behind the mound. "I got something!" he yelled. "I don't know what it is, but it's got a cellphone on it!"

The RG-31's armor wouldn't protect McGorvin standing in his gunner's nest, so, as radios barked and the convoy scattered, he tucked his thighs against his chest and squatted.

"McGorvin -- good looking," Tate shouted as their truck finally jolted to a stop outside the bomb's blast radius.

"My gunner's got two rounds on the left side," Tate radioed to Eggleston, who was waiting in the Buffalo. "I'll walk you to it."

As the Buffalo team prayed, Eggleston lowered its nine-pronged claw -- his "pooper scooper," as he calls it -- toward the buried IED. He followed his progress on a color monitor connected to a camera on the arm's first joint. Gingerly, he scratched the dirt, revealing two rusty 130mm artillery shells and then, zooming in, found a blue Nokia cellphone, battery and a washing machine timer that had been wired to a blasting cap in the nose of the first shell.

"What type of rounds you got?" radioed Sgt. Thomas Sutton, the leader of the Ironclaw team. "What kind of initiation system?"

Distracted and infuriated by this interruption, Eggleston -- who prefers to work in complete silence -- remembers quietly heaving a few empty water bottles around the cabin, then shaking his fists at the heavens. When he'd calmed himself, he returned to the controls, tangled the claw in the ignition wire and -- carefully, carefully -- lifted the cellphone, timer and battery clear of the charge, disarming the IED.

"For the third time," he radioed Sutton, "I've got two 130mm rounds." And then, having pawed around a bit more where the rounds were buried, he keyed his mike again. "No, check that. I've got three."

McGorvin's IED was one of 2,625 such bombs found or detonated during the month of July: 959 of them were discovered, while 1,666 exploded. Numbers such as these have made IEDs the leading killer of U.S. troops in Iraq, which places McGorvin and his buddies squarely on the front lines of the war. It also means their stories -- "Gets the blood flowing!" I hear McGorvin exclaim to Tate when he's finished -- carry an extra authority, one they seem acutely aware of. Nearly all them instruct me, "Just tell people what it's really like over here." At first I assume this is a reference to the administration complaint that the war isn't going as badly as the media make it appear. And yet, the longer I stay with the unit, the less certain I am that their version of Iraq is meant to toe anybody's party line.

This is certainly true of Corbett Baxter, a sweat-soaked first lieutenant who has been doing eight- to 10-hour foot patrols every day. "It's a [expletive] classic area," he says after Rawlings and I meet him in an empty briefing room. He gazes blankly at the far wall, perspiration still beading high up in the bluish skin of his shaved head, despite the icy air-conditioning. "A mixed Shia and Sunni population, everybody living together peacefully. But in the last few days, everybody, all the families I've got to know -- they've all left. Fled."

Baxter stops and stares at me. His eyes are dark and hollow. Most of the roughly 35,000 people at Camp Liberty never leave the gates, and those who do, including the Ironclaw teams, rarely leave the paved roads. It is as if the New York police department patrolled only Broadway, First Avenue and Eighth Avenue, leaving the rest of the city in darkness. Baxter, however, has seen that darkness.

"I would walk through these neighborhoods where I had kids running all over," he tells me. "I'd sit down and have chai with them. As far as I can tell, they liked having us there, but they're gone. You know what I'm doing now? Now all I'm doing is waiting for the [expletives] who chased them out to come in."

Like the Ironclaw teams, Baxter has seen the center of the war. The facts he's returned with don't necessarily fit the Army's -- or, certainly, Washington's -- official version of the war's progress, but because they're true, he tells them to me anyway. I have a different experience the next day when Rawlings and I visit the 16th Engineering Brigade, which is the "executive agent" for the Ironclaw teams. Maj. Mitch Gargac, who greets us, is eager to talk about the showers, latrines, Hesco barriers (bags filled with sand) and concrete T-walls that his engineers build inside the wire. We sit in a video conference room whose stadium-style seats and blond wood furnishings are as nice as anything Rawlings saw at Princeton. But when I ask about the Ironclaw program -- for instance, how many teams exist or how many bombs they've found -- Gargac admits, "Truthfully, I don't know if I can say."

DOJ_NMG_0087970

Instead, he introduces me to the brigade's "Baghdad Is Beautiful" program. Its chief, Lt. Col. Tris Cooper, has $80 million to spend and flashes charts that say things such as: "Electricity: Goal: increase production." And "Health Care: Goal: construct facilities." They contain no statistics. Even if I hadn't just read reports concluding that Baghdad residents get only five to eight hours of power a day and that the U.S.-based contractor, Parsons, has failed to deliver 130 of 150 promised health clinics, I would find this performance depressing. After all, Rawlings and I have just been out driving around Baghdad. Baghdad is not beautiful. Baghdad is covered with trash and saturated with the ugliest kind of danger. As we leave the briefing, Rawlings -- who is as optimistic an Army supporter as you can find -- looks as if he's seen a ghost. He hustles off for the reality of his Humvee while I snap pictures of Gargac, guarding the parking lot. My camera breaks.

Gargac is just doing his job, I understand -- which is, in part, to paint the war in as positive a light as possible, when dealing with the media. (In September, six weeks after I leave Iraq, following multiple e-mail requests, he tells me that Ironclaw teams around Baghdad have found 1,247 IEDs since January, a number positive enough that I wonder why he didn't give it to me in the first place.) But the meeting highlights the difference between the stories that the Ironclaw team tells about the war and those told by Army officials or politicians. The soldiers know that Baghdad isn't beautiful. But neither is it completely accurate to call the varied landscape they drive through each day a "Dante-esque hell" or "nightmarish" -- two descriptions of Baghdad that I find in U.S. newspapers on my return. And so, caught between opposing, abstract versions of the war, they refuse to simplify: This story means we're winning. This story means we're losing.

They live among facts too overwhelming to parse: Rawlings opens the door of a shrapnel-shredded truck on a highway south of Baghdad to find a beheaded child, on his dead father's lap, cradling a flat of eggs. Only one is broken.

Tate picks up a scrap of rubber on a roadway to find himself staring at an IED. One night, during an ambush, a brave sergeant named Travis Parker sprints across 100 yards of open highway under fire, in the dark, to deliver ammunition to Rawlings's Bradley. Peterson's friend is scraped up off the pavement after the graffiti-covered wall explodes in his face. Or it's a good week, and they putter past verdant date groves undisturbed and, quite frankly, bored for hour after hour, day after day. McGorvin fantasizes about returning in peacetime and driving the same roads in a rental car. Rawlings blasts rock-and-roll under highway overpasses. Tate keeps track of which houses on their route have the best landscaping.

For them, these stories are the war, period. They are not sound bites to be scooped up to justify some larger political narrative. Their attitude reminds me of the soldiers in Erich Maria Remarque's WWI novel All Quiet on the Western Front , which Rawlings says he's reading. At one point, as the narrator watches a friend die, he notes: "We have lost all sense of other considerations, because they are artificial. Only the facts are real and important to us."

Rawlings comes the closest to stating this outright. One night around 3 a.m. -- Rawlings's usual bedtime -- I push him to talk about politics and war. I tell him that if he wants to be a writer (a profession he says he's considering), he's going to have to have opinions, to not worry too much about upsetting anybody.

Rawlings, clearly uncomfortable with the topic, ends up surprising me. He begins talking about seeing Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, on "Meet the Press" after the Valerie Plame scandal. "It was like an opera," he says, in a tone that makes me feel this isn't a compliment. "Everything the guy says comes out in three's. Two good things for us, one bad thing for them. I went to work the next day, saw my guys getting ready to go to Iraq -- I hated the idea that while we were working, he's flinging around political stuff."

I hear a conversation in Camp Liberty's posh, 1,000-seat cafeteria that crystallizes this thought for me. A well-fed soldier is polishing the vocabularies of two foreign national workers. A severe over-cleanliness of uniform already defines him as a "fobbit," someone who never leaves his FOB, which stands for "forward operating base." But he's well on his way to defining "vicarious," too. "Like, there are politicians who talk about this war 'vicariously,'" he says, his voice rising, indignant. "They don't know anything about the war because they've never been here. They just want to get their face on TV and make people think they're looking out for them, and so they say the war is bad, but they don't know whether it is or it isn't."

It's a worthy question, whether the war is good or bad. But when the Ironclaw team is outside the wire, looking down on a bomb, it's too late to ask.

THE SECOND IED DIDN'T EVEN TICKLE MCGORVIN'S JEDI SENSE. Just a few hours after the first bomb they'd found, the soldiers were cruising down a hardball road, open scrub on the left, a canal on the right backed by corn stubble and the silver swoops of power lines angling through it, off to the horizon. Light poles, evenly spaced, dotted the road. As his RG-31 slowed for a speed bump, McGorvin heard a small pop, and a foot-high column of dust bloomed on the right shoulder of the road. It looked as if a bullet might have struck there.

"McGorvin -- did you see that?" shouted Spec. Jose Fuentes, 21, who rode in the RG's passenger seat. "What the [expletive] was it?"

"Incoming?"

"I don't know. It wasn't loud enough for incoming."

Tate, expecting an imminent attack, shouted to his driver, Pfc. David Griffin. "Hey, you got to go on past. Even if it is an IED, we got to get to the other side."

Griffin was a rookie, in country only a few weeks. But being a Missourian, he had plenty of experience on bad roads: He gunned the RG like a pro, slamming through potholes so hard that the crew nearly jolted out of their seats.

Once they were clear, Tate radioed the convoy they'd left behind, his voice quieter than usual: "Hey, an IED just went off. Everybody move up!"

This time the insurgents had timed the convoy's speed by the light poles along the road, which allowed them to set off their bomb just as the trucks arrived. The puff of smoke signaled the ignition of a blasting cap that had inexplicably failed to detonate two 130mm rounds. Otherwise, the RG-31 carrying Tate, Fuentes and McGorvin -- who was standing up, unprotected, in his gunner's hatch -- would've been hit directly.

McGorvin squatted down in the RG's cab and held his hands out, palms down. "Look at this, Fuentes," he said, as his fingers shook.

In the middle of the convoy, a soldier had seen three Iraqis emerge from some bushes and fold up a tripod -- a device they'd likely used to time the convoy's approach. Sutton backed his RG-31 past the unexploded rounds and, regulations be damned, left the pavement and hurtled down a dirt road after them.

Though the three triggermen escaped Sutton's wrath by crossing a canal, an infantry unit picked them up 30 minutes later.

Up at the lead vehicle, a curious kind of giddiness descended. It wasn't fear exactly -- there was constant chatter, constant activity. That's the strange thing about the front lines: There's a high. Everyone, even a general, has to admit that you've visited a privileged place. Which, in turn, makes it harder and harder to fit in anywhere else.

Other voices rehashed the luck of the near miss, the fizzle of the bomb.

"Damn, we almost died," someone said.

But Fuentes understood the paradox of this high: As good as it felt, it was also changing each one of them, in ways nobody could predict. Before the team dismounted to pull guard, he told McGorvin and Tate, "I love you guys."

Then he turned to Griffin, the new driver. "Welcome to the war," he said.

POSTSCRIPT:

Recently, E Company's patrol area expanded eastward into more urban areas of Baghdad, and attacks on their vehicles increased. In an e-mail dated September 13, Rawlings reported that the lead RG-31 I'd ridden in had been hit by a bomb, which cracked but did not shatter its windows. McGorvin was struck in the face by shrapnel, the blast's only casualty. He returned to duty after three days' rest. The company is scheduled to return to the United States at year's end.

. . . But A U.S. Policy Czar Might Help (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Political rhetoric serves in an election season to deny the obvious and get voters to suspend belief in their own judgments. Thus George W. Bush in recent days, urging the American public not to "allow our dissatisfaction to turn into disillusionment about our purpose" in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0087972

The reality is that deep disillusionment has already taken hold, especially among those who supported "our purpose" of regime change in Iraq. It is the conduct of the war in Bush's hands that has spread -- precisely, Mr. President -- disillusionment that will almost certainly cost the Republicans the House and perhaps the Senate on Nov. 7.

Admitting this has to be the point of departure in Bush's search for a new approach to Iraq and a new approach to an American public that -- for good reason -- has largely stopped believing him on Iraq.

There seems to be almost no learning curve in Washington's dealing with Iraq's societal and religious cleavages and prickly nationalistic politicians, who have been shoved aside or undermined for not showering effusive praise on Bush for their liberation or for asserting their own priorities and political legitimacy.

It was Groundhog Day all over again last week as Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki reacted irritably to Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Bush announcing that Maliki would do X, Y and Z -- "benchmarks" in presidential parlance -- or else. Nobody seems to have imagined that the besieged Maliki would want to announce his government's programs instead. Bush sought to placate the Iraqi yesterday by holding and then publicizing a 50-minute video conference with the still-fuming Maliki.

Until then, the sequence was a culturally insensitive replay of the moments that quickly soured the initial chances in 2003 to let Iraqis take charge and to try to come to terms with their Arab and Iranian neighbors, who have instead helped destabilize Iraq since.

First, proconsul L. Paul Bremer cavalierly dismissed the proposed six-person provisional government that had been constructed over two years of painful negotiations abroad between Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis. Bremer then threatened to dismiss the subsequent interim government if it did not carry out his wishes. And so on.

This is not ancient history. On orders from a myopic White House last spring, Khalilzad openly intervened in the negotiations for an Iraqi prime minister to block incumbent Ibrahim al-Jafari and create a situation in which Maliki -- Jafari's deputy and dependent on Shiite radicals for votes -- was the only viable candidate to run Iraq.

Maliki's claims to legitimacy were destroyed by that open American micromanagement. Khalilzad's subsequent sales campaign for the "national unity" government -- which has quickly become a collection of corrupt and sectarian fiefdoms -- has damaged his effectiveness.

I have written relatively little about Iraq's tortured path since that moment, in part because I hoped Maliki would prove me wrong but also because what would happen, and was happening, seemed so depressingly obvious.

This midterm election is a moment of accountability, as Bush acknowledged at the news conference where he sought to fend off intimations of disillusionment. It is the time for voters and citizens to examine recent and past mistakes and omissions of U.S. policy in Iraq and then vote accordingly.

Bush seemed to draw a comparison between Vietnam and Iraq last week during an interview with ABC News. It was left to author David Halberstam to point out that the important part of the exchange was that neither Bush nor his interviewer seemed to have a firm grip on what Vietnam's Tet Offensive had been about.

"I don't know what either of them is really saying," Halberstam observed on National Public Radio. "The president has been exceptionally weak on the history of the Vietnam War." Was Bush saying, implausibly, that "Tet was a victory for America but a political defeat, and therefore . . . the war is really going better than this momentary glitch shows?"

Halberstam is a voice worth listening to on this comparison. His dispatches from Vietnam argued initially that the conflict could be won if strategy and tactics were changed. Only later did he come to the conclusion that the conduct of the war had finally made it unwinnable.

It is not Bush's poor grasp of Vietnam but his poor grasp of Iraq that is the urgent problem. After Nov. 7 the president should stop pretending to run an Iraq policy that has in fact beached him like a dying whale. He should give a senior Republican wise person complete powers to steer a new course, guided by the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton study group and others.

George Shultz, Ronald Reagan's secretary of state (and, like Jim Baker, an ex-Marine), is the outstanding candidate for a salvage mission on Iraq. He will not want to become the Iraq czar. But if it happens, I will quickly offer Shultz my congratulations, and my apologies.

Partition Is Not The Solution . . . (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0087973

By Rend Al-rahim

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Desperate to find solutions to the violence in Iraq and thus an exit strategy for the United States, an increasing number of lawmakers in Congress are considering Iraq's partition into Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions under the umbrella of a loose confederation. But partition is neither desirable nor feasible.

Neat partition lines are impossible because few regions in Iraq are ethnically or confessionally homogeneous. The governorates of Diyala, Mosul, Salahuddin, Hilla, Kirkuk and Basra are intermixed or have large minorities scattered throughout each province. In Baghdad, with probably a quarter of Iraq's population, the ethnic and sectarian groups are inextricably interwoven.

A plan to partition Iraq would plunge the country into total civil war far more widespread and bloody than the sectarian and factional violence we are witnessing now. The partition of India and Pakistan in 1947 resulted in 2 million dead and 11 million displaced. The death toll and refugee numbers from collective murder, reprisal killings and ethnic cleansing in Iraq would be comparable, dwarfing the casualties in Iraq today.

Nor would conflict end once areas had been purified at this horrific human cost. As in Kashmir, regions along the partition lines would continue to be contested for decades, leading to continued violence and warfare. The belt of towns surrounding Baghdad would be a war zone of competing territorial claims, as would the border regions skirting Kirkuk, Mosul and Diyala.

With the exception of the Kurdish regional government, the institutions of local governance, including regional councils, regional assemblies and the local police forces, are underdeveloped and fragmented, with little capacity to preserve the rule of law or deliver services. In such an environment, partition will inevitably lead to a meltdown of authority, and internecine fighting would intensify. We have had a harbinger of such warfare in the so-called stable areas in the south, where fighting has erupted in Basra, Diwaniyah and Amarah among the various Shiite factions; it has been contained only provisionally and with the greatest difficulty. With control of resources and absolute power as the beckoning prize, the factions would battle even more viciously for supremacy.

Iraq's neighbors would not stand by and passively witness the turmoil attending efforts at partition. There is too much at stake for all of them, and several are already meddling in Iraq's internal affairs. If Iraq is partitioned, Iran, Turkey, Syria and Saudi Arabia will intervene -- either militarily and directly, as Turkey might do in Kurdistan and northern Iraq, or by increasing and expanding support to Iraqi factions, or both. In the case of Iran, a stepped-up nonmilitary Iranian presence and increased support for pro-Iranian groups are both feasible and likely options. Iraq would thus become the battleground of an undeclared war for control not only of Iraq but of the entire Middle East.

The most probable outcome of this violent competition for territory, resources and power would be a radical Sunni, Taliban-style regime in the west and in parts of central Iraq that would be a breeding ground for terrorism. In the south it is likely there would be a fundamentalist Shiite regime pliant to Iran's will. In both cases these would be authoritarian regimes hostile to pluralism and genuine democracy. Unchecked by a stunted and impotent national government, these governments would use their resources to promote their radical ideologies abroad, support like-minded movements in neighboring countries and destabilize the region. Meanwhile, Baghdad would remain a war-torn city with a fig-leaf government too feeble to hold itself together, let alone uphold the rule of law across the country.

These are hardly the outcomes for which the United States fought a war to remove Saddam Hussein from power and for which Iraqis and Americans continue to pay a price in precious lives and resources. Rather than seeking ways to weaken the national government, we should find ways to strengthen and empower it to do a better job, and seriously consider substantially increasing the number of Iraqi army troops and raising the number of U.S. forces at least temporarily.

At this stage, strengthening the national government and providing it with the tools and institutions to enforce the rule of law is far more likely to produce a stable country that can govern and defend itself and be a friend to the United States. This, rather than a misguided plan of partition, presents a viable exit strategy for the United States and a definition of success in Iraq.

We need to engage in new thinking and develop new strategies for Iraq, but above all, no matter how dire the situation, we must not grasp at options that look good in theory but would prove disastrous in practice.

Dying To Save The G.O.P. Congress (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

IF you happened to be up around dawn on Tuesday, you could witness the death rattle of our adventure in Iraq live on CNN. Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the American commander, were making new promises from the bunker of the Green Zone, inspiring about as much confidence as Jackie Gleason and Art Carney hatching a get-rich-quick scheme to sell a kitchen gadget on "The Honeymooners."</object.title>

"Success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved on a realistic timetable," said Mr. Khalilzad. Iraq can be "in a very good place in 12 months," said General Casey. Even a child could see how much was wrong with this picture.

If there really is light at the end of the tunnel, why after three and a half years can't we yet guarantee light in Baghdad? Symbolically enough, television transmission of the Khalilzad-Casey press conference was interrupted by another of the city's daily power failures. If Iraq's leaders had signed on to the 12-month plan of "benchmarks" the Americans advertised, why were those leaders nowhere in sight? We found out one day later, when the prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, mocked the very idea of an America-imposed timetable. "I am positive that this is not the official policy of the American government, but rather a result of the ongoing election campaign," he said, adding dismissively, "And that does not concern us much."

Give the Iraqi leader credit for a Borat-like candor that almost every American in this sorry tale lacks. Of course all the White House's latest jabberwocky about "benchmarks" and "milestones" and "timetables" (never to be confused with those Defeatocrats' "timelines") is nothing more than an election-year P.R. strategy, as is the laughable banishment of "stay the course." There is no new American plan to counter the apocalypse now playing out in Iraq, only new packaging to pacify American voters between now and Nov. 7. And recycled packaging at that: President Bush had last announced that he and Mr. Maliki were developing "benchmarks" to "measure progress" in Iraq back in June.

As Richard Holbrooke, the broker of the Bosnia peace accords, has observed, the only real choice left for the president now is either "escalation or disengagement." But there are no troops, let alone money or national will, for escalation. Disengagement within a year, however, is favored by 54 percent of Americans and, more important, 71 percent of Iraqis. After Election Day, adults in Washington will step in, bow to the obvious and pull the plug. The current administration strategy — praying for a miracle — is not an option. The current panacea favored by anxious Republican Congressional candidates — firing Donald Rumsfeld — is too little, too late.

The adults in charge of disengagement will include the Bush family consigliere, James Baker, whose bipartisan Iraq Study Group will present its findings after the election, and John Warner, the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, who has promised a re-evaluation of Iraq policy within roughly the same time frame. Democrats will have a role in direct proportion to the clout they gain in the midterms.

One way or another the various long-shot exit scenarios being debated in the capital will be sorted out: federalism and partition; reaching out somehow for help from Iran and Syria; replacing Mr. Maliki with a Saddam-lite strongman. There will be some kind of timeline, or whatever you want to call it, with enforced benchmarks, or whatever you want to call them, for phased withdrawal. (Read "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now" by George McGovern and William R. Polk for a particularly persuasive blueprint.) In any event, the timeline will end no later than Inauguration Day 2009.

In keeping with the political cynicism that gave birth to this war and has recklessly prolonged it, the only ones being kept in the dark about this inevitable denouement are our fighting men and women. They remain trapped, dying in accelerating numbers in a civil war that is now killing so many Iraqi civilians that Mr. Maliki this month ordered his health ministry to stop releasing any figures.

Our troops are held hostage by the White House's political imperatives as much as they are by the violence. Desperate to maintain the election-year P.R. ruse that an undefined "victory" is still within reach, Mr. Bush went so far at Wednesday's press conference as to say that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq. He explained his rationale to George Stephanopoulos last weekend, when he asserted that the number of casualties was the enemy's definition of success or failure, not his. "I define success or failure as to whether or not the Iraqis will be able to defend themselves," the president said, and "as to whether the unity government" is making the "difficult decisions necessary to unite the country."

Unfortunately, the war is a calamity by both of those definitions as well. The American command's call for a mere 3,000 more Iraqi troops to help defend Baghdad has gone unanswered. As we've learned from Operation Together Forward, when Iraqis do stand up, violence goes up. And when American and British troops stand down, murderous sectarian militias, some of them allied with that "unity" government, fill the vacuum, taking over entire cities like Amara and Balad in broad daylight. As for those "difficult decisions" Mr. Bush regards as so essential, the Iraqi government's policy is cut and run. Mr. Maliki is not cracking down on rampaging militias but running interference for their kingpin, Moktada al-Sadr. Mr. Maliki treats this radical anti-American Shiite cleric, his political ally, with far more deference than he shows the American president.

The ultimate chutzpah is that Mr. Bush, the man who sold us Saddam's imminent mushroom clouds and "Mission Accomplished," is trivializing the chaos in Iraq as propaganda. The enemy's "sophisticated" strategy, he said in last weekend's radio address, is to distribute "images of violence" to television networks, Web sites and journalists to "demoralize our country."

This is a morally repugnant argument. The "images of violence" from Iraq are not fake — like, say, the fiction our government manufactured about the friendly-fire death of Pat Tillman or the upbeat news stories the Pentagon spends millions of dollars planting in Iraqi newspapers today. These images of violence are real. Americans really are dying at the fastest pace in at least a year, and Iraqis in the greatest numbers to date. To imply that this carnage is magnified by the news media, whether the American press or Al Jazeera, is to belittle the gravity of the escalated bloodshed and to duck accountability for the mismanagement of the war. Mr. Bush's logic is reminiscent of Jeffrey Skilling's obtuse view of his innocence in the Enron scandal, though at least Mr. Skilling has been held accountable for the wreckage of lives on his watch.

It is also wrong to liken what's going on now, as Mr. Bush has, to the Tet offensive. That sloppy Vietnam analogy was first made by Mr. Rumsfeld in June 2004 to try to explain away the explosive rise in the war's violence at that time. It made a little more sense then, since both the administration and the American public were still being startled by the persistence of the Iraq insurgency, much as the Johnson administration and Walter Cronkite were by the Viet Cong's tenacity in 1968. Before Tet, as Stanley Karnow's history, "Vietnam," reminds us, public approval of L.B.J.'s conduct of the war still stood at 40 percent, yet to hit rock bottom.

Where we are in Iraq today is not 1968 but 1971, after the bottom had fallen out, Johnson had abdicated and America had completely turned on Vietnam. At that point, approval of Richard Nixon's handling of the war was at 34 percent, comparable to Mr. Bush's current 30. The percentage of Americans who thought the Vietnam War was "morally wrong" stood at 51, comparable to the 58 percent who now think the Iraq war was a mistake. Many other Vietnam developments in 1971 have their counterparts in 2006: the leaking of classified Pentagon reports revealing inept and duplicitous war policy, White House demonization of the press, the joining of moderate Republican senators with Democrats to press for a specific date for American withdrawal.

That's why it seemed particularly absurd when, in his interview with Mr. Stephanopoulos last weekend, Mr. Bush said that "the fundamental question" Americans must answer is "should we stay?" They've been answering that question loud and clear for more than a year now.

What we should be thinking about instead are our obligations to those who are doing the staying. Kevin Tillman, who served with his brother in Iraq and Afghanistan, observed in an angry online essay this month: "Somehow back at home, support for the soldiers meant having a 5-year-old kindergartener scribble a picture with crayons and send it overseas, or slapping stickers on cars, or lobbying Congress for an extra pad in a helmet."

If we really support the troops, we'll move past Mr. Bush's "fundamental question" to one from 1971 posed by a 27-year-old Vietnam veteran, John Kerry, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?"

NATO, Afghan Troops Battle Insurgents (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

Associated Press, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0087976

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others.

The fighting in Uruzgan province came a day after an international human rights group criticized NATO-led troops in Afghanistan, saying their tactics increasingly endanger civilians and are turning the population against the Western alliance.

NATO's top commander apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them.

"Sadly, in asymmetric warfare, when you're battling an insurgency, typically the insurgents do not play by the same rules that we would like to play by," U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan, NATO said. NATO-led and Afghan troops fought back with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

"Initial battle damage assessment indicates that up to 55 insurgents were killed," NATO said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight other troops in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

A purported statement by the Taliban leadership, meanwhile, said the hardline militia has ruled out talks with President Hamid Karzai's government as long as foreign troops remain in the country.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch complained Friday that NATO's recent operations have killed dozens of civilians, but it also criticized the Taliban and other insurgents for putting civilians at risk "by using populated areas to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan government forces."

"While NATO forces try to minimize harm to civilians, they obviously are not doing enough," said Sam Zarifi, the group's Asia research director. "NATO's tactics are increasingly endangering the civilians they are supposed to be protecting and turning the local population against them."

He spoke on the same day that the International Red Cross urged all sides in the Afghan conflict to spare civilians.

Jones, the NATO commander, expressed regret for civilian deaths but said Taliban fighters use civilians as human shields and said that in the heat of battle it can be difficult to separate the two.

The death of a civilian "is something that causes anybody in uniform to lose a lot of sleep," Jones said at a news conference at Bagram, the largest U.S. base in Afghanistan.

His comments came four days after clashes between NATO-led troops and insurgents in the south that Afghan officials say killed 30 to 80 civilians, including women and children. NATO said its initial investigation found 12 civilians killed.

The 32,000-strong NATO-led force took command of security operations in Afghanistan last month. The alliance has been battling resurgent Taliban militants in the south and east in the worst upsurge of violence since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban.

A Taliban statement e-mailed to The Associated Press by purported militia spokesman Muhammad Hanif dismissed Karzai's offer for talks Friday and called his administration a "puppet government." Hanif's exact ties to Taliban leaders are unclear, and it was not possible to verify the statement's authenticity.

"We say even today that there is no possibility of any talks when the country is under occupation," it said. "Any talks with aggressors would amount to selling the country."

On Friday, Karzai reiterated to reporters that he was ready to negotiate with Mullah Omar if the fugitive stops receiving support from neighboring Pakistan. Karzai says Omar is hiding in the Pakistani city of Quetta, while Pakistan says he is in Afghanistan.

Over the past two years, hundreds of Taliban supporters, including some senior officials, have reconciled with Karzai's government, but there is no indication that high-level talks with the rebel leadership have occurred.

Karzai made a similar offer in an interview with AP last January, telling Omar to "get in touch" if he wanted to talk peace, but fighting has since escalated sharply.

DOJ_NMG_0087977

Human Rights Watch argued that NATO is relying too much on aircraft to attack insurgent positions. In June, the U.S. Central Command reported 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, double the 160 strikes in Iraq in the same month, the group noted.

Maj. Luke Knittig, the spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, said that "airpower is used extensively because it is an advantage and it can be decisive at a close fight."

But, he added, "its careful application is mandatory."

NATO: 70 Suspected Insurgents Killed (NSDY/AP)

KABUL, Afghanistan -- NATO and Afghan troops killed 70 suspected militants who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan, while a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others, the alliance said Sunday.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan on Saturday, said Maj. Luke Knittig, a spokesman for the NATO-led force. The alliance and Afghan troops fought back for several hours with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

Seventy insurgents were killed, Knittig said, upgrading an earlier estimate of 55 dead. One Afghan soldier was wounded. It was impossible to independently verify the death toll at the remote battle site.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

Nato Kills 55 Afghan "Militants" (BBC)

BBC.com, October 29, 2006

Nato forces in Afghanistan say they have killed 55 suspected militants in clashes in southern Uruzgan province.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked the Nato-led International Security Assistance Force troops at their military base north of Tarin Kowt.

Troops responded with small arms fire, attack helicopters and air strikes, the alliance said in a statement.

In a separate incident, a Nato solider was killed and eight injured by a roadside bomb, Nato said.

The blast hit a Nato military convoy in the southern province of Uruzgan, the statement said.

Three civilians were also wounded in the attack and were taken to a military hospital for treatment.

General: 'Mistakes' Made In Afghanistan Strike (CNN)

CNN.com, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) -- NATO Supreme Allied Commander Gen. James Jones promised Afghan President Hamid Karzai at a news conference Saturday that a full investigation of an incident involving the unintended death of around 70 Afghan civilians would be launched.

Karzai has already assembled a team to investigate reports of civilian casualties caused by NATO air operations in southern Afghanistan.

On Thursday, Karzai issued a presidential decree to look into reports stemming from incidents in the Panjwayi and Pashmul districts of Kandahar province.

The team is made up of tribal and community elders from various districts of Kandahar province.

"The team has been asked to prepare a full and complete account of the incident and identify its causes and victims," Karzai said in a news release.

"The team will investigate the reports of civilian casualties and damages inflicted in this operation. They will also present their suggestions to the president on how such unfortunate incidents could be prevented in the future."

Also, NATO's International Security Assistance Force said it and the Afghan Defense Ministry are conducting a joint investigation into a Tuesday incident "in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, in which a number of civilians were killed along with a large number of insurgents."

ISAF commander Gen. David Richards, speaking to reporters in Kabul Saturday, said "in the night in the fog of war, mistakes were made."

ISAF has said they were "satisfied" that they "identified and targeted a group of insurgents," but said they were uncertain how many civilians were killed as a result but believes it to be about 70 individuals.

ISAF said it has consulted local elders and other citizens "who have indicated that the great majority of those killed were Taliban."

The International Committee of the Red Cross said Friday that civilians are being caught in the crossfire.

"Aerial bombardment and ground offensives in populated rural areas, together with recent suicide attacks and roadside bombs in urban areas, have significantly increased the number of innocent civilians killed, injured or displaced," it said.

It urged all parties to respect international humanitarian law and "to maintain a distinction between fighters and civilians at all times." It said the law "also requires the parties to exercise constant care in the conduct of military operations and prohibits attacks directed against civilians or civilian objects."

The fighting in the south has been heavy this year with the resurgence of the Taliban militant movement and the expansion of ISAF in the southern provinces.

There were reports of more deadly violence Friday in the south.

Karim Rahimi, presidential spokesman, confirmed a report that 14 people in a vehicle were killed in a bombing near the Uruzgan provincial capital of Tarin Kowt. Among the victims were children and elderly.

Karzai said he deplores the Taliban and their activities.Karzai willing to talk with Taliban

DOJ_NMG_0087979

Nevertheless, Karzai's spokesman confirmed a report that the president told reporters Friday he is willing to "talk and negotiate" with Taliban militants "for the sake of peace."

Rahimi said Karzai made similar remarks before.

It is unclear whether such a gesture was simply an academic utterance, since the hostilities and hatred between the Taliban and the Afghan government are fierce.

"Those people, if it is Mullah Mohammad Omar or others, if they want to talk and negotiate with us, they are welcome but they should first free themselves from foreign slavery and come to their own land and live in peace," Karzai is quoted as saying.

"For the sake of peace in Afghanistan, we are ready to negotiate with them. We have always negotiated with their supporters and people who control them, and will do again."

One of the others he was referring to is rebel commander Gulbeddin Hekmatyar.

Karzai isn't offering amnesty, the news report said.

And Karzai reportedly said if wanted militants return to Afghanistan, Afghans would be able to take legal action against them. Many of the militants are thought to be across the border in Pakistan.

"If any one had any legal cases against them, they can do that," he reportedly said.

NATO Says 55 Suspected Insurgents Killed (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

AP, October 29, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan - NATO and Afghan troops battled a large group of insurgents who attacked a military base in southern Afghanistan Saturday, killing 55 suspected militants, the alliance said. A roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight others.

The fighting in Uruzgan province came a day after an international human rights group criticized NATO-led troops in Afghanistan, saying their tactics increasingly endanger civilians and are turning the population against the Western alliance.

NATO's top commander apologized Saturday for civilian deaths caused by fighting between Taliban militants and NATO forces earlier in the week, but said insurgents endanger civilians by hiding among them.

"Sadly, in asymmetric warfare, when you're battling an insurgency, typically the insurgents do not play by the same rules that we would like to play by," U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said.

Some 100 to 150 militants attacked a military base north of Tarin Kowt in Uruzgan, NATO said. NATO-led and Afghan troops fought back with small arms fire, attack helicopters and airstrikes.

"Initial battle damage assessment indicates that up to 55 insurgents were killed," NATO said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

On Sunday, a roadside blast killed one NATO soldier and wounded eight other troops in Uruzgan, the alliance said. Three civilians were wounded. The nationalities of the slain and wounded soldiers were not disclosed.

A purported statement by the Taliban leadership, meanwhile, said the hardline militia has ruled out talks with President Hamid Karzai's government as long as foreign troops remain in the country.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch complained Friday that NATO's recent operations have killed dozens of civilians, but it also criticized the Taliban and other insurgents for putting civilians at risk "by using populated areas to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan government forces."

"While NATO forces try to minimize harm to civilians, they obviously are not doing enough," said Sam Zarifi, the group's Asia research director. "NATO's tactics are increasingly endangering the civilians they are supposed to be protecting and turning the local population against them."

He spoke on the same day that the International Red Cross urged all sides in the Afghan conflict to spare civilians.

Jones, the NATO commander, expressed regret for civilian deaths but said Taliban fighters use civilians as human shields and said that in the heat of battle it can be difficult to separate the two.

The death of a civilian "is something that causes anybody in uniform to lose a lot of sleep," Jones said at a news conference at Bagram, the largest U.S. base in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0087980

His comments came four days after clashes between NATO-led troops and insurgents in the south that Afghan officials say killed 30 to 80 civilians, including women and children. NATO said its initial investigation found 12 civilians killed.

The 32,000-strong NATO-led force took command of security operations in Afghanistan last month. The alliance has been battling resurgent Taliban militants in the south and east in the worst upsurge of violence since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban.

A Taliban statement e-mailed to The Associated Press by purported militia spokesman Muhammad Hanif dismissed Karzai's offer for talks Friday and called his administration a "puppet government." Hanif's exact ties to Taliban leaders are unclear, and it was not possible to verify the statement's authenticity.

"We say even today that there is no possibility of any talks when the country is under occupation," it said. "Any talks with aggressors would amount to selling the country."

On Friday, Karzai reiterated to reporters that he was ready to negotiate with Mullah Omar if the fugitive stops receiving support from neighboring Pakistan. Karzai says Omar is hiding in the Pakistani city of Quetta, while Pakistan says he is in Afghanistan.

Over the past two years, hundreds of Taliban supporters, including some senior officials, have reconciled with Karzai's government, but there is no indication that high-level talks with the rebel leadership have occurred.

Karzai made a similar offer in an interview with AP last January, telling Omar to "get in touch" if he wanted to talk peace, but fighting has since escalated sharply.

Human Rights Watch argued that NATO is relying too much on aircraft to attack insurgent positions. In June, the U.S. Central Command reported 340 airstrikes in Afghanistan, double the 160 strikes in Iraq in the same month, the group noted.

Maj. Luke Knittig, the spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, said that "airpower is used extensively because it is an advantage and it can be decisive at a close fight."

But, he added, "its careful application is mandatory."

Taking The Fight To The Taliban (NYT)

By Elizabeth Rubin

The New York Times Magazine, October 29, 2006

One morning this summer, I headed out with a U.S. Army convoy of Humvees, a truck called a wrecker and a packed supply truck into the Afghan mountains. I was among some two dozen American and Afghan soldiers from Task Force Warrior, an infantry battalion based in Zabul Province, just north of Kandahar. We trundled up a path fit for goats because the nearby riverbed was perfect for concealing improvised explosive devices, or I.E.D.'s. Soon enough, the truck keeled over into the riverbed anyway. To hoist it up, the wrecker had to crash through wheat fields, and within minutes a gray-bearded farmer appeared brandishing his stick. "Are you Afghan?" he shouted at Farooq, my interpreter. "I have 30 members in my family. Why did you destroy my wheat?" The old farmer then clasped my wrist with his ancient garden tool of a hand. "You Americans are all friends of Bush the persecutor. You see this area" — he swept his other arm in every direction — "these are all Taliban. But they don't have power. As soon as we find power, I will kill all of you."

Farooq tried to calm him, but the farmer was fixated on his crushed wheat stalks until he spotted First Sgt. Ruel Robbins, a red-cheeked, chest-first sort. Robbins looked the farmer over, then said, "Tell him I'm real sorry to drive over his wheat, but I had to 'cause my vehicle turned over." The farmer eyed the sacks in the supply truck; Robbins gave him one of rice and two of flour.

The farmer watched us take off in a swirl of dust, and Specialist Melissa Elliot, who was driving our Humvee, said to Farooq: "We're not trying to hurt them. We're trying to protect their security. Why'd he get so upset with us? Is their wheat part of their religion or something?"

"It's the food for his family, ma'am," Farooq said patiently.

And so began our mission into the mountains of Zabul Province, 6,500 square miles of desert, farmland and 9,000-foot peaks with almost no paved roads to link one patch to the next. It's a place where, just decades ago, families lived as nomads, until King Mohammad Zahir Shah gave them government land to settle on, and where national politics is superseded by Pashtunwali — the Pashtun codes for tribal coexistence, based on retaliation, mediation and hospitality. In 1994, when the Taliban movement of young religious students swept into Zabul offering an end to illegal road taxes and warlord rule, Zabul's leaders simply joined hands with their Pashtun brothers. After the Taliban's fall, President Hamid Karzai's nephew was dispatched to head the Zabul Police; in July 2002, I found him besieged by locals, who put feces in his food and threatened to kill him. For five years now American forces have been chasing the Taliban in Zabul and attempting reconstruction. The police buildings have improved. A new hospital (financed by the United Arab Emirates) was finished. Roads were being laid in terrain so remote that when the Americans turned up, the villagers thought they must be Russians. The Americans opened a trade school in Qalat, the capital. But the pace of progress has been painfully slow. These remain the Taliban's mountains.

DOJ_NMG_0087981

There are 42,000 U.S. and NATO troops in Afghanistan today, trying to secure a country that is a third again the size of Iraq, where there are almost 150,000 U.S.-led troops. In the past two years, more than 300 American and NATO soldiers have died trying to stave off a resurgent Taliban. Already this year, some 1,500 Afghans have been killed. And while there were just two suicide bombings in 2002, there is now one about every five days.

With the Taliban's alarming offensive, which began last spring, American generals began speaking of a different war — not a war against terror but a war of ideas. In military jargon this meant balancing kinetic and nonkinetic activity. Or, in plain speech, fighting the Taliban versus nation-building, two goals often at odds. "This is the war for the people," Lt. Col. Frank Sturek, the battalion commander of Task Force Warrior, told me. Sturek served in Iraq under Lt. Gen. David Petraeus — one of the military's leading thinkers on counterinsurgency — in Mosul, a city with 50,000 university students. In Zabul, by contrast, the literacy rate is 15 percent, at best. Sometimes Sturek couldn't tell if people wanted to be catapulted to the 21st century or just left alone. On that he deferred to Delbar Jan Arman, the governor of Zabul Province and a former anti-Soviet mujahedeen, who mentored him on local ways — distinguishing a Taliban killing from a tribal feud or a quarrel over a boy lover. Arman explained cultural sensitivities: how pulling off a man's turban or opening the clothing box of a woman could set off a revolt. Sturek would nod. "The standard military play is, Land in, round up the men, find someone who is nasty and mean and arrest him, drop off supplies and split," Sturek told me. "We're trying to humanize ourselves. It's uncomfortable. You train an infantry battalion to kill the enemy, and it's hard to tone it down." The governor's response was always: "The people are simple. We can win this war if the Army stays nice with the people and if we embrace them."

After many sweaty hours, we rumbled into the Alamo Bar and Grill in Kharnay, elevation 8,000 feet. It was a fitting name for an outpost fashioned from a mud schoolhouse — dusty, waterless and powerless except for what the soldiers slurped off a Humvee battery. Charlie Company, Fourth Brigade, 10th Mountain Division, had been based here for nine weeks already when we arrived. They had been living on meals ready to eat, or M.R.E.'s, patrolling the mountains with packs weighing 60 pounds or more, befriending locals and being mortared and ambushed once or twice a week. Their skin was burned, their uniforms ripped. But for this evening, all suffering was suspended for barbecue night. The Humvees had brought frozen slabs of beef from the United States.

In downtime, the soldiers of Charlie Company would cram into a mud room to imbibe American culture — <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="286678">"Shark Tale," <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="288851">"The Bourne Supremacy," Lil Wayne, Toby Keith singing his "Taliban Song" — all courtesy of Pvt. Dennis Taylor and his DVD and CD collection. A teenager from Tampa's housing projects, Taylor grew up with the Bloods. The Army has set him straight, even if his buddies teased him because they couldn't decipher his lingo and he wasn't sure what continent he was on or what the Koran was. "It's Islam's holy book," said one soldier. "Man, how can you be fighting here and not know that," another teased. Taylor laughed and shrugged. </object.title></object.title>

At the other end of the spectrum was Cpl. Kyle Hayes, who had made Taylor his project and, like Sgt. Jon Terry, a sentimental tough guy from Louisiana, often shared meals with the Afghan soldiers accompanying their unit to taste their culture and to bond. Hayes owned a Web design company in New York City and until two years ago was touring with his band, "Half Left." The band had a revelation while producing a record near ground zero in Manhattan, and they all joined the Army. Hayes's family was stunned. "I was the only guy at basic training who voted for Kerry," he told me. Sometimes he felt weird on leave in New York City, where people gawk at uniforms, though a few older people thanked him. His life plan, as inscribed in his diary, is to be a rock star, business mogul and founder of a Texan city by 35, governor of Texas by 45 and president by 55.

Anticipation hung over the Alamo. Charlie Company's next mission was a bit of deceptive theater intended to lure the Taliban into ambushing the soldiers so they could counterattack. Part of the strategy involved Lt. Nathan Shields — a smiling, easygoing officer from Rochester — posing as a gullible new commander. Meanwhile, units hiding in the mountains would block the Taliban's escape. That night, a few squads hiked up a thousand feet, each soldier hauling water (temperatures in the day are usually in the 100's), food, rifle, knife, flashlight and first-aid kit, all atop 35 pounds of armor and ammunition. The Afghan soldiers carried little besides a rifle and ammunition. The American infantryman's burden is the Taliban's biggest advantage. Fleet-footed, carrying little more than an AK and a walkie-talkie, Taliban fighters could sail over the mountains.

The next morning we headed toward Solan, a village so unfriendly that when American soldiers airlifted in a bridge months earlier, it was burned down the next day. "We don't know if the Taliban burnt it or the villagers," Lt. David Patton, a tall, circumspect Texan with Task Force Warrior, said of the bridge in Solan. "Everyone believes in the mission," he added, "but there's an underlying thought that when we leave, it'll go back to the way it was." As Zabul's governor, Arman, had told me, Zabul's religious leaders all supported the Taliban, and in Afghanistan the most powerful platform is the minbar, a pulpit where the mullah delivers his Friday sermon. So although villagers were friendly when the Americans patrolled, they refused to help rebuild a school and a bazaar, for example, fearing retaliation from the Taliban who had destroyed them.

Shortly after we left the first village on our route to Solan, the Afghan soldiers began picking up Taliban radio chatter about the new Americans. Robbins was pleased. We were the bait, and the plan was working. We spread out along the gorge for a long, edgy march. Outside Solan, we met Sayed Ali Sheikh, an elder of the area, in whose compound the Americans had stayed before. He said he couldn't guarantee that the place wasn't rigged with explosives, but nevertheless he handed Robbins the key, showed us shrapnel the size of a skateboard that had ricocheted off a mountain when American planes dropped a 500-pound bomb — and vanished. In no time, the soldiers transformed Ali Sheikh's compound into a base of operations: satellite hookup to call the Air Force for cover, mortar base near the well, sniper positions.

Ten lean men in turbans came to meet Shields, who played his role as new commander somewhat awkwardly. A strange dialogue ensued, led by one of the 10 men, Haji Gailani, whose oversize glasses, gabardine vest and cane denoted authority. He said that they didn't deny Taliban fighters were nearby. "If you can catch those people, thank you," he said. "If you want to slaughter my neck, please do." There was a little nervous laughter. No, no, Shields said, of course not. Then Gailani said: "You have planes. You can hear the Taliban on your radios. And still you cannot force them out of here. How can we?"

Others began to speak up. Planes had attacked the mountains the night before, the men said. They had heard about the bombing of civilians in Kandahar. They wanted to know if they were about to be bombed. Robbins advised them to stay near the thickest walls and shut off the lights. Then they left.

And the waiting began. Pvt. Andrew Richards pulled out photos of his family, who lived in Colombia. Specialist Jonathon Routledge, whose voice still cracked and who couldn't believe he was roped into the Army by some cool recruitment videos, poked at a chick that was pecking at spilled tea. Shields and the medic climbed onto the compound roof to give coordinates in case of a medevac. Pvt. Jason Belford was so itchy that he played can-you-down-a-pack-of-crackers-in-two-minutes.

The radio began sputtering with Taliban voices. An Afghan policeman, who went by the code name No. 5, had found their frequency. He heard them discussing our compound. They knew everything: how many Americans and Afghans, the location of the mortar, the sniper positions, the satellite and the flower (code for me, the woman in the group). Presumably one of our earlier visitors was an informant. No. 5 seemed a little dodgy, too — perhaps working only for the troops, perhaps the Taliban, perhaps both.

Shields, Sgt. Jeff Griffin, Belford and a few others moved out to check the area around the compound for mines. Just as we neared the rock garden, a detonation jolted us. A deafening sound. A black smoke squall. Amazingly, no one was hurt. But something was wrong. They had been out to that rock garden twice and found nothing. Suspicion fell on No. 5.

"Fire a mortar," shouted one of the soldiers. Dan Guenther, a sniper from Texas, spotted something. Everyone assumed an imminent showdown. Someone threw a grenade into an outcropping to see if it was booby-trapped.

"If you're gonna come to the party, come already!" shouted Guenther. Then he suggested they should all run out in front of the house, smack their butts and provoke a fight. It was 6:42 p.m., and the light was fading. Shields and a few others popped out of the compound's shelter, hoping to draw fire. As darkness fell, I climbed up to talk to Specialist Tommy Glasgow, who was perched on the roof. He said that there was no way the Taliban would pick a fight after seeing all the U.S. fire power and listening to the bombers occasionally buzzing overhead. We talked about the mission in Zabul, and Glasgow said: "As bad as I don't want to be here, we should be. The Romanians are coming to take over from us, and the Taliban are just gonna cream 'em."

The fight never did come, and when we got back to the Alamo, the Americans were packing, and the Afghan police and soldiers appeared bewildered, convinced they would be dead in 24 hours. One policeman had already defected to the Taliban, I was told. "We'll be bombing this compound in a few weeks 'cause it'll be filled with Taliban," Hayes told me. He tried to find an hour every day to write in his diary. On May 12, for example, he had written: "I killed some people last night. Second squad is out looking for corpses right now. We got mortared right around dark ... when I was getting all the last stuff done for the day, and I got a hypoglycemic attack when I was doing sit-ups. It was still a good day, though. I got a lot done. Everyday I grow stronger."

A few days later, the Alamo was indeed abandoned by the Afghan forces.

The final draft of the U.S. military's latest counterinsurgency manual, written under the direction of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus and Lt. Gen. James Mattis, emphasizes that if you skimp on resources, endurance and meeting the population's security requirements, you lose. Yet for the past five years, the Pashtun provinces have been plagued by a lack of troops and resources. James Dobbins, President George W. Bush's former special envoy to Afghanistan, blames the White House, which he said had a predisposition against nation-building and international peacekeeping. The Bush administration rejected Afghan and State Department appeals to deploy a peacekeeping force in the provinces, dismissed European offers of troops and had already begun shifting military resources to Iraq, Dobbins told me, while U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to be limited to counterterrorism. "In manpower and money," he added, "this was the least resourced American nation-building effort in our history." In Afghanistan, the White House spent 25 times less per capita than in Bosnia and deployed one-fiftieth the troops. Much of the money that was pledged didn't show up for years. "The main lesson of Afghanistan is low input, low output," Dobbins said. "If you commit low levels of military manpower and economic assistance, what you get are low levels of security and economic growth."

The draft counterinsurgency manual is thoughtful, full of details and warnings like these: losing moral legitimacy means losing the war; the more force is used, the less effective it is; provoking combat usually plays into the enemy's hands; and building a government through illegitimate actions like unlawful detention and torture is self-defeating, even against fighters who conceal themselves among noncombatants.

Yet while I was in the south, I saw how readily vicious practices are condoned. An Afghan security official who insisted that I not use his name but who was an aide to a prominent southern governor, told of an instance when they couldn't find a boy suspected of plotting an attack. "We sent out a command — arrest all his brothers, uncles, cousins, relatives, all of them," he said. "When we arrested the relatives, no one knew what that boy was doing. Still we beat them all until they would shout, 'Write that we killed 5 or 10 people, whatever you want, and I will say anything.' " In Zabul's provincial capital, Qalat, the police proudly showed me three "Taliban" they had just captured. One of them had been beaten so badly he could hardly walk, and his feet were oozing puss. His eyes were mere wrinkles in swollen tissue. An American intelligence officer looked slightly embarrassed when he walked into the police station.

With a corrupt justice system, young Afghan men on the receiving end of injustice have often felt their honor could only be restored through acts of revenge. One night, a doctor introduced me to a young farmer who asked me not to use his name. He had been shot by U.S. forces in a gunfight a year earlier. Seven metal clamps were holding his leg in place. Though deeply religious, he never liked the Taliban regime. His family was relieved when Mullah Omar and the "Afghan Arabs" who first came to fight the Soviets in the 1980's fled Kandahar. He believed that Karzai and the international community would help build the country. "But they didn't," he said in the dark little flat where we met. "They just came to arrest the people." His father was a tribal leader with pomegranate orchards, and relatives often appealed to him to get their family members out of Afghan and American prisons. He would urge the Americans not to be fooled by false reports naming "Taliban." The real Taliban had mostly fled to Pakistan.

About a year and a half ago, he told me, a mine exploded next to an American convoy. His father was sitting in a mosque when he was rounded up by coalition troops. Twenty days later, his father's body was dropped off at a hospital. "I couldn't control myself," the young man said, nearly knocking over the gas lamp with his awkward, pogo-stick leg. "I wanted to avenge. I knew where the Taliban operated, because they would come at night, and so I found the commander of a small group. He welcomed me warmly and told me: 'It is the time of jihad. You are a lion and a hero.' "

Colonel Sturek, a powerfully built, blue-eyed Maryland man so cleanshaven that he appeared bald, and Governor Arman, a heavily bearded engineer, made an unlikely team. They shared a meal of sheep, rice and melon four times a week to talk strategy. Sturek loved Arman's vision of a network of roads by 2008, linking up Zabul's remote districts, where they would build schools and markets. Zabul straddled the most dangerous stretch of highway in Afghanistan. After 3 each afternoon, Taliban blocked the roads, looking for foreigners, money, spies, satellite phones. Sometimes they would just burn up buses or trucks. They even set loose a donkey on the path to an American base, rigged with rockets, mortars and a detonation card.

Across Afghanistan's southern provinces, American and Afghan troops were responding to the Taliban resurgence with Operation Mountain Thrust. In Zabul, the focus was on Taliban fighters in the Day Chopan mountains. Sturek's goal was to disable the Taliban leadership, allow the Americans to find weapons caches, bring in aid and persuade people that they had no intention of interfering with their religion. As the full moon moved into place last May, enabling a predawn landing, Afghan and American soldiers with Charlie Company, Special Forces and U.S. doctors air-assaulted into the Day Chopan mountains, taking scattered gunfire, and descended on the tiny village of Hazarbuz. Special Forces soldiers with goggled sniffer dogs rounded up the men, numbered their hands with markers and interrogated them. Some were arrested and flown back to base camp. I followed Jeff Griffin and his squad, who were dispatched to the villagers' homes with a message: Governor Arman is coming here to find out what you need, and a medical team has come to treat sick people and animals. This was typical of the American balancing act in Afghanistan. The Village Medical Outreach unit consists of reservist doctors who bring chests full of hygiene kits and medicine to villages that have just been raided by fighting forces.

We climbed up a hill through apricot and almond orchards to reach the scattered homes. We found a woman in a red velvet dress, who had beaded necklaces and a pair of scissors dangling from her neck. She said that the men were all sleeping. Then she said that they had left when we came. Griffin told her about the doctors, but she seemed frightened and said that she didn't want medical attention. We wandered from house to house until a radio call came in from an observation unit. They had seen a boy wearing black, possibly an informant, running toward one of the houses.

More climbing, more rocks, until we reached a wind-swept mountain top where an old crippled man emerged to hug Griffin, who hugged him back, uncomfortably — after all, he had come to search his house. He then ordered the boy in black to move to a clearing so the observation unit, on a nearby mountain, could see if he was the runner. The soldiers rummaged through the house, turning up small piles of paper and boxes that seemed suspect. It turned out that the boxes were full of snuff and the house was just a shop. As we were about to leave, the radio blared out to Griffin: Don't forget to tell them about the Village Medical Outreach.

As we rambled back down under the noonday sun, exhausted and thirsty, plucking apricots, almonds and mulberries off the trees, I remembered the Afghans I'd met complaining about Americans pillaging their harvest. It wasn't hard to see how a few apricots could transmute into theft or how speaking to a woman after you have rounded up all the men could transmute into "Americans are abusing our women." One afternoon, I had a car accident in Zabul. Within minutes, some 100 men pulled over and began heaving the wreck out of the ditch. As I crouched in the dirt wrapped in a tentlike Kuchi shawl, not a single man glanced my way. Rather, they asked my wounded translator if his wife was O.K. Someone must have sensed a foreigner, however, because 10 minutes after we left for the hospital, the Taliban showed up. They pummeled the driver, demanding to know what happened to the foreigner. He lied and saved his life. But that moment, when not one person glanced my way, offered a window into how seriously they abide by rules that are utterly alien to a 19-year-old American soldier. Sturek constantly struggled with pushing "cultural sensitivity" down the chain of command. It was nearly impossible.

On our long walk back down the mountain, two privates were trying to grapple with the contingencies of their lives, free will, U.S. history and America's intangible objectives. They were having an existential moment and craving a meal at Red Lobster. This valley in Zabul reminded one of them, Specialist Joshua Pete, of canyons where the U.S. Army once fought his Navajo ancestors. Pete thought he had had a calling, that his country needed him. But because of Afghanistan, he had lost both his scholarship to Dartmouth and his fiancée. He didn't believe in "this" anymore. Half the Afghans, he said, didn't even want "our billions to build this country." He wanted to be home fighting drug gangs in downtown L.A. or helping impoverished people in Flagstaff.

Back in the village of Hazarbuz, I found Governor Arman in his white robes, blazer and turban, sipping tea with Colonel Sturek. After one week, the governor said, once we were all gone, the Taliban would punish the people for sitting with Americans and the governor. Sturek agreed, but added that if the Americans didn't come, the people would have no idea there was an alternative.

Men and boys filtered down to meet the governor. They sat cross-legged, skeptical, nervous. Arman was an earthy man, and while kind ("Tell anyone who has run to the mountains to come talk, there'll be no trouble. I am your governor. Why am I here? To hear your problems."), he also let them have it.

"Look at your kids," he said, pointing to the boys. The men did, and he winced. "Look at their hands and feet, the infections on their skin, their bad education. Everyone looks sick. Don't they have the right to be educated?

"Are the Punjabi kids in this situation?" he then asked, referring to the children of the ruling ethnic group in Pakistan. "Why do people call it jihad here in Afghanistan? Why don't they fight this jihad in Quetta and Pakistan? We need to defend our country from the Punjabis."

He told them that this war was a Pakistani drama. The Pakistanis were sending Taliban to burn Afghan schools while their own children were being educated. If America leaves, he warned, you will all be slaves of Pakistan.

Over the three days we stayed, Arman's speeches grew harsher, and the men who visited him and Sturek grew more numerous and more attentive. The governor and the colonel could pick out the Taliban informants — like the young man with good sneakers whom everyone deferred to. Jin Kong radios, which work with solar power, batteries or a hand crank, were handed out by the U.S. military to the locals. The elders got bicycles; kids, school bags with pencils and other supplies.

Why did these Americans come here, the governor bellowed? Because the Taliban had not been nice with the people of this country. The Taliban beat the women, cut the heads off people, went to the north and made tribal enmity for Afghan people. How many Hazara, he asked, were killed in Shajoy (a district of Zabul)? Taliban had slaughtered hundreds of Hazara, an ethnic group descended from the Mongols and primarily Shiite. Arman repeated the accounts of Taliban cutting the throat of a little girl in front of her mother, then killing the mother, of the Taliban putting a gun in the mouth of a boy, who began to suck it and then they shot him. "Don't you have sons?" he asked. Some of the men averted their eyes, fidgeting in the dust.

On one occasion, Arman asked the men who had come if any among them could read and write. He held up a paper with the word God written on it. None of them could read. "If you can't read the name of God, you are blind," he said. Trying to raise their Pashtun pride, he pointed to one of the interpreters, a Hazara from the neighboring district of Jaghori. "What is your district like?" he asked the interpreter, who dutifully reported it had 72 schools, 32 of them high schools, and that all boys and girls were educated. They had electricity, radio stations, lawyers and engineers. "Why are we Pashtuns always fighting?" asked the governor. "You will all be laborers to the Jaghori people because you are illiterate and uneducated."

Perhaps, but the men wanted to know when their relatives would be let out of U.S. prisons in Kandahar and Bagram. And then a rocket exploded, then another, then gunfire began to echo back and forth between the valley walls. I trekked up to where snipers were perched on a small slope in front of a boulder. On the radio, we could hear Shields, who had taken some men and gone to patrol a valley. He was amazingly calm. "We're under fire," he said. "We're in a riverbed on the side of a hill." In fact, they were pinned down in an irrigation ditch with bullets throwing up dust and rocks all around them. An A-10 Warthog screeched across the sky as a 500-pound bomb smacked the side of the mountain.

We could still hear Shields breathing as he walked up the mountain. And that oddly calm voice: "We're definitely putting ourselves at a disadvantage. Pretty much anywhere I'm standing they could take us out."

A donkey began braying as the full moon drifted up above the mountains. Capt. Craig Johnson told Lieutenant Shields to watch out because shadows would cast long with that moon.

The Taliban, judging from the radio communications we were monitoring, seemed to be wounded and out of ammunition. One of them invited another to prayer. The other demurred, saying he was worried that he would be spotted. "O.K., then pray there, and I'll pray here," the first man said. Later, when I met a Taliban commander in Pakistan, he told me that they knew the Americans listened to their radios, so that the five daily prayers were often used as code to signal anything from "I've run out of food" to "Ambush them."

DOJ_NMG_0087986

The next afternoon, we flew by helicopter to Andar, a nearby village. I sat in the fields with a former teacher named Anwarjan. The governor had appointed him district chief for all of Day Chopan, but Anwarjan could barely travel. The entire province, he said, was Taliban. Still, he was busy with Shields getting hundreds of kids to school in the central town. He had convinced the parents that Pakistan wants their children to stay wild and uneducated. "I have 300 students now," he said. "They're changed. They are polite, greet people, treat their mothers well. One man can change a generation."

But his efforts, he said, were being undermined by the constant incursions of Taliiban from Pakistan. "The leader of Day Chopan, Mullah Kahar, lives in Quetta," in Pakistan, Anwarjan said. "All the heads are there. So why don't you do anything?"

U.S. intelligence knows the same thing. As Seth Jones, an analyst with Rand, told The New York Times earlier this year, Pakistani intelligence agents are advising the Taliban about coalition plans and tactical operations and provide housing, support and security for Taliban leaders. Sturek told me that the U.S. is well aware that the Taliban heads are in Quetta. On one side, he said, most U.S. policy makers argue that the Pakistanis are our friends. On the other side are those, including some in the military, who say, "Let's just drive into Quetta."

I often received updates from Charlie Company soldiers after leaving Afghanistan. One of their platoon was killed heading up to an observation post in Day Chopan. After they pulled out of Day Chopan, one of the soldiers told me, they heard that things weren't going so well and that the Taliban were using the fact that the Romanians had taken over to claim the Russians were back. And another soldier wrote: "Our platoon got sent to a National Guard unit to help them out. They've lost like six people in the last week, but none of them were from our platoon.We were in Kandahar for a little while to get resupplied, and you're notkidding about the Canadians going down.We kept having to go to the big ceremonies for their bodies to get loaded on the plane.It seemed like they were getting messed up pretty bad. I definitely don't get the whole 'success story' thing."

With Army Stretched Thin, Could The U.S. Respond To A New Crisis? (HC)

By Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, October 29, 2006

Retired general says deployments put America in 'strategic peril'

FORT HOOD — At this sprawling base on the Central Texas plains, a few hundred soldiers of the 17,000-member 1st Cavalry Division made tearful goodbyes to family members before making another trip to Iraq this month.

On the other side of Fort Hood, soldiers of the 4th Infantry Division trickled back from Iraq at the end of a bloody, yearlong deployment that left scores of their buddies dead and hundreds more wounded.

The quick pace of comings and goings is evidence of an Army strained to the breaking point, with little in reserve if the United States is forced to respond to a new crisis, according to military analysts.

"One third of our combat units are in Iraq and Afghanistan, and they are the best troops we've ever fielded, but essentially every other brigade is not ready to fight," said retired Maj. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, who makes frequent trips to Iraq as a military consultant.

"America is in a period of strategic peril," he added. "What happens if we have to confront North Korea or Iran?"

Paul Rieckhoff, a former Army captain in Iraq who heads Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, said his organization has gathered extensive evidence that has convinced him the Army is nearing a crisis.

"The rate of deployment is absolutely not sustainable," he said. "We are mortgaging the future of the Army. If this goes on much longer, we are going to get a post-Vietnam-type hangover in the military."

After Vietnam, the Army was called the "hollow force," afflicted with inadequate troop levels, training and equipment, leading to most of its units being rated unfit for combat, military analyst James Jay Carafano of the Heritage Foundation said.

Some military leaders in Washington as well as in Fort Hood, however, said the Army is adapting to pressure on staffing and other aspects of its operation and that the military would be able to muster an appropriate response to another trouble spot in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0087987

The U.S. Army, with a total active force of a half-million, supplies the overwhelming majority of the more than 150,000 service personnel in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker indicated the number probably will remain the same through 2010.

"The problem is simple: Our military is designed to win wars quickly, not occupy foreign countries for extended periods," said Carafano.

Military on the defenseGen. Peter Pace, the head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, conceded last week that the Army and Marines were being forced to deploy more often than the ideal of two years home for every year in a combat zone.

"We are using the force faster than we would like to," he said. "That does not mean that they're not available to go to the next fight."

Pace said troops in combat had all the equipment needed, and units not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan do not.

"It is true that our units that are here at home are not fully equipped as they would be if there wasn't a war going on," he said. "But none of our potential enemies should miscalculate the capacity of this nation to generate overwhelming combat power tomorrow to defend our national interests."

The repeated deployments to combat zones are causing some senior non-commissioned officers, who are considered the backbone of the Army, to reassess their careers. "We were willing to go to war to defend the country. But when we got in the Army, the idea wasn't to be deployed overseas every other year indefinitely," said Perry Jeffries, 45, of Killeen , a former Army first sergeant who got out after a deployment to Iraq.

Pressures on familiesCol. Larry Phelps, a 28-year veteran, said soldiers entering today's Army understand what is being asked of them. Most embrace it, he said.

"This isn't the Cold War Army anymore," he said. Phelps said the Army today is actually in better shape than it was in the decade after the Vietnam War when he joined.

"I joined the Army in 1978. That was a broken Army," he said. "It was twice the size of the Army we have today, but it was not capable of doing the things we can do today."

Still, the veterans association's Rieckhoff said his group has gathered substantial anecdotal evidence of the strain on soldiers and their families.

"What we are hearing over and over again from senior sergeants and junior officers is that the toll on families is terrible," Rieckhoff said. "Our people don't like to whine in public, but to us they talk about divorces, alcohol abuse, depression."

The anecdotal testimony of strain on families is backed by figures compiled by the Pentagon. Divorce rates among the roughly 55,000 married Army officers tripled to 6 percent between 2002 and 2004. Though the numbers are relatively small, suicides are rising in the Army: In 2005, 83 soldiers committed suicide, compared with 67 in 2004 and 60 in 2003.

Senior officers of the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood strenuously object to any suggestion that their unit is overtaxed by the war.

"At the pace we are on right now, this is a sustainable force," said Brig. Gen. Vincent Brooks, one of two deputy commanders of the division. "I don't think we are at the point of erosion."

Phelps said the Army is more responsive to the pressures on families with the high rate of deployments. He is assigned to stay at Fort Hood while the division deploys to Iraq and work on issues that arise with families of the force's 17,000 troops.

Juggling two battlesBut ample evidence shows that the Army is scrambling to cope with the demands of Iraq and Afghanistan:

•The Army has forced about 75,000 soldiers since 2003 to continue serving after their enlistments ended, a policy called "stop loss." That has applied mostly to units slated to deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan. Now, 11,000 soldiers are serving beyond the term of their enlistments. Of course, the military has extensively tapped Reserve and National Guard units to augment military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

•The Army, to keep hitting enlistment targets, has increased financial incentives, added many more recruiters, raised the age of eligible enlistees (from 35 to 40 in January, then to 42 in June) and taken more enlistees who were considered marginal before because of past legal problems.

DOJ_NMG_0087988

•The Pentagon has increasingly relied on contractors in Iraq, with more than 35,000 working there now, mainly in food services, transportation and construction. Some Navy and Air Force personnel also are being pressed into jobs such as driving trucks into Iraq that usually would have been assigned to ground forces.

Military experts said the stressful deployment rate is a result of an Army cut too deep, too fast since the end of the Cold War.

About 504,000 soldiers were in the active-duty Army last week, according to the Pentagon. That compares with nearly 800,000 during peacetime 20 years ago. Since then, the Army was reduced from 18 divisions to 12, then 10.

"We have the smallest army America has fielded since 1939, when the pre-World War II buildup began," McCaffrey said.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the consensus in Washington was that the military could be reduced to reap a "peace dividend."

Military planners believed that high-tech weaponry rather than "boots on the ground" was critical, leading to further cuts. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld came into office in 2001 with a commitment to continuing the transformation.

Spanning the globeOf those half-million soldiers, roughly two-thirds are in support roles and can't simply be rotated in and out of Iraq. Tens of thousands are needed in other overseas posts, from Korea to Djibouti to Bosnia. Thousands of others, including recruiters and trainers, are permanently based in the United States.

The assignment of fighting street-by-street battles with insurgents in Iraq has fallen mainly on the Army, and the much smaller but also greatly stressed U.S. Marine Corps, more than the Navy or Air Force, which have been solely in supportive roles since the fall of Baghdad.

Experts said there are no easy solutions to the strains. The Pentagon, beginning in 2004, has reconfigured the existing pool of troops into brigade combat teams of about 4,000 soldiers as a way to get more soldiers into the deployment rotations for Iraq. There are 36 such teams available to deploy. The Army is aiming to increase that to 43 within a couple of years.

Even if the Army added 80,000 soldiers, as Congress proposes to do, it would take years before more brigades would be ready for combat, at a cost of billions of dollars.

But in the long term, analysts said, the United States has to make a significant financial commitment to maintain a military capable of protecting the country and intervening abroad when necessary.

At the height of the Vietnam War, American taxpayers spent 9.4 percent of the gross domestic product on the military. Twenty years ago, during peacetime, 6.2 percent of the GDP was channeled to the Pentagon. That had fallen to 3 percent by 2001. It is now back up to about 4 percent, or roughly $400 billion annually.

"We need to spend about 4 percent of the GDP on the military for the next decade to fix it," Carafano said. "That should be something America can do."

‘Antiwar’ And Other Fighting Words (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON

DEMOCRATS have spent three decades trying to exorcise the ghost of Senator George S. McGovern, whose losing 1972 presidential campaign calling for a withdrawal from Vietnam crystallized his party’s image as soft on national defense.

But surveying the midterm elections last week, Mr. McGovern, 84, said he sees an opportunity for an antiwar campaign in the 2008 presidential race.

“I would love to be running again if I were 25 years younger,” he said in an interview from his Montana home. “I think I would win.”

On the eve of the midterms, dismay over the Iraq war has propelled the Democrats to a political status they have not enjoyed since before Mr. McGovern: for the first time in decades, polls show that the public trusts Democrats as much as Republicans to handle foreign affairs.

But as they look ahead, Democrats are torn between two visions of their history. Some potential candidates in the 2008 Democratic primary and many liberal activists argue that the Republican responsibility for the Iraq war has, in effect, freed the Democrats from Mr. McGovern's legacy. They say the 2006 elections will provide a mandate for a new antiwar argument: that troops can be pulled from Iraq in order to shore up American security elsewhere in the world.

Other strategists and political scientists argue that the Iraq war has given the Democrats a different opportunity to lay to rest their McGovernite image, in part by rejecting calls for a quick withdrawal in Iraq.

"All voters are doing is giving Democrats a chance, and we better not blow it," said Gary Hart, the former senator and presidential candidate.

A younger McGovern could probably win the Democratic primary, Mr. Hart said, but he would still lose the general election. "Just running on a platform of 'get us out of Iraq' is not going to solve the Democrats' problem on the issue of national security," he said.

After Vietnam, there was a brief time when both parties seemed to compete to be seen as the party of restraint: the moment in the 1976 presidential race when Senator Bob Dole, the Republican nominee for vice president, charged that the "Democrat wars" of the 20th century had killed or wounded "1.6 million Americans, enough to fill the city of Detroit."

But the Iranian hostage crisis three years later put an end to that short peace fad. And ever since President Ronald Reagan's campaign for a military buildup, Democrats have suffered from a reputation as the party that was less sure to keep America safe. Their only presidential victories were in the years of relative peace between the end of the cold war and the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11.

During the midterm campaigns, Democrats have risen in the polls merely by attacking President Bush's conduct of the war. They have not spelled out or agreed on a clear alternative of their own.

That luxury, however, is coming to an end. On Nov. 8, the day after the election, attention will shift toward the 2008 presidential race. How to handle Iraq could be the defining issue of the Democratic primary, and criticizing President Bush may not count for much in the general election since the Republican nominee may also be a vocal critic of his administration's handling of the war.

Pleasing the party's "bring 'em home" base while burnishing its security credentials may not be easy. A USA Today poll released Friday showed that more than 80 percent of the public expects Democrats to set a timetable for a withdrawal from Iraq if they take control of Congress. But so far none of Democratic Congressional leaders has called for a fixed deadline.

And although all the potential primary candidates — and President Bush for that matter — say they want the troops home as soon as possible, on the question of a timetable, their views could hardly be more disparate.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the most prominent candidate, has rejected any timetable for withdrawal. Senator John Kerry, the 2004 nominee, and Senator Russell Feingold of Wisconsin have already called for a fixed deadline.

Many Democrats, Mr. Feingold argued, have made a "serious mistake" by getting caught up in the party's Vietnam history. Fearing Mr. McGovern's fate, they are stuck in what he called "the Iraq trap."

"They think if somebody calls for a timetable to get out of Iraq they will be labeled as 'cut and run,' " Mr. Feingold said. Democratic gains in the 2006 elections, he said, will show that the public accepts the broader argument for a pullout from Iraq in order to fight terrorism more effectively elsewhere in the world.

Kevin Mattson, a liberal historian at Ohio University, argued that the comparisons to the McGovern campaign were misleading and "goofy."

For one thing, unlike critics of the Iraq war, neither Mr. McGovern nor any other prominent Democrat opposed the Vietnam War because it was an impediment to the fight against Communism — an argument that would have been hard to make at that advanced stage of the cold war. Advisers to Vice President Hubert Humphrey urged him to make such a case in 1968 but he refused, Mr. Mattson said.

Others, however, argued that letting their victories this year eclipse the McGovern experience may be the biggest risk that Democrats face in 2008. "My concern is that some Democrats will learn the wrong lessons from our victory," Senator Joe Biden of Delaware said.

Noting the number of conservative Democratic challengers this fall, he said that voters are seeking "a bipartisan consensus" about how to leave more than chaos and instability in Iraq. "A pullout is not a plan," Mr. Biden said, "it is a reaction." What sealed the Democrats' image after Vietnam, historians say, was not just Mr. McGovern's campaign but also their reaction as public opinion turned on the war. After 1968, Democrats in Congress began pressing to curtail the war or cut off its financing. And their efforts reached a peak after the post-Watergate midterm election of 1974, when many Democrats interpreted their landslide gains as a mandate to cut back on national defense.

No one is making similar proposals today. But James M. Lindsay, a director of the Robert S. Strauss for International Security and Law at the University of Texas in Austin and a former national security official in the Clinton administration, said big wins in 2006 may well embolden antiwar Democrats in 2008, while pulling "centrists" like Mrs. Clinton closer to withdrawal.

"But there are going to be a lot of Democratic strategists whispering in their ears that 'you don't want to go there' because it is bad politics, and it is bad policy to boot," he said. "The problem is you also have to win the general election. You don't need to appeal to people who have made up their mind and had a bumper sticker on the back of their car for the last four years."

Mr. McGovern, for his part, said the debate reminded him of the way Republicans used to accuse Democrats of being weak on Communism, even though containment was a Democratic idea. "I sure hope we are not going to have 50 years of being weak on terrorism in the eyes of Republicans," he said.

Are We The Mongols Of The Information Age? (LAT)

Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

The future of U.S. power rests in its Industrial Age military adapting to decentralized adversaries.

GREAT POWERS cease to be great for many reasons. In addition to the causes frequently debated — economics, culture, disease, geography — there is an overarching trend. Over the last 500 years, the fate of nations has been increasingly tied to their success, or lack thereof, in harnessing revolutions in military affairs.

These are periods of momentous change when new technologies combine with new doctrines and new forms of organization to transform not only the face of battle but also the nature of the state and of the international system. Because we are in the middle of the fourth major revolution since 1500 — the Information Revolution — it is important to grasp the nature and consequences of these upheavals.

Until the 15th century, the mightiest military forces belonged to the Mongols. But strong as they were in the days of bows and arrows, the Mongols could not keep pace with the spread of gunpowder weapons and the rise of centralized governments that used them. They fell behind, and Europe surged to the forefront. In 1450, Europeans controlled just 15% of the world's surface. By 1914 — following not only the Gunpowder Revolution but also the first Industrial Revolution — their domain had swollen to an astounding 84% of the globe.

Not all European states were equal, of course. Some early leaders in gunpowder technology — for instance, Spain and Portugal — were also-rans when industrialization began in the 18th century. At least Spain and Portugal managed to maintain their independence. Numerous others — from Poland to the Italian city-states — were not so lucky. They endured prolonged occupation by foreigners more skilled than they were at new forms of warfare.

The big winners of the Gunpowder Revolution (from roughly 1500 to 1700) were the northern European states, from Britain to Russia. But the Romanovs, Habsburgs and Ottomans did not survive the cataclysmic conflict of the first Industrial Age — World War I — and their empires collapsed, even as Germany and Japan were catapulting themselves into the upper rank of nation-states largely through their growing military expertise. World War II — the major conflict of the second Industrial Revolution, defined by the internal combustion engine, airplane and radio — further shook up the international balance of power.

The conventional assumption is that the outcome of World War II was virtually foreordained: The Allies won because they were bigger and richer than the Axis. There is some truth to this. But by 1942, Germany, Italy and Japan controlled most of the natural resources of East Asia and Europe. This would have allowed them to match the Allies if they had been more adept at marshaling their military and economic power. The Soviet Union and the United States — the biggest beneficiaries of the second Industrial Revolution — did a better job not just in managing wartime production. They also grabbed the lead in the use of such key weapons as the tank (the Soviet Union) and the long-range bomber and aircraft carrier (the U.S.). There are many reasons why once-dominant powers such as France and Britain had become second-tier ones by 1945, but central among them was their failure to exploit advances in weaponry during the inter-war years.

DOJ_NMG_0087991

The Information Revolution of the late 20th century upset the seemingly stable postwar order. The Soviet Union had no Silicon Valley and could not compete with the United States in incorporating the computer into its economic or military spheres. U.S. prowess at waging war in the Information Age was showcased in the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which, along with the collapse of the Soviet empire, left the United States standing alone as a global hegemon.

But if history teaches any lesson, it is that no military lead is ever safe. Challengers will always find a way to copy or buy the best weapons systems or develop tactics that will offset their effect. Our most formidable enemies, Al Qaeda and its ilk, have done both. They are using relatively simple information technology — the Internet, satellite television, cellphones — to organize a global insurgency. By using such weapons as hijacked airliners and bombs detonated by garage-door openers, they are finding cracks in our defenses.

We have an insurmountable advantage in high-end military hardware. No other state is building nuclear-powered aircraft carriers, stealth fighters or unmanned aerial vehicles. In fact, we spend more on the development and testing of new weapons — $71 billion this year — than any other country spends on its entire defense. But all that spending produces weapons systems that aren't much good for pacifying Baghdad or Kandahar.

Technology isn't irrelevant to the global war on terror. We can use powerful surveillance systems to break up terrorist plots. And "smart bombs" can be invaluable for dealing with the perpetrators. But our enemies can stymie multibillion-dollar spy platforms by using couriers instead of satellite phones, which helps explain why Osama bin Laden remains on the loose.

New revolutions in military affairs, possibly centered on biotechnology and cyber-war, promise to give smaller states or sub-state actors more destructive capacity. Imagine the havoc that could be caused by a genetically engineered contagion combining the worst properties of, say, smallpox and the Ebola virus. Or imagine how much damage our enemies could inflict by using computer viruses — or directed-energy weapons — to immobilize critical bits of our civilian or military computer networks. In theory, it's possible to crash stock markets, send airliners plowing into the ground and blind our most advanced weapons systems.

The most threatening weapon of all harks back to an earlier military revolution. Nuclear bombs haven't been used since 1945, but given their proliferation around the world, it will only be a matter of time. Our scientific sophistication gives us a reasonable chance of shooting down a nuclear-tipped missile, but a nuclear suitcase smuggled into the U.S. would be much harder to detect.

To stop such stealthy threats, we need to get much better at human intelligence, counterinsurgency, information operations and related disciplines. We need more speakers of Arabic and Pashto, more experts who understand tribal relations in Iraq's Anbar province and Pakistan's Northwest Frontier province, more diplomats who can win over audiences on Al Jazeera. And we need to set them loose without having to worry about a burdensome bureaucracy micromanaging their every move.

It may sound melodramatic, but the future of U.S. power rests on our ability to remake a government still structured for Industrial Age warfare to do battle with decentralized adversaries in the Information Age. After all, aren't we the mightiest, richest nation in history? How could our hegemony possibly be endangered? That's what previous superpowers thought too. But their dominance lasted only until they missed a revolutionary turn in military technology and tactics.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Businesses Seek Protection On Legal Front (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28 — Frustrated with laws and regulations that have made companies and accounting firms more open to lawsuits from investors and the government, corporate America — with the encouragement of the Bush administration — is preparing to fight back.

Now that corruption cases like Enron and WorldCom are falling out of the news, two influential industry groups with close ties to administration officials are hoping to swing the regulatory pendulum in the opposite direction. The groups are drafting proposals to provide broad new protections to corporations and accounting firms from criminal cases brought by federal and state prosecutors as well as a stronger shield against civil lawsuits from investors.

Although the details are still being worked out, the groups' proposals aim to limit the liability of accounting firms for the work they do on behalf of clients, to force prosecutors to target individual wrongdoers rather than entire companies, and to scale back shareholder lawsuits.

The groups hope to reduce what they see as some burdens imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, landmark post-Enron legislation adopted in 2002. The law, which placed significant new auditing and governance requirements on companies, gave broad discretion for interpretation to the Securities and Exchange Commission. The groups are also interested in rolling back rules and policies that have been on the books for decades.

To alleviate concerns that the new Congress may not adopt the proposals — regardless of which party holds power in the legislative branch next year — many are being tailored so that they could be adopted through rulemaking by the S.E.C. and enforcement policy changes at the Justice Department.

The proposals will begin to be laid out in public shortly after Election Day, members of the groups said in recent interviews. One of the committees was formed by the United States Chamber of Commerce and until recently was headed by Robert K. Steel.

Mr. Steel was sworn in last Friday as the new Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance, and he is the senior official in the department who will be formulating the Treasury's views on the issues being studied by the two groups.

The second committee was formed by the Harvard Law professor Hal S. Scott, along with R. Glenn Hubbard, a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers for President Bush, and John L. Thornton, a former president of Goldman Sachs, where he worked with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

That group has colloquially become known around Washington as the Paulson Committee because the relatively new Treasury secretary issued an encouraging statement when it was formed last month. But administration officials said Friday that he was not playing a role in the group's deliberations.

Its members include Donald L. Evans, a former commerce secretary who remains a close friend of President Bush; Samuel A. DiPiazza Jr., chief executive of PricewaterhouseCoopers, the accounting giant; Robert R. Glauber, former chairman and chief executive of the National Association of Securities Dealers, the private group that oversees the securities industry; and the chief executives of DuPont, Office Depot and the CIT Group.

Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman at the Treasury Department, said on Friday that no decision had been made about which recommendations would be supported by the administration.

"While the department always wants to hear new ideas from academic and industry thought leaders, especially to encourage the strength of the U.S. capital markets, Treasury is not a member of these committees and is not collaborating on any findings," Ms. Zuccarelli said.

But another official and committee members noted that Mr. Paulson had recently pressed the groups in private discussions to complete their work so it could be rolled out quickly after the November elections.

Moreover, committee members say that they expect many of their recommendations will be used as part of an overall administration effort to limit what they see as overzealous state prosecutions by such figures as the New York State attorney general Elliot Spitzer and abusive class action lawsuits by investors. The groups will also attempt to lower what they see as the excessive costs associated with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Their critics, however, see the effort as part of a plan to cater to the most well-heeled constituents of the administration and insulate politically connected companies from prosecution at the expense of investors.

One consideration in drafting the proposals has been the chain of events at Arthur Andersen, the accounting firm that was convicted in 2002 of obstruction of justice for shredding Enron-related documents; the conviction was overturned in 2005 by the Supreme Court. The proposals being drafted would aim to limit the liability of auditing firms and include a policy shift to make it harder for prosecutors to bring cases against individuals and companies.

Even though Arthur Andersen played a prominent role in various corporate scandals, some business and legal experts have criticized the decision by the Bush administration to bring a criminal case that had the effect of shutting the firm down.

The proposed policies would emphasize the prosecution of culpable individuals rather than corporations and auditing firms. That shift could prove difficult for prosecutors because it is often harder to find sufficient evidence to show that specific people at a company were the ones who knowingly violated a law.

One proposal would recommend that the Justice Department sharply curtail its policy of forcing companies under investigation to withhold paying the legal fees of executives suspected of violating the law. Another one would require some investor lawsuits to be handled by arbitration panels, which are traditionally friendlier to defendants.

In an interview last week with Bloomberg News, Mr. Paulson repeated his criticism of the Sarbanes-Oxley law. While it had done some good, he said, it had contributed to "an atmosphere that has made it more burdensome for companies to operate."

Mr. Paulson also repeated a line from his first speech, given at Columbia Business School last August, where he said, "Often the pendulum swings too far and we need to go through a period of readjustment."

Some experts see Mr. Paulson's complaint as a step backward.

"This is an escalation of the culture war against regulation," said James D. Cox, a securities and corporate law professor at Duke Law School. He said many of the proposals, if adopted, "would be a dark day for investors."

Professor Cox, who has studied 600 class action lawsuits over the last decade, said it was difficult to find "abusive or malicious" cases, particularly in light of new laws and court decisions that had made it more difficult to file such suits.

The number of securities class action lawsuits has dropped substantially in each of the last two years, he noted, arguing that the impact of the proposals from the business groups would be that "very few people would be prosecuted."

People involved in the committees said that the timing of the proposals was being dictated by the political calendar: closely following Election Day and as far away as possible from the 2008 elections.

Mr. Hubbard, who is now dean of Columbia Business School, said the committee he helps lead would focus on the lack of proper economic foundation for a number of regulations. Most changes will be proposed through regulation, he said, because "the current political environment is simply not ripe for legislation."

But the politics of changing the rules do not break cleanly along party lines. While some prominent Democrats would surely attack the pro-business efforts, there are others who in the past have been sympathetic.

People involved in the committees' work said that their objective was to improve the attractiveness of American capital-raising markets by scaling back rules whose costs outweigh their benefits.

"We think the legal liability issues are the most serious ones," said Professor Scott, the director of the committee singled out by Mr. Paulson. "Companies don't want to use our markets because of what they see as the substantial, and in their view excessive, liability."

Committee officials disputed the notion that they were simply catering to powerful business interests seeking to benefit from loosening regulations that could wind up hurting investors.

"It's unfortunate to the extent that this has been politicized," said Robert E. Litan, a former Justice Department official and senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who is overseeing the committee's legal liability subgroup. "The objectives are clearly not to gut such reforms as Sarbanes-Oxley. I'm for cost-effective regulation."

The main Sarbanes-Oxley provision that both committees are focusing on is a part that is commonly called Section 404, which requires audits of companies' internal financial controls. Some business experts praise this section as having made companies more transparent and better managed, but many smaller companies call the section too costly and unnecessary.

Members of the two committees said that they had reached a consensus that Section 404, along with greater threat of investor lawsuits and government prosecutions, had discouraged foreign companies from issuing new stock on exchanges in the United States in recent months.

The committee members said that an increase in stock offerings abroad was evidence that the American liability system and tougher auditing standards were taking a toll on the competitiveness of American markets. But others see different reasons for the trend and few links to liability and accounting rules.

Bill Daley, a former commerce secretary in the Clinton administration who is the co-chairman of the Chamber of Commerce group, expects proposed changes to liability standards for accounting firms and corporations to draw the most flak.

But he said that the changes affecting accounting firms are of paramount importance to prevent the further decline in competition. Only four major firms were left after Andersen's collapse.

Another contentious issue concerns a proposal to eliminate the use of a broadly written and long-established anti-fraud rule, known as Rule 10b-5, that allows shareholders to sue companies for fraud. The change could be accomplished by a vote of the S.E.C.

John C. Coffee, a professor of securities law at Columbia Law School and an adviser to the Paulson Committee, said that he had recommended that the S.E.C. adopt the exception to Rule 10b-5 so that only the commission could bring such lawsuits against corporations.

But other securities law experts warned that such a move would extinguish a fundamental check on corporate malfeasance.

"It would be a shocking turning back to say only the commission can bring fraud cases," said Harvey J. Goldschmid, a former S.E.C. commissioner and law professor at Columbia University. "Private enforcement is a necessary supplement to the work that the S.E.C. does. It is also a safety valve against the potential capture of the agency by industry."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ehrlich Bristles At Probe Questions (BSUN)

By Andrew A. Green, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, October 29, 2006

Aide subpoenaed by U.S. attorney over slots in 2004

Ehrlich angered by probe questions

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. acknowledged yesterday that a top aide received subpoenas from federal prosecutors investigating in 2004 what published reports said was the influence of slot-machine gambling interests in Annapolis, an admission that led to a demand by his Democratic opponent that the administration release full details of the probe.

The legal requests came from the office of then-U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio, who had been recommended for the post by Ehrlich.

The subpoenas were issued to Paul E. Schurick, the governor's communications director and one of the key figures in Ehrlich's attempts to legalize slot machines, and were first reported this month by The Washington Post. Schurick received the requests on June 2 and June 16 in 2004 as part of a probe into gambling, the paper said, adding that the governor's press office - still run by Schurick - would not comment on them.

Responding to a question from a caller on Stateline with Governor Ehrlich on WBAL radio yesterday, the governor for the first time spoke publicly about the inquiry.

"Paul cooperated, produced everything that they wanted and nothing came of it," said Ehrlich, responding to the caller.

Later in the day, when asked for more details about what his office had provided to investigators, Ehrlich said, "How would I know?" and added that the line of questioning was prompted by a Democratic Party memo distributed last week. It could not be learned whether federal prosecutors were targeting specific individuals in their investigation.

Democratic Party spokesman David Paulson denied that any "memo or e-mail on this sordid episode" was distributed.

A spokesman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor, said Ehrlich's acknowledgement that his communications chief received a subpoena is further evidence that the governor did nothing to eliminate the "culture of corruption" he campaigned against four years ago.

"There are all these criminal investigations, and they just cover them up," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney. "There's this one that they hid for two years. There's the federal investigation of governor's deputy chief of staff [Edward B. Miller, who created a compay that lobbyist Jack Abramoff said he used to launder money]. ... There's the federal investigation into the governor's top fundraiser [Richard E. Hug] setting up secret nonprofits. ... Taxpayers deserve answers - and they deserve better."

There is no indication that Miller and Hug are the subject of current investigations, although Miller's company received a subpoena in the Abramoff probe, and Hug's slots-related fundraising activities were examined by federal investigators.

Ehrlich has supported a slots bill in each of his four years, but the House of Delegates killed it every time. With millions of dollars of profits at stake, the gambling and horse racing industries have spent heavily in Annapolis - making $700,000 in campaign donations in the five years prior to 2004, according to a Common Cause study, and spending up to $600,000 yearly on lobbyists.

A month before DiBiagio subpoenaed Schurick, he wrote a memo to his staff pressuring them to aggressively pursue public corruption cases. The meeting agenda, obtained by The Sun, said DiBiagio wanted "three 'front-page' indictments" by that November to cement his office's status as a premier investigative agency.

About a month after Schurick was contacted, DiBiagio's powers to investigate public corruption were severely curtailed by a new directive from his bosses who said that officials with the Bush administration Justice Department in Washington had to approve any such investigations.

The caller to WBAL who raised the issue - who identified himself only as "Leo" - questioned the timing and asked Ehrlich if anyone in the governor's administration or on the governor's behalf intervened to quash the investigation, a suggestion that drew Ehrlich's anger.

"The timing of it was very coincidental, because as you know, Mr. Schurick was subpoenaed in June of 2004, and then it was about four weeks after that the Department of Justice, which is of course run by Republicans, stripped him of his authority to pursue public corruption investigations," the caller said.

Ehrlich said: "Are you suggesting through that statement that something nefarious happened? When the guy prosecuted my superintendent of Maryland state police?" referring to Edward T. Norris, who pleaded guilty to misusing a police account for personal gain while city police commissioner.

"I think that your call is really inappropriate. I think it's partisan. I think that you are trying to damage the reputation of somebody who has worked for Democrats most of their life," Ehrlich said. Schurick was once chief of staff to then-Gov. William Donald Schaefer.

"I think the timing of your call is ridiculous. Nothing came of it. Everybody knows it. Can you imagine, if something would have been there, the Baltimore Sun not jumping on that. So my answer to you is 'Give me a break.' And the election is in 11 days," Ehrlich said.

Neither Schurick nor DiBiagio returned phone messages seeking comment yesterday.

In an opinion piece published in The Sun a little more than a year after announcing his resignation in December 2004, DiBiagio wrote that he had been under "constant pressure to aim low and look the other way from potentially corrupt officials. The pressure finally culminated in a threat that I would be 'hurt' if I continued."

Ehrlich's relationship with DiBiagio soured as the U.S. attorney pursued public corruption instead of gun crimes. The governor said yesterday that he had virtually no contact with DiBiagio after his appointment.

DiBiagio's apparent investigation into the influence of slots backers wasn't limited to the Ehrlich administration. In 2003, Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller, a Democrat, was also under investigation for slots-related donations to a national state legislative political committee he led. The investigation was ultimately dropped.

Katrina Crime: Perceived Or Real? (SAEN)

By Todd Bensman, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 29, 2006

Just days after the first of about 30,000 Louisiana hurricane evacuees began arriving in San Antonio, Mayor Phil Hardberger was asked a simple question he laughingly brushed off. What might be the impact of the influx on city crime rates and services?

It was Sept. 7, 2005, and the mayor was riding high on national praise for a CNN appearance during which he had projected an image of his city as unflinchingly philanthropic. People displaced by Katrina still were flooding in.

"That's like if my house is on fire and I'm looking to you for a bucket of water, and you ask what the new house will look like," he said with a laugh. "Everybody's been worried about crime, and the impact on social services. But so far, it is just worry; it hasn't been factual."

More than a year later, the issue remains unaddressed, conspicuously so in light of a 55 percent spike in murders the first eight months of this year, increasing violent crime rates in San Antonio, a stretched police force and widespread media reports linking some evacuees in Houston to similar crime trends there.

So: Did the sudden arrival of about 30,000 evacuees, a group equal to Del Rio in population, cause additional crime? The question, loaded with the kind of politically sensitive racial implications that can discomfit some politicians, is much more than academic. Millions of dollars could be at stake.

In choosing not to ask, San Antonio's political leadership potentially turned its back on federal money that Houston has gained by citing an evacuee link to a increasing murder rate and other violent crime.

It also invites speculation and perceptions not necessarily grounded in fact.

City leaders, such as Hardberger, several council members and top police officials, assert the evacuees have had no effect on crime. Those who interact most closely with some of the city's highest concentrations of evacuees, including beat cops, business owners and the evacuees themselves, say the opposite is true.

The San Antonio Express-News spent four months trying to determine whether a link exists between evacuees and crime in San Antonio. Among the highlights were an extensive analysis of crime data and interviews with dozens of street-level officers, community leaders, business owners, residents and evacuees throughout the city:

Steeply declining rates of violent crime and property crime during the first eight months of 2005 suddenly reversed after they arrived, although there is no proof evacuees caused it. Houston, however, has successfully cited a similar coincidence of suddenly rising crime to argue for more federal money.

Crime hot spots developed after evacuees arrived in and around some of the 170 apartment complexes where they resettled. For example, one 10-mile stretch of W.W. White Road contributed 20 percent of a citywide spike in armed robberies last fall. In contrast, at least one complex had lower crime after relatively large numbers of evacuees moved in, based on several measures of crime.

Of the 55 percent spike in San Antonio's murders this year, three suspects and two victims were found to be evacuees. Several other cases have suspected links, but dozens of cases could neither be included nor excluded as related to evacuees. Unlike Houston, the San Antonio Police Department homicide unit never has been asked to methodically look for such a connection that could be cited in a request for federal funds.

Violence and criminal activity involving evacuees occurred as the result of interaction between San Antonio residents and the new arrivals, often over drugs.

A coincidence of crime

The Louisiana evacuees found much more than a welcoming refuge when they showed up in need at San Antonio's doorstep last summer. Compared with their crime-ridden neighborhoods back home, evacuees found relative peace and security here. Most came from the same few districts responsible for making New Orleans notorious as the nation's most lethally violent city.

But San Antonio had been enjoying eight months of double-digit downturns in serious crime, such as murder, robbery and rape and sexual assaults, when the newcomers began settling into local shelters and hotels on Sept. 2, 2005.

Then the trend, for reasons unknown, reversed significantly in certain categories of crime. By Christmas 2005, San Antonio was beset by double-digit rises in the kind of crime that residents in any city especially fear and loathe.

Compared with the September-to-December period a year earlier, armed robberies of businesses were up 42 percent, and of people up 18 percent. Vehicle theft was up 18 percent, and weapons violations 33 percent, to name a few.

The number of residents' calls for police ballooned and is now on track to set a record by breaking the 1 million mark this year, with an average 8,500 more calls for police per month from September 2005 through July 30 than the same period a year earlier. The swell began just after evacuees arrived, taxing street cops and stretching response times.

The Houston metropolitan area, which received five times as many evacuees but is three times the size of the San Antonio area, experienced a similar coincidence of higher crime after evacuees arrived on a comparative scale.

Neither Houston nor the Express-News was able to examine the only unassailable evidence that would link imported criminal elements to higher crime: last known addresses for either suspects or victims. Many crimes remain unsolved with no suspects to identify.

The absence of suspect arrests and publicly available information that would prove an evacuee link to specific crimes has left some crime victims to draw their own conclusions.

Ed Theo Flores, owner of the family-run Theo's Brake and Tire Service near downtown for 40 years, had experienced only one crime in the business' history, and that was two decades ago. In a few weeks after more than 50 evacuee families moved in to the hotel next door to his shop, Flores reported three cars stolen off his lot and a break-in that cost him hundreds of dollars in tools. No arrests were made.

"I'm not blaming anything on the Katrina people," Flores said, choosing his words carefully. "I'm just saying the coincidence is right there."

The hotel did have problems with the evacuees. It was forced to evict a third of the guests for drugs and prostitution, said Janice Maragakis, spokeswoman for hotel owner Accor North America. Police reports confirm an increase in arrests at the address.

More than half of the city's evacuee population now is gone, having begun trickling out of town when Federal Emergency Management Agency housing vouchers started running out last spring, officials report. The overall total crime rate citywide has tapered off.

Today, top police officials are quick to highlight that total crime doesn't look bad.

From September 2005 through July, total crime citywide was up only 2.3 percent and total violent crime came out about even.

"The big picture is that violent crime is down," Police Chief William McManus said.

But total citywide numbers touted by police officials don't tell what happened for many months in neighborhoods after evacuees settled in them.

The period from September 2005 through July shows that several crime categories remained in double-digit higher territory over the same period a year earlier. Those include drug crimes, up 14 percent; total aggravated robberies, up 27 percent; and vehicle theft, up 17 percent.

Open to debate

Houston's attempt to peg a statistical correlation of higher crime rates to the arrival of evacuees has brought in millions of dollars to help pay its police and fire bills. But that city's correlation — and the Express-News' attempt to replicate Houston's analysis — is open to debate.

Criminologist Dr. Peter Scharf, director of the University of New Orleans Center for Society, Law and Justice, said the newspaper's findings, as well as Houston's, of the apparent shifts in the crime trends are "highly probative," suggesting some degree of proof.

"I think you're on to something," Scharf said after examining the Express-News findings. "And the lack of curiosity in your town is really interesting."

Scharf is studying the migration of people from the nation's most criminally prolific districts in New Orleans to Texas and back. He said it helps no one to casually dismiss what to him is an obvious pattern in which violent crime has followed one of the most dangerous criminal underclasses in the country.

It is likely no coincidence, Scharf also said, that crime rates in New Orleans fell from the nation's highest to nearly zero when just those few flooded high-crime districts emptied into Texas. Now, New Orleans crime is approaching old highs — in new areas — as evacuees settle in them, Scharf said.

Still, he cautioned that correlating a short-term crime spike with the arrival of evacuees is at best a crude barometer justifying more study and cannot be used to rule out other possible causes of a crime trend.

Other criminologists go further.

DOJ_NMG_0087998

"I think saying that comes pretty close to demonizing people who were evacuated. All you can say is that's interesting, that went up," said Dr. Michael J. Gilbert, associate professor in the University of Texas at San Antonio criminal justice department and Mayor Phil Hardberger's appointee to a local crime commission.

"While that's perfectly rational thinking, it may be misleading in terms of what this data may actually mean. I think they're (city of Houston) trying to make the best case they can to get money when it's not defensible."

He and other experts say the coincidence that a sudden spike in major crime occurred with the arrival of evacuees might easily be explained by population increases, shifts in police tactics or changing drug trade dynamics.

Albert Steven Dietz, a criminal justice professor at Texas State University in San Marcos, said the post-September crime rate jumps in San Antonio indicate to him that some evacuees may have contributed out of proportion to their numbers — but for just the first few months of their residency.

He said a logical assumption is that the simple crime trend becomes less indicative after evacuees disburse throughout the city and, for instance, find opportunities to leave the criminal underworld, if they were part of it.

Is perception reality?

While nearly impossible to easily verify the origins of all arrestees through available public records, a perception accompanies the pattern of increasing crime: Based in truth or not, some people who interact closely with evacuees believe elements of that imported population are committing the crimes. Among them are police, prosecutors, apartment complex managers, neighboring residents and business owners.

Perhaps most credibly, though, evacuees themselves in a dozen apartment complexes told the Express-News they believe some in their own ranks are responsible for violence, thievery and drug dealing that have made their own law-abiding lives in San Antonio as miserable as they were in New Orleans.

Among those who came to San Antonio were at least 140 probationers and parolees from Louisiana who hadn't reported to a parole or probation officer in either Texas or their home state, the Express-News reported in July.

Evacuees in the Huntley Manor apartments in East San Antonio, where calls for police jumped after some 50 Katrina evacuee families settled there, tell tales of conflicts involving young Louisiana men that went on for months, even after management, who did not respond to interview requests, arranged extra security.

One police report tells of 10 men chasing off the drivers of a meat delivery truck, then looting the vehicle in a frenzy until it was empty.

Josh Hooper, a young man from New Orleans, boasted of participating in conflicts.

"It got crazy around here. It was shooting and shooting, for real," he said, getting into a car with friends. "We did shoot back. I'm gonna tell you for real. You think somebody shootin' at me and I ain't gonna shoot back? For real. This is Texas; everybody got a gun."

Several evacuees said the complex has settled down noticeably since most of their compatriots moved, a story echoed elsewhere.

Evacuees living in West and North San Antonio complained bitterly about similar problems they say are caused by fellow evacuees, sometimes young men fighting over drugs with young San Antonio men.

"The thugs and criminals here (in San Antonio) met up and socialized with the thugs and criminals from there (New Orleans)," said Stephaney Wyeth, a 58-year-old grandmother from New Orleans, describing the nightly drug dealing, shootings and fights she endured in her Northwest San Antonio complex.

Buyers looking for drugs mistakenly knock on her door all night long, she said.

"It seems like our complex is the whole city's place to come and get drugs," Wyeth said, wishing her fellow evacuees would leave. "We have a lot of criminals in the building."

Yolanda Herbert, 43, blames local San Antonio youths for instigating violence with the New Orleans crowd.

"I think they're just getting with the wrong people," she said. "I believe they're being influenced by other gangsters that's from here who know where to go and what to do."

Others said they were targets of locals interested in stealing financial aid that everyone on the street knew the evacuees received. Evacuee Lavell Simpson said groups of Hispanic youths preyed on the evacuees at his complex near Lackland AFB.

DOJ_NMG_0087999

He said a group of three young Hispanics once attacked him "to take me for my jewelry."

"They can tell who we are," Simpson said, sitting on the stairwell leading up to his apartment one afternoon. "We dress different. We talk different. We walk different."

In late July, a Katrina evacuee was shot in the leg during a robbery at his apartment in 3100 block of East Commerce. He had cashed a FEMA check. The robbers got away.

Several hot spots exist

The Express-News tried to discern whether data supported perceptions among evacuees and residents both in and around 10 of the more than 170 apartment complexes where evacuees resettled last fall. The complexes were selected because they hosted high concentrations of evacuees.

Three measurements — police offense reports, residents' calls for police and total crime offense reports in a half-mile surrounding radius — showed rises in and around four of the 10 complexes compared with the same time period a year before. Five others showed declines in one or two of those measurements but increases in others. One of the 10 complexes showed declines in all three.

Residents who live in other complexes that took in large numbers of evacuees said what cold hard numbers can't. They've been feeling more afraid — of evacuees.

Evacuee Trina Boone of New Orleans, a mother of two young children who lives at Artisan at Willow Springs on Gembler Road, showed a bullet hole that was fired through her apartment one morning in June.

"To be honest, they selling a lot of weed," she said. "We have a lot of fightin' and shootin', all kinds of whatnot; that's why I'm moving out of here."

Another hot spot centers on an urban strip of W.W. White Road on San Antonio's East Side, where businesses from major chains to small eateries sustained a spike in armed robberies that frightened owners into organizing to defend themselves.

Crime data support their claims, but in other parts of the city, residents made claims against evacuees that data did not appear to support.

For instance, Nette Hinton, a retired U.S. Customs officer and member of Dignowity Hill Homeowners Association east of downtown, blamed evacuees who she believed traveled from other parts of the city to commit crimes along a stretch of Hackberry Street that police had worked years to reduce.

An analysis of crime data showed crime and calls for police service on and around Hackberry Street actually fell after evacuees came to San Antonio.

Still, Hinton believes political timidity has caused city officials to turn a blind eye to concerns like hers.

The former agent said leaders "probably hesitate to point fingers at the bad elements because it's antithetical to the kindly face we presented to Katrina evacuees. I think we're embarrassed to say there were some thugs and they're still here preying on people."

Not to wonder why

In Houston, which also received five times as many evacuees as San Antonio, the statistical impact is not much greater because its population is three times the Alamo City's size.

After tracing murders and noting leaps in other violent crime near resettlement areas, the administration of Houston Mayor Bill White has aggressively pursued more than $30 million in federal money for public safety costs. The money has gone to pay police and fire overtime and for five new police academy training classes.

In San Antonio, police overtime costs have gone up and remained higher since the evacuees came. No evidence has surfaced that these increased costs are linked to serving San Antonio's evacuees. City officials blame various nonpreventable operations for higher overtime costs but do allow for the possibility of evacuee-related services as a cause.

Houston has claimed the evacuee link wholeheartedly, with some success. Houston won an $18 million Department of Justice grant after White lobbied Houston's congressional delegation.

"My opinion is it never hurts to ask," said Gary E. Gray, assistant director for Houston's finance department. "If you don't ask what's possible, nothing's going to happen."

DOJ_NMG_0088000

A number of San Antonio city leaders, including top police commanders, professed ignorance of Houston's problem with "Katrina crime" and its pursuit of federal funds and said they saw no need to follow suit. Yet money is tight.

San Antonio's leaders, voting last month on a new budget, had to scrimp and scrape $2.4 million in city tax money out of next year's budget to help fund a 54-officer addition to its 2,069-member force that McManus said was hundreds short of what is needed.

In San Antonio, police overtime costs were falling steadily for the eight months before evacuees arrived, then from September 2005 through December rose to a record $6.7 million, of which $4 million was evacuee-related and reimbursed by FEMA, according to figures supplied by the city's finance department.

Houston has fought to recover more of the costs than it was reimbursed during that four-month period, as well as extra costs through May.

San Antonio's police overtime costs were up 11 percent from January through May, amounting to $400,000 more over the same period a year earlier.

Houston has also sought federal money for fire department overtime since the initial influx of evacuees.

Last October, before the shelters were closed, San Antonio top officials repeatedly assured the media that little anticipated crime had surfaced.

However, data from September 2005 to December show the number of crime reports generated from a half-mile area around the KellyUSA shelter spiked more than 160 percent, from 27 to 71, as a result of robberies, burglaries and drugs.

One office that did try to track crime related to evacuees is the Bexar County district attorney's office, which identified at least 135 prosecutions of evacuees staying in shelters last fall. Offenses ranged from rape to petty larceny and theft. One evacuee was charged with murder.

The DA's office initiated the count, First Assistant District Attorney Cliff Herberg said, should it need to justify federal funding requests later, but let the program lapse after the shelters emptied. A Police Department effort to code evacuee arrests also ended after a short time for reasons that remain unclear.

"I certainly think the impact has been much more, much more" than the 135 criminal prosecutions, Herberg said. "I think we're all aware of that. There's been a criminal element over there that has become a criminal element here."

Yet most other public officials posit various other causes for more crime while excluding evacuees. Councilwoman Sheila McNeil, whose district is bedeviled by a spiking number of armed robberies, dismissed the evacuees as a possible contributor.

"Part of it happens during the Christmas holidays," McNeil said of the robberies. "No one speculated what it could be, just Christmas time and people needed extra money. I've talked to our police officers and they have not given me that indication (of an evacuee link)."

In August, as the council was considering the slim police-hiring budget, Hardberger also excluded evacuees and blamed higher crime on an annual summer cycle. When asked if he'd ever considered that evacuees he embraced a year earlier brought crime to his city, the mayor said: "I don't believe the statistics will support that in San Antonio."

He said he was not interested in learning if it was true so the city might benefit from federal money.

"I know the statistics are up," Hardberger said. "But I'm not seeking a scapegoat here."

Several hours after that interview, however, the mayor phoned to say he'd had a change of heart and had asked City Manager Sheryl Sculley to examine the question.

"We need to look at the facts, and if we're going to look at the facts you'd better gather the facts first, and that's what I'm going to be doing," Hardberger said.

Two weeks later, the mayor's initiative produced a single-page interoffice memo from James Glass, manager of the SAPD Strategic Analysis and Mapping Office, to McManus.

The Aug. 16 memo titled "Analysis of Crime & Katrina Evacuees," cited an evacuee population number between five and six times lower than the nearly 30,000 that FEMA and Red Cross officials provided to the Express-News.

It went on to state in part, "the results from this micro level analysis are inconclusive" and that more study of updated information would be necessary. Police spokesman Gabe Trevino dismissed the short study, saying "That doesn't tell you anything. We can't say one way or another."

But when questioned about a possible Katrina link to higher crime and federal money, McManus cited the memo as grounds for why he was not inclined to order a more rigorous examination.

"We can't pinpoint any increases in crime to any particular population," he said.

The disinclination to learn more has carried over into enforcement strategy. Apartment complexes with large numbers of evacuees never figured into a special police task force that McManus deployed for 60 days this summer to target high crime areas, even though SAPD Capt. Cris Anderson, its commander, said he believed an evacuee-crime link existed.

Since Katrina evacuees arrived, Anderson said one night as his task force went into action where no evacuees lived, "there are more hot spots and violent pockets in town, and I just don't believe it's coincidental."

In contrast, a similar counter-crime task force fielded by Houston focused on evacuee complexes.

Gilbert, the UTSA criminologist, said all the debate about Katrina crime in Houston and perceptions about it in San Antonio should be viewed through a wider lens of time.

Compared with high violent crime in the late 1980s, San Antonio is enjoying historically low crime overall, even with its new population, in defiance of what studies like those he has authored show: Crime is usually higher in poor communities.

"San Antonio is a very poor city," he said. "And yet we have a very safe city, comparatively." tbensman@express-news.net

Vicious MS-13 Gang Seen As Growing Threat (DMN)

By David Mclemore, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, October 29, 2006

Authorities target group in Texas and across U.S.

PHARR, Texas – Shortly after midnight in late September, a Texas National Guard soldier with night-vision equipment spied four figures slipping through the brush and alerted Border Patrol agents.

The men were arrested, and one in particular stood out for the extensive tattoos across his face, body and arms.

AP Wilmer Matamoros, 23, a Mara Salvatrucha gang leader, was imprisoned earlier this year in Tegucigalpa, Honduras.

A fingerprint check showed Santos Chileno-Gomez, a 23-year-old Salvadoran, had been deported for an assault on a Long Island, N.Y., police officer. His lengthy criminal record – and the tattoos – labeled him as a member of Mara Salvatrucha 13, a vicious international street gang that federal authorities call one of the most violent in the U.S.

Mr. Chileno-Gomez is among 76 MS-13 members apprehended by the Border Patrol in the Rio Grande Valley during the just-ended fiscal year. That total was up from 62 the previous year, showing the gang's resilience to federal efforts aimed at rooting it out and its determination to travel almost at will through Texas to cliques operating throughout the U.S.

And, some police agencies believe, there is evidence that MS-13 has taken sides in the bloody war among drug cartels that's playing out in Nuevo Laredo.

"They are getting more disciplined and more organized. And they're getting smarter," said Susan Ritter, chairwoman of the criminal justice department at the University of Texas at Brownsville, who is preparing a scholarly research article on MS-13.

"In Texas, they often hold meetings or recruitment drives in public under the guise of legitimate activity, such as a soccer game or barbecue. There has been talk of efforts to join forces and operate with one overall leader. That hasn't happened yet," she said.

Officials estimate there are up to 10,000 hard-core members of the gang operating in 33 states, the largest clusters living in Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., and the Mid-Atlantic region. But Texas is one of the fastest-growing states for MS-13, simply by virtue of geography.

"From Honduras and El Salvador, the quickest routes in the U.S. are the smuggling pipelines that run from Mexico directly into the Valley," said Border Patrol Supervisory Agent Roy Cervantes. "From here, they quickly move on to Dallas or Houston and blend in with the immigrant communities there. They want out of the border area as quickly as possible."

In March 2005, when local police and federal agents began a national yearlong sweep of gang members, MS-13 members were involved in two shootings a week apart in Dallas that underscored the gang's violent streak. One involved a 14-year-old boy who was shot in the face and survived.

Eduardo Galicia, 19, wasn't so lucky.

Police said Mr. Galicia was playing soccer at a playground near Love Field when a man identified as an MS-13 member walked up and asked in Spanish, "What gang are you down with?" When Mr. Galicia said he didn't belong to a gang and turned to walk away, the man shot him in the back of the head. Dallas police made four arrests.

That year, Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigators estimated there were about 140 MS-13 members in the North Texas region. In raids last March, police arrested about 44. Local police say the national roundup of gang members has forced MS-13 members to take a decidedly lower profile in the Dallas area.

"I'm not saying we don't have a problem," said Sgt. Mark Langford of the Dallas Police gang unit. "That would be naive. We're always watching."

It's a sentiment shared by police in Dallas' suburban neighbors.

"We're not seeing a lot of crime directly attributable to MS-13 members. It's minimal," said David Tull, spokesman for the Irving Police Department. "We're not in denial. We know they're out there.

"We hear on the street that someone is coming in and we'll see graffiti around town, but unless we can get them in the light at the right time, we don't get a chance to get them."

Said Patrick Murphy of the Carrollton police: "It's really difficult to say how many MS-13 gang members we have. ... They come and go constantly."

That fluidity – members moving among cliques and back and forth to Central America – makes it hard to pin down numbers in any community with any accuracy, police said.

"This is a gang that operates across borders. It's common to see members of the L.A. clique work in El Salvador, or Salvadoran members operating in New York, recruiting or sharing tactics," said Brian Trucheon, director of the FBI's MS-13 National Gang Task Force, created in 2004. "The scary thing for us is how quickly they can evolve to move around obstacles law enforcement throws up."

Gang's beginnings

MS-13 began in the Ramparts section of Los Angeles in the mid-1980s to protect refugees of El Salvador's civil war from other street gangs. Mara Salvatrucha is street slang for "Salvadoran guard posse." The tattoos gang members use as a mark of identity and pride invariably involve the initials MS and the number 13, a designation of an earlier alliance with a Southern California gang.

A 2005 Department of Homeland Security gang threat assessment identified MS-13 as one of the largest and most violent gangs in the country. That February, Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents launched a national sweep – Operation Community Shield – targeting MS-13 members. It was later expanded to include other violent gangs. More than 3,000 gangsters were eventually rounded up, one third of them affiliated with MS-13.

The gang's terrifying reputation includes a callous disregard for life and a willingness to use extreme violence with weapons ranging from machetes to semi-automatic rifles.

"Machetes, decapitations and sexual violence against victims are a common tool of intimidation," said Alonzo Pena, the ICE special agent in charge for South Texas. "They are growing rapidly and pose a significant risk to our communities. This is a gang we can't allow to continue to grow."

Intelligence gathering

As a policy, ICE agents conduct face-to-face interviews with any member of the group arrested in Texas in an attempt to gather detailed intelligence.

One sign of the group's increased organization: Recently, MS-13 leaders have told members to remove tattoos from their faces, necks and arms to avoid notice from law enforcement. During interviews with agents, MS-13 members now deny involvement and insist their tattoos are residue of past involvement.

"We're sure that's just disinformation they're feeding us," Mr. Pena said. "The rule of MS-13 is once in, always in."

Houston, with its large Central American immigrant community, is the group's center of activity in Texas, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0088003

"It doesn't surprise us that they are coming in greater numbers across the border," said Shawna Dunlap, an FBI special agent in Houston. She said Houston saw an increase in what she called "high-profile" gang activity last year, including extortion, robbery and kidnapping.

"About 50 percent of those we see in Houston have been deported multiple times," she said.

While not the largest gang in Houston, MS-13 has become a significant player, said Capt. Mike Graham of the Houston police gang division. He said the gang is getting more organized.

"Our biggest challenge is that they are so transient," he said. "They prey on immigrants, but they don't necessarily stay in the immigrant communities. MS-13 is all over the city. If things get hot for them in Houston, they can disappear to North Carolina or D.C."

The FBI now assigns 10 agents to work with Houston police for investigations involving MS-13.

Homegrown threat

While MS-13 recruits heavily from El Salvador and Honduras and Central American refugees in the U.S., this is no invasion from south of the border. MS-13 is strictly a homegrown gang.

"Only after they were deported did the gang spread to Central America," said UT-Brownsville's Dr. Ritter, who set out to research the gang because she found little information available.

Once back in El Salvador and Honduras, members of MS-13 quickly fought with existing gangs for control, Dr. Ritter said. Both countries got tough, enacting stringent anti-gang laws known as super mano dura, or super hard hand, which provide hard prison time for those simply found to be MS-13 members.

Wherever it spreads, MS-13's business is crime, including drugs, extortion, human smuggling, car theft and contract killings.

"They're very opportunistic and diverse in criminal activities," said Mr. Trucheon of the FBI task force. "In some cities, they specialize in robbery; in others, extortion or crimes of violence. When they move into a community, they'll prey on the lawful and the law-breakers alike."

And intelligence gathered by U.S. and Mexican law enforcement agencies indicates the gang's growing presence in the smuggling operations of Mexican drug cartels.

While the FBI says the evidence is indefinite, other agencies say MS-13 appears to have taken sides with the Sinaloa cartel in its vicious turf war with the Gulf cartel to control narcotics trafficking in Nuevo Laredo.

Like the Zetas, a gang of Mexican ex-military commandos, MS-13 members are believed to serve as cartel enforcers on both sides of the border.

"They've shown themselves willing to hire out to protect drug loads, smuggle aliens and intimidate witnesses. If they can find a way to make a dollar engaging in criminal activity, they'll do it," said Mr. Pena of ICE.

"We have received intel that in a short time, MS-13 has taken control of the rail lines in Southern Mexico used to transport illegal immigrants in from Central America," Mr. Pena said. "They are heavily involved in the human trafficking network, and they collect 'taxes' – extortion – from immigrants and the smugglers. MS-13 rapidly becomes a force to be reckoned with wherever they set up."

Border arrests

Many of the gang members apprehended in South Texas by the Border Patrol appear to be new recruits journeying to join cliques in the U.S. or older members traveling on gang business. Some are messengers, a position of trust within the gang's hierarchy.

The biggest border apprehension occurred in February 2005, when a car carrying a load of narcotics was stopped by a Department of Public Safety trooper near Falfurrias in Brooks County. One of the men inside was Ebner Rivera-Paz, a top leader of MS-13.

He had recently escaped from a Honduran prison, where he was being kept for his role in ordering gunmen to open fire on a bus with automatic weapons in Tegucigalpa. Twenty-eight people were killed; the intended target was an enemy of MS-13.

Mr. Rivera-Paz was convicted in federal court for illegal re-entry and deported this year to Honduras. It was his fifth deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0088004

"When we apprehend these guys, they clearly are not afraid of the courts or law enforcement," said Mr. Cervantes of the Border Patrol. "And when they get deported, it won't be long until they return. To follow the smuggling route from Honduras takes about a month."

Gang Violence in N. Texas

Three examples of known MS-13 activity in the Dallas area:

March 2005: A 14-year-old boy was shot in the face in northwest Dallas but survived. MS-13 members were detained by police and immigration officers.

March 2005: Eduardo Galicia, 19, was playing soccer near Bachman Lake when he was approached by a gunman who asked, "What gang are you down with?" According to a police report, Mr. Galicia replied that he was not a gang member and turned to walk away. He was shot in the back of the head and killed. Suspected MS-13 members were arrested and charged.

December 2001: A 21-year-old Javier Calzada, 21, was shot to death in Grand Prairie. Later, MS-13 member Brenda Paz, who had turned government witness after moving to Virginia, told police she witnessed the shooting by other gang members. She was found stabbed to death and nearly decapitated along the Shenandoah River in 2003.

Lawyer's Query To U.S. Attorney Prompts A New Salvo From Kean (NSL)

By Deborah Howlett, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 29, 2006

Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. yesterday questioned why Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez would enlist the services of one the state's top defense lawyers if he isn't under a federal criminal investigation.

Menendez has said the lawyer, Joseph Hayden, contacted the U.S. attorney around the time a subpoena was issued for records from a federally funded nonprofit agency that paid more than $300,000 to rent a row house that Menendez owned in Union City.

Hayden was doing a "favor" for the campaign, Menendez spokesman Matt Miller said, not personally representing Menendez. Miller declined to say who in the campaign reached out to Hayden and asked him to make the call, except to say it was not Menendez.

"We were trying to find out what was going on," Miller said of tapping Hayden. "We were just looking to find out in the midst of all these rumors what the facts were."

Miller declined to say what the campaign gleaned from Hayden's conversation with federal authorities. "I'm just not going to go there," he said.

Such a scenario makes no sense, Kean said during a press conference in Mountainside yesterday.

"Every criminal defense attorney knows that you don't reach out to the U.S. Attorney's Office during a pending criminal investigation unless you are representing a subject, target or witness," he said.

As an attorney for the campaign, Hayden would not have had the "standing" to inquire about the case, said Kean's campaign counsel Scott Weber of the Patton Boggs law firm in Washington, D.C. "The first question (from the U.S. Attorney's Office) would have been 'Who do you represent?'" said Weber, a former federal prosecutor. "If you're not representing someone, the conversation ends."

Hayden, who could not be reached yesterday, earlier told The Star-Ledger that he and Menendez never talked after the call, even though Menendez has said they did.

Miller said yesterday that there was confusion because "there was no substantive conversation; the senator called to thank him."

Menendez's federal campaign financial reports show no payment to Hayden for legal work, nor any in-kind donation from Hayden.

"He was never officially retained as counsel," Miller said. "He did it as an individual volunteer activity, which is completely permissible under campaign finance law."

With the polls showing the campaign a virtual dead heat 10 days before the election, Menendez continues to insist that there is no ongoing federal criminal investigation.

EVERYONE'S IN FDNY'S HIRING POOL (NYPOST)

By Patrick Gallahue

The New York Post, October 29, 2006

October 29, 2006 -- The FDNY's million-dollar diversity drive is starting to pay off as the department heads into its final week of recruiting.

Forced to extend its deadline due to lagging numbers, the FDNY's aggressive campaign to bring minorities into the department has managed to boost its pool of applicants by thousands, the Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta announced yesterday.

"The results are impressive," he said. "We have over 20,000 applicants [who] filed [to take the test] as of yesterday, and 35 percent of those applications are from minorities - and we still have a week to go."

Applicants have until Nov. 3 to sign up for the test, which is given every four years.

Last year, the city and the FDNY put more than $3 million into the department's Recruitment and Diversity Unit as the Justice Department probed the department for allegedly discriminatory hiring practices. More than 90 percent of the 11,000-member force is white.

Scoppetta said more than 275 volunteer recruiters visited more than 2,400 events during the drive.

On the original deadline date, Oct. 13, the overall number of applicants was well below average, although the applicant pool was reportedly a little over 31 percent minority.

In the last two weeks, the department has been able to boost both those numbers.

A Minority Report The FDNY Likes (NYDN)

By Brendan Brosh And Don Singleton, Daily News Writers

New York Daily News, October 29, 2006

The FDNY's effort to diversify what has been a largely white, male department has paid off with increased applications from minorities, officials said yesterday.

Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta said a stepped-up recruitment effort has resulted in 20,000 applications, 35% of them from minority group members, who want to take a civil service exam scheduled for Jan. 20.

Early this month, Scoppetta had reported that the department had received only 12,000 applications, down from about 20,000 during a comparable period in 2002.

Scoppetta's response was to extend the application deadline by three weeks, to Nov. 3, and to hold 2,400 recruiting events manned by 275 volunteer recruiters from within the FDNY.

The department has also operated a phone bank, contacting individuals who have indicated an interest in joining up. A total of 42,000 applications were sent out as part of the drive, Scoppetta said.

"It's never been easier to file to become a firefighter," said Scoppetta. "It's a very simple application - no one should be intimidated."

In May, with the department's hiring practices under investigation by the Justice Department, the FDNY launched a multimillion-dollar ad campaign to lure more minority-group firefighters. In August, it relaxed its hiring requirements - the latest move in an uphill effort to increase the diversity of a department that is 91% white.

Lowell Blitzes Immigrant Areas With Ballot Help (BOS)

By Alexander Reid, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 29, 2006

It is a truism of any political election: Every vote counts.

In the past in Lowell, voter registration efforts in the city's immigrant communities have fallen short and advocacy groups have charged that voters who speak languages other than English have faced problems at the polls.

During this year's election campaigns, the city and a number of groups have worked to deal with both situations.

Volunteers from ONE Lowell, an immigrant advocacy group, have spent the past several weeks canvassing neighborhoods throughout the city to register new voters. Translators and bilingual poll workers have been recruited and trained for duty at voting precincts in neighborhoods with the highest population of non-English-speaking residents. Ballot instructions and voting information have been printed in Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese for distribution on Election Day, Nov. 7.

Gail Cenik, a manager with the city's Election Commission, said her office has concentrated on education to familiarize people with the voting process.

"There's a population in this city that's never voted before, even though they're citizens and have the right to," she said. "For whatever reasons, they don't participate and we want to change that."

Cenik's comments reflect efforts by the city to correct many of the problems that have plagued the last two elections in Lowell. In March, the US Department of Justice began an investigation into alleged voting rights violations faced by Cambodian-Americans who tried to vote in elections held last November.

The federal investigation was prompted by complaints from the New York-based Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. The advocacy group surveyed the city's polling places in that election and found several problems, including statements that several voters were directed to the wrong polling places and one instance in which a voter's name was misspelled on the voting roll.

Previously, the legal defense fund had reported on voting problems in the 2004 elections when several voters were not given provisional ballots after their names were found to be missing from the list of registered voters. Others were turned away and told to register in the next election. Those specific problems were not evident in the 2005 election.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed the ongoing investigation and declined to provide further details.

With the federal probe underway, the city opened discussions with representatives from the legal defense fund and ONE Lowell.

The issue is critical considering Lowell's large number of Cambodians, many of whom are new to the election process. The 2000 Census indicates that about 9,000 people of Cambodian ancestry live in Lowell but organizations that work with immigrant communities say the actual figure is closer to 25,000. Overall, Lowell has about 105,000 residents and about 70 percent of them are white.

Voter registration has been a major focus in the weeks leading up to this election.

The Election Commission has been setting up voter registration tables at neighborhood gatherings and events, and at the Southeast Asian Water Festival in August. Public-service announcements have aired on local cable-access programs that target ethnic communities.

Volunteers from ONE Lowell have gone door-to-door to households in the Acre, Back Central, Lower Belvidere, and Middle Highlands neighborhoods to sign up unregistered voters. They've also gone onto the campuses of the University of Massachusetts at Lowell and Middlesex Community College.

Victoria Fahlberg, executive director of ONE Lowell, said the agency had pursued unregistered voters for the past four years but the effort this year was increased, thanks in part to a $40,000 grant from the Theodore Edson Parker Foundation and $3,000 from the Massachusetts Immigrant Refugee Advocacy Coalition.

Fahlberg said the money has been used to pay volunteers who were fluent in Khmer and Spanish. She said voter registration focused primarily on Cambodians but has been broadened to include residents who speak Spanish and Portuguese.

"There are many legislative issues that have come up over the years that have affected immigrants," Fahlberg said, "but their voices are not heard because they didn't have sufficient voting constituency to hold elected officials accountable."

DOJ_NMG_0088007

Since late July, Robyn Long-Navas, a worker with ONE Lowell, has accompanied volunteers registering voters in neighborhoods across the city.

"We make it convenient for them," she said. "If they're over 18 and a citizen, they only have to fill out and sign the form." Long-Navas said ONE Lowell will convene a seminar at City Hall tomorrow evening for first-time voters.

Cenik, the Elections Commission manager, said such efforts have helped boost the number of registered voters in the coming election to 49,176 compared to last year's total of 47,403.

Beyond registering new voters, the city also has tried to address obstacles that voters faced when they have shown up at the polls. The survey by the legal defense fund noted an absence of foreign-language materials, including ballots, voting instructions, and information about provisional ballots. It also noted the lack of bilingual poll workers and translators to help non-English-speaking voters.

City officials intend to address the problems by supplying printed materials translated into Khmer, Spanish, and Portuguese. Informational signs also will be posted at polling places. Cenik said her office will deploy 21 poll workers and translators, and pay them between $90 and $125 to work on Election Day.

Assistant City Solicitor Brian W. Leahey said the measures should make this a more problem-free election. "We're hoping that we've put enough things in place to make sure this election is better than the last one."

Glenn D. Magpantay, a staff attorney for the legal defense fund, said his organization will monitor the upcoming election to see whether the city's changes are adequate.

"We are hoping that some of the things we discussed with the city last spring will come to fruition," he said. "We feel like the city has made progress but the best way to tell is by what happens on Nov. 7."

U.S. Investigates Voting Machines' Venezuela Ties (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The federal government is investigating the takeover last year of a leading American manufacturer of electronic voting systems by a small software company that has been linked to the leftist Venezuelan government of President Hugo Chávez.

The inquiry is focusing on the Venezuelan owners of the software company, the Smartmatic Corporation, and is trying to determine whether the government in Caracas has any control or influence over the firm's operations, government officials and others familiar with the investigation said.

The inquiry on the eve of the midterm elections is being conducted by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or Cfius, the same panel of 12 government agencies that reviewed the abortive attempt by a company in Dubai to take over operations at six American ports earlier this year.

The committee's formal inquiry into Smartmatic and its subsidiary, Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif., was first reported Saturday in The Miami Herald.

Officials of both Smartmatic and the Venezuelan government strongly denied yesterday that President Chávez's administration, which has been bitterly at odds with Washington, has any role in Smartmatic.

"The government of Venezuela doesn't have anything to do with the company aside from contracting it for our electoral process," the Venezuelan ambassador in Washington, Bernardo Alvarez, said last night.

Smartmatic was a little-known firm with no experience in voting technology before it was chosen by the Venezuelan authorities to replace the country's elections machinery ahead of a contentious referendum that confirmed Mr. Chávez as president in August 2004.

Seven months before that voting contract was awarded, a Venezuelan government financing agency invested more than $200,000 into a smaller technology company, owned by some of the same people as Smartmatic, that joined with Smartmatic as a minor partner in the bid.

In return, the government agency was given a 28 percent stake in the smaller company and a seat on its board, which was occupied by a senior government official who had previously advised Mr. Chávez on elections technology. But Venezuelan officials later insisted that the money was merely a small-business loan and that it was repaid before the referendum.

With a windfall of some $120 million from its first three contracts with Venezuela, Smartmatic then bought the much larger and more established Sequoia Voting Systems, which now has voting equipment installed in 17 states and the District of Columbia.

Since its takeover by Smartmatic in March 2005, Sequoia has worked aggressively to market its voting machines in Latin America and other developing countries. "The goal is to create the world's leader in electronic voting solutions," said Mitch Stoller, a company spokesman.

But the role of the young Venezuelan engineers who founded Smartmatic has become less visible in public documents as the company has been restructured into an elaborate web of offshore companies and foreign trusts.

"The government should know who owns our voting machines; that is a national security concern," said Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, Democrat of New York, who asked the Bush administration in May to review the Sequoia takeover.

"There seems to have been an obvious effort to obscure the ownership of the company," Ms. Maloney said of Smartmatic in a telephone interview yesterday. "The Cfius process, if it is moving forward, can determine that."

The concern over Smartmatic's purchase of Sequoia comes amid rising unease about the security of touch-screen voting machines and other electronic elections systems.

Government officials familiar with the Smartmatic inquiry said they doubted that even if the Chávez government was some kind of secret partner in the company, it would try to influence elections in the United States. But some of them speculated that the purchase of Sequoia could help Smartmatic sell its products in Latin America and other developing countries, where safeguards against fraud are weaker.

A spokeswoman for the Treasury Department, which oversees the foreign investment committee, said she could not comment on whether the panel was conducting a formal investigation.

"Cfius has been in contact with the company," said the spokeswoman, Brookly McLaughlin, citing discussions that were first disclosed in July. "It is important that the process is conducted in a professional and nonpolitical manner."

The committee has wide authority to review foreign investments in the United States that might have national security implications. In practice, though, it has focused mainly on foreign acquisitions of defense companies and other investments in traditional security realms.

Since the political furor over the Dubai ports deal, members of Congress from both parties have sought to widen the purview of such reviews to incorporate other emerging national security concerns.

In late July, the House and the Senate overwhelmingly approved legislation to expand the committee's scope, give a greater role to the office of the director of national intelligence and strengthen Congressional oversight of the review process.

But the Bush administration opposed major changes, and Congressional leaders did not act to reconcile the two bills before Congress adjourned.

Foreigners seeking to buy American companies in areas like defense manufacturing typically seek the committee's review themselves before going ahead with a purchase. Legal experts said it would be highly unusual for the panel to investigate a transaction like the Sequoia takeover, and even more unusual for the panel to try to nullify the transaction so long after it was completed.

It is unclear, moreover, what the government would need to uncover about the Sequoia sale to take such an action.

The investment committee's review typically involves an initial 30-day examination of any transactions that might pose a threat to national security, including a collective assessment from the intelligence community. Should concerns remain, one of the agencies involved can request an additional and more rigorous 45-day investigation.

In the case of the ports deal, the transaction was approved by the investment committee. But the Dubai company later abandoned the deal, agreeing to sell out to an American company after a barrage of criticism by legislators from both parties who said the administration had not adequately reviewed the deal or informed Congress about its implications.

The concerns about possible ties between the owners of Smartmatic and the Chávez government have been well known to United States foreign-policy officials since before the 2004 recall election in which Mr. Chávez, a strong ally of President Fidel Castro of Cuba, won by an official margin of nearly 20 percent.

Opposition leaders asserted that the balloting had been rigged. But a statistical analysis of the distribution of the vote by American experts in electronic voting security showed that the result did not fit the pattern of irregularities that the opposition had claimed.

At the same time, the official audit of the vote by the Venezuelan election authorities was badly flawed, one of the American experts said. “They did it all wrong,” one of the authors of the study, Avi Rubin, a professor of computer science at Johns Hopkins University, said in an interview.

Opposition members of Venezuela’s electoral council had also protested that they were excluded from the bidding process in which Smartmatic and a smaller company, the Bizta Corporation, were selected to replace a $120 million system that had been built by Election Systems and Software of Omaha.

Smartmatic was then a fledgling technology start-up. Its registered address was the Boca Raton, Fla., home of the father of one of the two young Venezuelan engineers who were its principal officers, Antonio Mugica and Alfredo Anzola, and it had a one-room office with a single secretary.

The company claimed to have only two going ventures, small contracts for secure communications software that a Smartmatic spokesman said had a total value of about $2 million.

At that point, Bizta amounted to even less. Company documents, first reported in 2004 by The Herald, showed the firm to be virtually dormant until it received the $200,000 investment from a fund controlled by the Venezuelan Finance Ministry, which took a 28 percent stake in return.

Weeks before Bizta and Smartmatic won the referendum contract, the government also placed a senior official of the Science Ministry, Omar Montilla, on Bizta’s board, alongside Mr. Mugica and Mr. Anzola. Mr. Montilla, The Herald reported, had acted as an adviser to Mr. Chávez on elections technology.

More recent corporate documents show that before and after Smartmatic’s purchase of Sequoia from a British-owned firm, the company was reorganized in an array of holding companies based in Delaware (Smartmatic International), the Netherlands (Smartmatic International Holding, B.V.), and Curaçao (Smartmatic International Group, N.V.). The firm’s ownership was further shielded in two Curaçao trusts.

Mr. Stoller, the Smartmatic spokesman, said that the reorganization was done simply to help expand the company’s international operations, and that it had not tried to hide its ownership, which he said was more than 75 percent in the hands of Mr. Mugica and his family.

“No foreign government or entity, including Venezuela, has ever held any stake in Smartmatic,” Mr. Stoller said. “Smartmatic has always been a privately held company, and despite that, we’ve been fully transparent about the ownership of the corporation.”

Mr. Stoller emphasized that Bizta was a separate company and said the shares the Venezuelan government received in it were “the guarantee for a loan.”

Mr. Stoller also described concerns about the security of Sequoia’s electronic systems as unfounded, given their certification by federal and state election agencies.

But after a municipal primary election in Chicago in March, Sequoia voting machines were blamed for a series of delays and irregularities. Smartmatic’s new president, Jack A. Blaine, acknowledged in a public hearing that Smartmatic workers had been flown up from Venezuela to help with the vote.

Some problems with the election were later blamed on a software component, which transmits the voting results to a central computer, that was developed in Venezuela.

Who Needs To 'Help' America Vote? (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

The hoariest jest in conservatism's repertoire is that the three least credible assertions in the English language are "The check is in the mail," "Of course I'll respect you as much in the morning" and "I'm from the government, and I'm here to help you." Which brings us to the exquisitely named Help America Vote Act.

DOJ_NMG_0088010

Having fixed Iraq and New Orleans, the federal government's healing touch is now being applied to voting. As a result, days -- perhaps weeks -- might pass after Election Day without the nation's knowing which party controls the House or Senate. If that happens, one reason might be HAVA, that 2002 bit of federal helpfulness.

For over two centuries before Congress passed HAVA, Americans voted. Really. Unlike today, those who were elected -- Clay, Webster, Lincoln and lesser lights -- often were more complex and sophisticated than the voting machinery.

Using pencils to make marks on paper and later using machines to punch holes in paper ballots, voters -- without federal help; imagine -- caused Congresses and presidents to come and go. States ran elections; some ran them better than others. Some ballots have been better designed than others, as have some voting machines. Most have been adequate. The gross defects of American voting practices were laws that established or permitted discrimination and other abuses. Tardily, but emphatically, those laws were changed and other abuses were halted.

Then came 2000 and Florida and the 36-day lawyers' scrum about George W. Bush's 537-vote margin of victory. In response to which, Congress passed HAVA, which in 2006 may produce fresh confirmation of the prudential axiom that the pursuit of the perfect is the enemy of the good.

The lesson that should have been learned from Florida was: In Florida, as in life generally, one should pursue as much precision as is reasonable -- but not more. When, as very rarely happens, a large electorate, such as that state's 6.1 million voters in 2000, is evenly divided, the many errors and ambiguities that inevitably will occur during the marking of millions of ballots will be much more numerous than the margin of victory. That is unfortunate, but no great injustice will be done, no matter who is declared the winner in a contest that is essentially tied.

Unfortunately, the lesson the nation chose to learn from Florida was that American technological wizardry could prevent such highly unusual events, and no expense should be spared to do so. Hence HAVA, which made $3.8 billion available for states to purchase the most modern voting equipment.

On Election Day, 38 percent of the nation's voters will use touch screens to record their choices, according to Election Data Services. Unlike optical scanners that read markings put on paper ballots, most touch-screen machines -- including those that the New York Times reports will be used in about half of the 45 districts with the most closely contested House races -- produce no paper that can be consulted for verification of the results if a recount is required.

Maryland's new $106 million touch-screen system melted into a chaos of mechanical and human errors in last month's primary election. Lawsuits have been filed in five states seeking to block the use of touch-screen machines.

Today's political climate -- hyperpartisanship leavened by paranoia and exploited by a national surplus of lawyers -- makes this an unpropitious moment for introducing new voting technologies that will be administered by poll workers who often are retirees for whom the task of working a DVD player is a severe challenge. Furthermore, an election is, after all, a government program, and readers of Genesis know that new knowledge often brings trouble. So we should not be surprised if, on Nov. 7, new voting machinery does what new technologies -- dams, bridges, steamships, airplanes -- have done through history: malfunction.

Football, in its disproportionate pursuit of error-free officiating, now relies on instant replays because . . . well, because it can. This technology does indeed reduce human error. But it also reduces games to coagulation as players stand around waiting for officials to study video in the hope of achieving a degree of precision and certainty more appropriate to delicate surgery than to the violent thrashing of huge padded men in what is -- lest we forget, as the judicial solemnities of instant replay cause us to forget -- a game.

Democracy is not a mere game. But -- write this on a piece of paper, using a No. 2 pencil -- neither is it an activity from which it is sensible to demand more precision than can reasonably be expected when, on a November Tuesday, 100 million people record billions of political choices.

Bishops Draft Rules On Ministering To Gays (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088011

The nation's Roman Catholic bishops have drafted new guidelines for ministry to gay people that affirm church teaching against same-sex relationships, marriages and adoptions by gay couples, yet encourage parishes to reach out to gay Catholics who feel alienated by their church.

The bishops' document, the result of a four-year effort, gives specific instructions on some of the conundrums now faced in many parishes.

The guidelines recommend baptizing the adopted children of same-sex couples, as long as the children will be raised as Catholics. It says that gay people may benefit from revealing their "tendencies" to friends, family and their priest, but should not make "general public announcements" about it in the parish.

The guidelines also say that gay men and lesbians have "no moral obligation to attempt" therapy, an apparent reference to therapy programs that claim to change gay people's sexual orientation. It says that while "some have found therapy helpful," there is "no scientific consensus" either on therapy or the causes of homosexuality.

The bishops will vote on the document — "Ministry to Persons with a Homosexual Inclination: Guidelines for Pastoral Care" — when the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops meets Nov. 13-16 in Baltimore. It could be amended, and needs a two-thirds majority to pass.

Bishop Arthur J. Serratelli of Paterson, N.J., the chairman of the bishops doctrine committee, which wrote the new guidelines, said that although it was difficult to predict whether it would pass, "It's a very sound document, a very clear document. My sense is that the bishops will readily embrace it."

Gay Catholic leaders who had read the draft, however, predicted that it would only further alienate gays and their families from the church.

"There certainly is some lovely language that sounds welcoming in here," said Sam Sinnett, president of DignityUSA, an organization for gay Catholics, "but essentially they're repeating all the spiritually violent things they've been saying about gay and lesbian Catholics for a couple of decades — that we are 'objectively disordered' and our relationships are intrinsically evil."

A previous document, issued by a committee of bishops in 1997, was directed primarily at parents with gay children. But it proved controversial and was never approved by the bishops conference.

This new document puts more emphasis on the church's moral teaching about sexuality. It says that although having a "homosexual inclination" is not itself a sin, homosexual sex is a sin — as are premarital sex and adultery. The answer in all these situations is chastity.

The document says that although the church teaches that homosexuality is "objectively disordered" — a teaching in the catechism that says homosexual acts violate the natural law — the church is not saying that homosexual people themselves are disordered or "rendered morally defective by this inclination."

Such distinctions will provide little comfort to gay Catholics, said Francis DeBernardo, executive director of New Ways Ministry, a gay outreach group for Catholics based in Maryland. Mr. DeBernardo criticized the document for saying that gay people should make their sexuality known only to a small group, and that gay people whose behavior "violates" church teaching should be denied leadership roles in parishes.

"Gay and lesbian people are going to read those remarks and see them as offensive, as telling them to go underground," he said.

That is not the intention, said the Rev. Thomas G. Weinandy, who worked on the document as executive director for the United States bishops' secretariat for doctrine and pastoral practices.

"The bishops would like people with homosexual inclinations to really participate in the church, but they don't want to 'give scandal,' " Father Weinandy said. "If you knew a heterosexual couple were just cohabitating and not married, you wouldn't let them be eucharistic ministers either."

The Rev. James Martin, an editor at the Jesuit magazine America, said, "The document expresses the tension in the church between a sincere desire to minister to gays and lesbians, and the reality that many gays and lesbians feel unwelcome in the church by virtue of the church's teaching."

The bishops have issued statements in recent years condemning gay marriage, gay adoption and benefits for gay partners. They have historically been more attuned to gay issues, however, than some of their colleagues overseas. Last year, the Vatic an issued an “instruction” saying that men with “deep-seated” homosexual attraction should not be ordained. In its wake, some American bishops commented in their diocesan newspapers or privately to their priests that they did not regard this as a ban on ordaining gay men, and would continue to accept gay candidates on a case-by-case basis.

The bishops said they felt the need for clear guidelines because there were many pastoral ministries for gay people in parishes and dioceses around the country, and “confusion” about what was an “authentic” Catholic approach, Father Weinandy said. He noted that the Vatican had disciplined the founders of New Ways Ministry, the Rev. Robert Nugent and Sister Jeannine Gramick, for preaching acceptance of gay relationships.

As such, the guidelines repeatedly say that bishops should not countenance church leaders and pastoral workers who fail to uphold its teachings on homosexuality, or who advocate harm toward gay people.

It says, “The church cannot support organizations or individuals whose work contradicts, is ambiguous about, or neglects her teaching on sexuality.”

Gay Couples' Adopted Kids May Be Baptized, Catholic Draft Says (WP)

The Washington Post, October 29, 2006

Children adopted by gay couples may be baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, even though the church does not support such adoptions, calling them "a pastoral concern," according to new guidelines for ministering to gay men and lesbians that will be presented to U.S. bishops next month in Baltimore.

The 23-page draft document affirms traditional church teachings on same-sex issues, such as forbidding the blessing of same-sex unions or marriages, and addresses some relatively new issues, such as discrimination against and harassment of gay men and lesbians.

The document, "Ministry to Persons with a Homosexual Inclination: Guidelines for Pastoral Care," marks the first time in nearly 10 years that U.S. bishops have addressed such ministry in detail. Bishops will debate and vote on the guidelines at their annual fall meeting, Nov. 13 to 16, in Baltimore.

An early draft of the guidelines welcomes celibate gay men and lesbians to take part in parish life while asserting the church's "right to deny roles of service to those whose behavior violates her teaching." Public announcements of one's sexual orientation "are not helpful and should not be encouraged," the draft cautions, and it says church ministers must not bless same-sex unions or marriages or promote them in any way.

The bishops' Secretariat for Doctrine and Pastoral Practices took four years to draft the document.

Gay Marriage Through A Black-White Prism (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

IN 1947, the county clerk in Los Angeles refused to marry Andrea Perez and Sylvester Davis. They were of different races, and a California law said that “all marriages of white persons with Negroes, Mongolians, members of the Malay race or mulattoes are illegal.” The next year, the California Supreme Court, by a vote of 4 to 3, struck down that law in Perez v. Sharp.

In 2003, in another 4-to-3 decision, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court authorized gay marriages, and it invoked the Perez case as a model.

Last week, in a third 4-to-3 decision, the New Jersey Supreme Court stopped just short of endorsing gay marriages. It instructed the State Legislature to provide gay unions with a full complement of legal rights but said that the question of whether to call such unions “marriages” was a political, not judicial, one.

The New Jersey court did not mention the Perez case by name and it said that interracial marriage was not a useful touchstone in thinking about same-sex marriage.

But people on both sides of the same-sex marriage issue say there are important lessons from the earlier debate over laws banning interracial marriages, about the reasoning in the Perez decision and about how, over two decades, that decision came to be accepted in the courts, in state legislatures and in the popular culture. Unsurprisingly, they differ about what those lessons are.

Gay-marriage advocates say the logic of the Perez decision applies directly to gay unions. After all, they point out, the decision said that "the essence of the right to marry is freedom to join in marriage with the person of one's choice."

Chief Justice Margaret H. Marshall of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, writing for the majority in the 2003 decision, agreed. "In this case, as in Perez," she wrote, "a statute deprives individuals of access to an institution of fundamental legal, personal and social significance — the institution of marriage — because of a single trait." It made no difference, she wrote, that one trait was skin color and the other sexual orientation.

Advocates for gay marriage say there is much to be learned from Perez. "No one is saying that the experiences of racial minorities are identical to the experiences of same-sex couples," said Evan Wolfson, executive director of Freedom to Marry. "There are always differences, but there are profound similarities."

Opponents of gay marriage, on the other hand, say the judicial and legislative aftermath of Perez is more telling than the decision itself. Although 29 other states had laws barring interracial marriage at the time of the Perez case, no other state supreme court followed California. Instead, over time many state legislatures repealed the bans; in some states the laws remained on the books, but went largely unenforced.

In the end, it took two decades before the United States Supreme Court struck down in 1967 all of the 16 remaining antimiscegenation laws, in Loving v. Virginia, involving a Virginia couple who had been convicted of violating that state's interracial marriage ban.

This history, opponents of gay marriage say, shows that the Perez court usurped the democratic process, imposing a decision that most of the country, however unfairly, was not ready to embrace.

Maggie Gallagher, the president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, said the contrast between the political landscape when the Supreme Court acted in 1967 and that facing proponents of gay marriage today is stark and telling.

"When the court moved to strike down the interracial marriage laws," Ms. Gallagher said, "the democratic process was in the process of getting rid of these laws. What's happening now is exactly the opposite: more and more states are moving to protect marriage."

In last week's decision from New Jersey, the justices in the majority tried to find what they considered middle ground. They affirmed gay couples' right to equal treatment, even as they said there was no constitutional right to same-sex marriage. Writing for the majority, Justice Barry T. Albin noted that the Loving case concerned heterosexual couples facing "intolerable racial distinctions" and did not apply to sexual orientation.

The fate of marriage in the courts may be about to come full circle. In the next year or so, the California Supreme Court will hear a gay-marriage case. Ms. Gallagher said that if that court — the court that decided Perez almost 60 years ago — rejects same-sex marriage, "we're out of the gay-marriage question for 10 years."

That may be an overstatement, as challenges are pending in Connecticut and Maryland, too, and the New Jersey Legislature may yet allow gay marriage by statute.

Although the United States Supreme Court in 2003 struck down a Texas law making gay sex a crime, few experts believe that the court is poised to rule in favor of gay marriage anytime soon. "As I look at possible votes on the Supreme Court," said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern who supports gay marriage, "I have a lot of trouble getting to one."

But time may be on the side of gay marriage, he added, noting that two decades passed before the Supreme Court, in Loving, got around to endorsing the decision in Perez.

ANTITRUST:

In A Blurry World, Ownership Is Yesterday's News (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

IT is hard to find any public policy question that feels less relevant by the minute than whether one person or company should be permitted to own television stations and newspapers in the same market.

DOJ_NMG_0088014

Rules barring cross-ownership went into effect in 1975 but were overturned by the Federal Communications Commission three years ago. But, soon after, an appellate court effectively sent the decision back for another go-round, which is under way. This month in Los Angeles, the commission held a public hearing, the first of a series around the country, to look at newspaper-TV cross-ownership but also to examine other, more pertinent questions — for instance, how many radio or television stations a single owner can have in a single market.

A Supreme Court ruling from 1945 may best sum up why the F.C.C. scrutinizes such affairs: to ensure "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." It's too bad we can't skip months of table-thumping hearings over thousands of pages of studies and filings and just acknowledge that the media landscape is changing quickly.

The reality is that even if media companies could own more TV stations and newspapers in the same city, they might not think that it's such a brilliant idea any more. As the F.C.C.'s chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said recently: "We need to develop a rule for cross-ownership that reflects current market characteristics, including the struggling nature of today's newspaper industry."

The Tribune Company is Exhibit A, of course. Its past success with a triple play of television, newspaper and radio in its hometown of Chicago has not translated into financial brilliance in New York and Los Angeles, where it owns Newsday and The Los Angeles Times, as well as the television stations WPIX and KTLA. Under pressure from its biggest shareholder and a slumping share price, the company has said it is exploring all options, including selling part or all of itself.

In addition to Chicago, there are markets like Atlanta, where the privately held Cox Enterprises owns The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, television, cable and much else. In these places, cross-ownership appears to have served its corporate orchestrators well.

Here is one small example: by using its media properties to promote a new Web venture, Cox has taken an early stab at fending off the efforts of the Google and Yahoo juggernauts. It has introduced a local search business in Atlanta called Kudzu.com, and, on Monday, is set to announce that it is rolling out Kudzu.com in three more markets where it has cable operations and can capitalize on its local relationships with advertisers.

The cross-media holdings by Tribune and Cox in their hometowns, by the way, were in place when the new rules took effect and so were permitted to stay. Another city that gained exemption from the rule is New York, where the News Corporation owns The New York Post and two television stations.

But what does it say about the appeal of cross-ownership that The Post has lost money since the News Corporation's chairman, Rupert Murdoch, acquired it for the second time, in 1993, and that Mr. Murdoch, whose roots are in ink and paper, has otherwise quit the newspaper business in the United States in favor of television, cable channels and the Internet?

Having asked a few media executives whether relaxed rules would lead them to pursue cross-ownership, my sense is that it's basically a one-way street: the newspaper people might like to secure a place on the TV dial, not the other way around. Most broadcasters would prefer that the F.C.C. let them gobble up more television or radio stations in a single market.

It's also worth noting that people are not exactly leaping into the local TV station business, either. The decades-old network affiliate system is in transition as most viewers across the country get their stations via satellite and cable and as more network programming is finding its way directly onto DVDs and the Web. In this environment, some station owners are starting to feel a financial pinch, though not as acutely as their newspaper counterparts.

The daily newspaper business in particular has been suffering from what management consultants politely call value destruction: even though they may reach more readers via the Web, their business model is being undermined and their profit is flat or declining. Still, there are no doubt budding media grandees or private-equity gurus who would take a crack at owning TV and newspaper outlets in the same city if given half a chance.

Big media's argument for relaxing cross-ownership rules is that the days when broadcast TV and newspapers wholly dominated their markets are dimming. Publishers and broadcasters need scale to compete effectively in an era when cable, digitization and the Internet have vastly increased the number of sources of news and information in a market.

But the most important reason that cross-ownership rules no longer make sense is this: the distinctions between print and television are starting to blur in a digital world. Video on the Web is the biggest thing since turkey and gravy. Companies like Tribune have argued that their TV expertise will increasingly lead to more attractive and useful Web sites incorporating video clips alongside articles, and vice versa.

On the other side, many people, including artists, minority groups, consumer advocates and academics, say the rules should be maintained. Their basic counter-argument is that consolidation in all its different guises — radio-TV, multiple radio stations in a market, newspaper-TV ownership and so on — has inevitably led to homogeneity and blandness.

The Consumers Union says digital media have not led to as much variety and democratization as people might think. According to a study it conducted, about 70 percent of online news consumers said an association with a traditional news source makes online news more credible. Another study found that local television stations and newspapers were by far its respondents' chief sources of news. In other words, most people either watch local television or read the local paper — and it is those outlets' Web sites that will probably carry the most clout.

ANOTHER group's study filed in the proceedings last week aimed to debunk the contention — apparently embraced by the F.C.C. in the past — that cross-ownership led to improved news and public affairs programming at the television stations in question. But the report's author, an assistant professor at the University of Michigan, lost me when he noted that he was measuring only the quantity, not the quality, of programming in markets where newspapers and TV stations are jointly owned. "Systematic tools for evaluating the quality of news programming would also be useful," he wrote. Yikes, no thanks.

Yes, there is too much blandness in big media. Yes, television and newspapers are still the popular providers of local news. And, yes, it's probably impossible to say that consolidation has succeeded in every case in providing more news "from diverse and antagonistic sources."

But cross-media ownership is neither the solution to the industry's woes nor the potential bogeyman it might have once appeared. We're in a different game now.

Climate Research Center's Oversight Up For Bidding (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

denver — Wanna run a government lab staffed by hundreds of scientists tackling climate issues like global warming?

For the first time in 46 years, management of the National Center for Atmospheric Research, perched on a ridge under the Rocky Mountains northwest of here, is up for grabs. Since 1997, National Science Foundation policy has required that all government research institutions be subject to a competitive bidding process when their contracts come up for renewal.

Foundation officials say that a formal request for bids is imminent and that the competition will be open to all organizations — academic, nonprofit and for-profit. Since its founding in 1960, the atmospheric center, based in Boulder, has been run by a nonprofit consortium of 70 universities, the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research.

The center's research on global warming and its forecasts of rising temperatures, fiercer wildfires and stronger storms have drawn the ire of some politicians. But officials in Washington say that politics will not affect the competition.

"This doesn't really have anything to do with the science that's getting done there," said Kristin Spencer, the agreements officer at the National Science Foundation who is handling the competition.

The current five-year agreement to run the atmospheric center, which ends in September 2008, is worth $548 million.

Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who contends that human-caused global warming is a "hoax," wrote to the foundation in February to confirm it was putting the atmospheric center's management agreement out for bid. He also asked for lists of the roughly 1,000 employees of the center and its operating consortium, as well as the identities of such employees under contract with other government agencies or nonprofits.

Committee spokesman Matthew Dempsey said Inhofe was simply doing his job and had no interest in injecting politics into science. "As chairman of the … committee that has jurisdiction over issues of climate change, Sen. Inhofe remains committed to providing oversight of all climate change programs and ensuring accountability and transparency by government agencies," Dempsey said.

The National Center for Atmospheric Research is the last of the five federally funded research centers operated by the National Science Foundation to go out for bid. Only one has changed management as the result of competition: Last year, management of the Department of Energy's research labs at Los Alamos, N.M., switched from the University of California to a team headed by the private for-profit Bechtel Group.

The president of the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research, Rick Anthes, said the National Science Foundation warned the consortium in 2003 that it would have to compete to hold on to the atmospheric center. Anthes said he had no problem with that.

"We are very concerned with any political interference with this process," but, Anthes said, he expects "the NSF will run a very fair process."

"There's no guarantee … [but] we expect to win," Anthes added. "The success record is so strong."

Arsonist Sought As Calmer Winds Aid Firefighters (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif., Oct. 28 (AP) — Calmer winds on Saturday helped crews fighting a huge wildfire that killed four firefighters and critically injured a fifth, while investigators searched for the arsonist who set the blaze roaring through the canyons of Southern California.

"It looks like things are beginning to turn in our favor," said Bill Peters, a California Department of Forestry spokesman. "We had a good overnight. It wasn't nearly as windy as it's been."

Now in its third day, the fire that broke out in uninhabited brushland about 90 miles east of Los Angeles has blackened 39,900 acres, or more than 62 square miles, the authorities said. The fire was 40 percent contained, they added.

A reward for information leading to the arsonist rose to $500,000 on Friday, as $100,000 posted by Riverside County multiplied with matching offers from the state; neighboring San Bernardino County; a Rancho Mirage resident, Tim Blixseth; and the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, which has a casino in nearby Cabazon.

Forecasters predicted winds would ease and temperatures would drop slightly throughout the weekend, which could help as crews work in steep terrain to build fire lines around the blaze.

Investigators were looking into whether the wildfire was related to other blazes in recent months, including a canyon fire last weekend, though a sheriff's spokesman said there was no immediate indication of a serial arsonist.

Residents said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire broke out west of the San Jacinto Mountains.

The fire destroyed about 10 structures, including homes; forced 700 people to flee; and flushed coyotes and other wildlife into the open.

Santa Ana winds gusted to 45 miles an hour but kept the fire in undeveloped land, away from homes in Riverside County. About 2,700 firefighters worked to corral the flames and a DC-10 jet capable of dropping 12,000-gallon loads of retardant joined a fleet of firefighting helicopters and airtankers.

The Forest Service and the state Department of Forestry were investigating the firefighters' deaths, gathering information on weather, topography and fuel.

The four firefighters were killed Thursday when the wind blew a wall of flames down on them in the hills near Palm Springs as they tried to protect a home.

Michael Wakowski, a fire division chief in the San Bernardino National Forest, said it did not appear the crew did anything wrong.

"Sometimes things go bad, I hate to say," he said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Rules Cut Number Of Meth Labs (FWST)

By Jan Jarvis And Heather Svokos

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 29, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088017

Several times a day, pharmacists throughout North Texas get blasted by sniffling, sneezing allergy and sinus sufferers who hate what they have to go through to get their Sudafed.

First, consumers must show a photo ID, and then they must sign their name while someone on the other side of the counter fills in a log. It can take five minutes or more to get any medication that contains pseudoephedrine, the popular decongestant that criminals have used to make methamphetamine.

"It makes me very, very aggravated and irritated," said Mandi Elias of Arlington, who shopped recently at the south Arlington SuperTarget. "It's just so frustrating because I'm used to picking it up at the counter and going."

Such retail inconvenience is succeeding, however, in making it tough for would-be meth cooks to buy enough decongestant to produce the highly addictive substance that sheriffs nationwide identify as the country's No. 1 drug problem.

New laws limiting how much pseudoephedrine consumers can buy at a time have slashed the numbers of clandestine meth labs, which have blown up in rural areas and residential neighborhoods, law enforcement experts say.

But just as quickly, Mexican drug cartels have stepped in to fill the void. Mexican manufacturers now buy large quantities of decongestant tablets from China, Panama and India to make "ice," what some experts say is a purer, more potent form of the drug.

"We got so much meth coming up from Mexico." said Herschel Tebay, commander of the Tarrant County Narcotics Unit. "Over 50 percent of the cases that we're actively working on are meth." Growing demand for treatment

The federal Combat Meth Act took effect just last month. Signed by President Bush in March, the law limits pseudoephedrine sales to 3.6 grams per day and 9 grams every 30 days.

It also requires purchasers to provide identification and sign a logbook. Sellers must keep the products behind the counter or under lock and key and must register online with the U.S. Attorney General.

Texans have had more than a year to get used to a similar state law.

Since August 2005, pharmacists have been required to keep pseudoephedrine behind the counter. No one under 16 may purchase products containing the medication. The law limits consumers to no more than 6 grams of pseudoephedrine, the equivalent of two packages, at a time. Retailers must keep a log of those who buy it and maintain the records for two years.

There's little doubt that the restrictions have helped, experts said.

"We've pretty much shut down the mom and pop labs," said Tebay, whose team coordinates drug investigations. "We've gone from having 80 to 100 a year to running across maybe 20 to 25."

Statewide, the number of clandestine meth labs has dropped as well — down about 40 percent in the past few years. In 2005, 270 meth labs were found in Texas, compared with 452 in 2004 and 677 in 2003, according to the National Clandestine Laboratory Database, a clearinghouse for all federal, state and local lab seizures. It is operated by the El Paso Intelligence Center.

Through May of this year, the Texas Department of Public Safety had seized 86 meth labs, down from 382 the previous year, the most current figures available.

But those restrictions have little impact on the meth made and distributed in Mexico.

Last year, the Dallas-Fort Worth area ranked as one of the five largest trans-shipment zones for methamphetamine in the country, according to the U.S. Justice Department. When meth comes across the border, it comes most often to New York, Miami, San Diego, Houston and Dallas-Fort Worth.

Not surprisingly, demand for meth addiction treatment is growing. Meth is one of the most addictive drugs and is one of the toughest to quit for good.

In 2001, 2,574 people — 7 percent of admissions — reported meth as their primary drug, according to the Texas Department of State Health Services.

By 2005, that number had nearly tripled to 7,714 people or 15 percent of admissions — and those were only indigent clients in need of substance abuse treatment at state-funded clinics.

In Tarrant County, 24 percent of the 4,608 adults admitted to treatment facilities in 2005 were there for because of a meth or amphetamine addiction, the state agency said.

Consider some recent area examples:

DOJ_NMG_0088018

The Rev. Terry Hornbuckle, the former pastor of Arlington's Agape Christian Fellowship who was convicted in August of raping three women, tested positive for meth twice in the last year and a half. Witnesses testified during his trial that meth was Hornbuckle's drug of choice.

Scott Barnett, Bedford's former planning and community development director, was fired in February after being arrested for meth possession. Barnett was making almost $97,000 a year and had worked for the city for more than 20 years.

On Aug. 31, Fort Worth police arrested local car dealer Stephen Herman Blevins on suspicion of drug possession with intent to deliver. They found 48 pounds of methamphetamine — with a street value of $2 million (or nearly $500,000 wholesale). The bust was one of the largest meth seizures in the city's history.

And just this week, the Tarrant County medical examiner ruled that Michael Callahan, a 54-year-old found dead in a vacant lot in far south Fort Worth on Sept. 3 had died accidentally from acute methamphetamine intoxication. Reformulated products

With no sign of demand for meth slowing, some pharmaceutical companies have responded by reformulating products to include phenylephrine so they don't have to be put them behind the counter, said Darrell Spence of Fort Worth, immediate past president of the Texas Pharmacy Association.

Phenylephrine is a decongestant that, like pseudoephedrine, works by shrinking blood vessels. It can be taken orally but is also found in nasal sprays such as Neo-Synephrine. It cannot be used to make meth. The maximum daily adult dosage for phenylephrine is 60 mg; for pseudoephedrine it is 240 mg.

In January 2005, Pfizer, which makes Sudafed, began marketing Sudafed PE, which contains phenylephrine. Since then, other cold medications including Dayquil, Theraflu and Alka-Seltzer Plus have hit the market with new formulas containing phenylephrine.

But there have been questions about the effectiveness of the decongestant in the dose available.

Two University of Florida pharmacists argued that the drug was ineffective at the Food and Drug Administration's approved dose, in a July peer-reviewed letter to the Journal of Allergy and Clinical Immunology.

"When ingested, it becomes inactivated between the gut and the liver," according to Leslie Hendeles, one of the University of Florida pharmacists who warned that the drug is poorly absorbed in the bloodstream.

In 1976, the FDA said that a 10 milligram dose was safe and effective, making it possible for companies to use the ingredient without conducting studies, according to the University of Florida pharmacists.

But some people say the drug does not work at the 10 milligram dosage.

"In my experience, it is not as effective at drying up stuffy noses," Spence said.

The maker of Claritin-D, the best-selling branded cold product with $302.5 million in sales this year, used another strategy. Schering-Plough began an advertising campaign this fall telling consumers that it chose not to change its formula, which contains pseudoephedrine. The original formula — even though it's kept behind the pharmacy counter — works best, the manufacturer says.

Still it's a hassle when someone gets sick after the pharmacy closes, said Elias, the Arlington mother.

"When the kids get sick at 11 or 12 at night, I can't get anything for them," she said. "I have to wait until the next day."

Federal Marshals, Police Step-up Effort To Nab Sex Offenders (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 29, 2006

Squads of federal marshals and police rounded up hundreds of sexual predators and gang members in the eastern half of the United States as part of a nationwide manhunt that included 26 arrests in the city of Pittsburgh on Wednesday.

Deferring to the U.S. Justice Department, Pittsburgh police said they couldn't discuss the charges or provide any details.

But some of those caught here were sex offenders; others were fugitives with warrants for a variety of other felonies.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez will announce the national results on Thursday in Washington, D.C., and locally U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan plans a news conference to detail the arrests in the 25-county Western Pennsylvania district.

The roundup is the second part of a national effort to hunt down sex offenders. The first phase was in April, when the marshals arrested 1,102 fugitives on various sex offense charges in 27 states west of the Mississippi River.

DOJ_NMG_0088019

A similar operation last year, which targeted mostly violent repeat offenders, netted 10,340 fugitives across the United States, the largest fugitive apprehension in history. In this region, more than 100 were captured.

This time the marshals and local police concentrated heavily on Megan's Law violators and other sexual predators, including those who have failed to register as sex offenders or are not living at the addresses where their Megan's Law form says they should be.

Keeping track of sex offenders has long been a headache for police who are often overburdened with other duties.

But this year a new law has designated the marshals service as the lead agency to hunt them down across the U.S.

The law, the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, was signed by President Bush on July 27, the 25th anniversary of the abduction and murder of 6-year-old Adam Walsh in Florida.

Adam's father, John Walsh, is the host of "America's Most Wanted." He and his wife, Reve, attended the signing in the White House Rose Garden.

Under the law, convicted sex offenders who fail to register with local authorities will be charged with a felony in the U.S. District Courts. Previously, each state dealt with failure to register differently.

The first man in the country to be charged with the new federal crime of failure to register is John Henry Gill, 47, who was indicted last week in Salt Lake City.

The marshals' new initiative has parallels with the Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns under Project Safe Neighborhoods, in which the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is the designated agency for pursuing ex-cons caught carrying weapons, a federal crime.

The marshals will assume a similar role for convicted sex offenders. Although he was not among those caught last week, one local example of the kind of fugitive the marshals will pursue is Larry M. Williams, 33, of Lincoln-Lemington, who was arrested at a North Side mosque this summer.

In addition to being wanted on federal weapons charges, he was also wanted for failure to register as a sex offender following his rape conviction in the state of Washington.

Since the Adam Walsh law went into affect, deputy marshals have been training with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children to get up to speed on Megan's Law registry and child predator issues.

IMMIGRATION:

Critics Attack Proposed Rules For Citizenship (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 29, 2006

Fee hikes, new tests, online filings called barriers for poor.

Immigrant advocacy groups are decrying an array of proposed federal measures, including application fee increases and online filing requirements, that they fear will sharply reduce the ability of some legal immigrants to become U.S. citizens.

As President Bush signed a controversial bill last week authorizing 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant rights groups charge that the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services is erecting a virtual "second wall" that would disproportionately hurt Mexican immigrants, who tend to be less educated and earn lower incomes than others.

Last week, a coalition of more than 230 religious, labor and immigrant rights groups delivered a letter to citizenship bureau Director Emilio Gonzalez, expressing strong concern about application fee increases that could double to $800, a "digital barrier" of a mandatory online filing system, extensive new paperwork and a revised history and civics test they fear could be more difficult.

"Together they appear to us a clear strategy pursued through administrative fiat to make the dream of American citizenship unattainable for many lower-income, less-educated immigrants," said the letter, which was initiated by the Chicago-based Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights.

Some activists fear the Bush administration is seeking to tighten access to citizenship to bar potential new Democratic voters. But U.S. immigration officials flatly deny any partisan motives.

They say they are merely aiming to make the system more efficient, financially self-sustaining and better able to ensure that new citizens understand foundational American values and historical events. Some of the initiatives, including the move to automation and a revised test, were recommended in 1997 by the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform under the Clinton administration. The final proposals are expected to be announced in the next few months and take 12 to 18 months to implement.

"There is no more priceless gift a person can receive than American citizenship," said Christopher Bentley, spokesman for the citizenship bureau in Washington. "Our expectation is that people who have the opportunity to become U.S. citizens realize that the cost and sacrifice is worth the investment in their future."

Some immigrants would seem to agree. At a recent citizenship workshop in Los Angeles, where volunteers served 2,000 people who lined up for hours to apply for naturalization, machine operator Arturo Reyna said he scrimped and saved for a year to pay the $400 application fee. The native of Mexico, whose wife, Rosa, is a U.S. citizen, said the price was eminently worth the right to vote and to live here with his family.

"There are big groups trying to stop immigration," said Reyna, 30. "We don't like these things, but we can't vote. As a citizen, you can take part in decisions."

Victor Yebra, a 38-year-old silk screener who illegally crossed the U.S.-Mexico border as a boy to join his bracero father and subsequently won amnesty, said some immigrants might find higher application fees or online filing requirements onerous. But he said they would not dissuade those determined to become citizens.

"A lot of people here won't want to deal with these things, but I think they'll find a way to do it," Yebra said. "It's all for your own good future."

The proposed changes have, however, alarmed many — and not only in the Latino community. Koreans accounted for about one-fourth of the organizations signing the letter of protest to Gonzalez.

Koreans began naturalizing in greater numbers in the mid-1990s, when the Los Angeles riot and welfare cutbacks aimed at immigrants showed them the importance of civic influence, said Eun Sook Lee, executive director of the National Korean American Service & Education Consortium in Koreatown. Still, she said, about 300,000 Korean immigrants eligible to become citizens have not yet done so.

"With these measures, the message they're sending is that they want to delay full civic participation of new citizens," Lee said.

According to scholars, the politics of naturalization are nearly as old as citizenship rites themselves.

At the turn of the 20th century, urban political machines trolling for voters in several states pushed through so many fraudulent naturalizations that Congress passed a landmark immigration reform bill in 1906, said Lorraine McDonnell, a UC Santa Barbara political science professor. Among other things, she said, the reform bill required for the first time that applicants be able to speak English.

More recently, the Clinton administration was accused of "importing votes" by relaxing normal immigration procedures in its Citizenship USA campaign to register 1 million mostly Latino new voters before the 1996 elections. The charges by Republicans and other critics sparked a three-year Justice Department investigation, which ultimately rejected charges of partisan motives but found slipshod management, including lax background checks that allowed 6,000 possible criminals to become citizens.

To become citizens, legal permanent residents must reside in the United States for five years — or three years if they are married to a U.S. citizen or serve in the military. They must also pass English and civics tests, be of "good moral character" and take an oath of allegiance.

Concern about the civics test dates back to 1997, when the U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform criticized it for relying on "memorization of discrete facts rather than on substantive understanding of the basic concepts of civic participation."

Under the Bush administration, activists feared that the tests would become more difficult and the format changed to multiple choice, which some immigrants are unfamiliar with, said Fred Tsao of the Illinois immigration coalition, which has closely tracked the issue.

Tsao and others said their anxiety mounted after the Senate passed Republican-sponsored legislation this year setting as goals for the revised test understanding of major documents, such as the Federalist Papers and Emancipation Proclamation, and important historical events, such as major court decisions and key figures in U.S. politics, science, business and art.

Those concerns, however, have abated somewhat. Immigration officials began meeting regularly with adult educators and immigrant advocates, and assured them the test's format and degree of difficulty would not change.

"We want to add meaning to the process, not make it harder, so we have assurances that this exercise empowers [new citizens] to take their rightful place in society," the citizenship bureau's Bentley said.

As one example, he said, questions about the American flag's colors might be jettisoned in favor of those about key rights, such as voting.

Activists are more concerned about proposed fee increases and mandatory online filing. The fees have increased to $400 from $95 since 1998 and are set to possibly double after immigration officials complete a fee survey later this year.

Marcelo Gaete of the Los Angeles-based National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials Educational Fund said that hundreds of immigrants in two recent citizenship workshops could not afford to pay the current fees and would suffer if they were increased.

But Bentley said the fee hikes were inevitable because the citizenship bureau receives no regular budget appropriation and must be self-sustaining. A special five-year budget appropriation of $440 million that reduced the application backlog from 3.8 million cases in January 2004 to 120,000 as of August is set to run out, requiring new revenue to sustain the progress, he said.

To promote efficiency, Bentley said the agency also aims to eliminate paper filing and transform to an all-electronic system in the next five years. "The infrastructure we have now is broken," he said. "We have to come into the 21st century."

Activists, however, say an online filing requirement will shut out many immigrants without access to computers and open the door to abuse from unscrupulous immigration businesses.

By requiring a 19-page form simply to register for an online account, the new system will all but eliminate the ability to offer mass citizenship application workshops, said Laura Burdick deputy director for national programs at the Catholic Legal Immigration Network in Washington.

"This is not a Democratic or Republican issue," Burdick said. "Citizenship is in everyone's interest."

TAX:

Future Tax Shock (NYT)

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

One of President Bush's be-very-afraid lines this campaign season is that Democrats, if elected, will raise taxes. What he doesn't say is that if you are one of tens of millions of Americans who make between $75,000 and $500,000 a year, your taxes are already scheduled to rise starting next year — because of laws that Mr. Bush championed and other actions he failed to take.

The higher taxes stem from the alternative minimum tax, a levy that is supposed to snare multimillionaires who would otherwise get away with using excessive tax shelters to wipe out their tax bills. But these days, the alternative tax is snaring many upper-middle-income filers.

Mr. Bush set the trap in 2001 — and in 2003, 2004 and 2006. In each of those years, he flogged for new tax cuts without requiring corresponding long-term changes in the existing rules for the alternative tax. It was well known that failure to update the alternative tax would create perverse interactions with the new tax cuts, causing filers' tax bills to drop because of the cuts, only to shoot back up again from the alternative levy.

Mr. Bush said he would vanquish the problem through tax reform. Didn't happen. Congress never wrestled with lasting solutions. The truth is, the president and lawmakers are paralyzed. To fix the alternative tax while keeping the Bush tax cuts on the books would result in the loss of some $800 billion in revenue over 10 years, blowing a hole in the federal budget and exposing how utterly unaffordable the tax cuts of the last five years really are.

The taxpayers wrongly afflicted by the alternative tax are not tax dodgers. For the most part, they are couples with children who have broken into the ranks of six-figure earners, and who live in high-tax states like New York and California. They are being penalized, in effect, for claiming everyday deductions — like write-offs for dependents and property taxes — which, under the alternative tax rules, are viewed as excessive shelters.

Meanwhile, multimillionaires are not being snared at nearly the same rate as other filers. In part, that's because much of the income of the superrich comes from investments. The tax breaks for investments — the grail of the administration's tax-cutting crusade — are not counted as shelters under the alternative tax the way, say, children are.

For the past few years, Congress has papered over the mess by passing temporary relief measures to shield most — though not all — upper-middle-income taxpayers from having to pay the alternative tax. The latest stopgap expires at the end of this year, leaving taxpayers exposed at ever lower income levels. Congress could pass another temporary stay, and it will probably do so.

But stopgaps do little to protect the families already being unfairly clobbered by the alternative tax. And they make the nation's underlying budget problems worse. Like the Bush tax cuts themselves, they result in less tax revenue than is needed, requiring the government to borrow heavily. The mounting debt of the Bush years — all of which must be paid back with interest — makes tax increases or budget cuts, or both, inevitable.

The president wants to push off the day of reckoning until he leaves the White House, while whipping up voter fear of future tax increases. But the reality is that he and his supporters have laid the groundwork for higher taxes and hamstrung government, no matter who is in office in the months and years to come.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

What He's Trying To Say (NYT)

By Ben Wallace-Wells

The New York Times, October 29, 2006

The White House, like any castle, has its own peculiar rituals, and in the five months that Tony Snow has been President George W. Bush's press secretary, he has begun to learn them. For instance, at some point in virtually every televised press briefing, a middle-aged man named Raghubir Goyal, who is The India Globe's Washington correspondent, will thrust his arm anxiously into the air, be called on and deliver a rambling monologue about the perfidies of Pakistan in general and Pakistan's president, Gen.

Pervez Musharraf, in particular. And a man named Lester Kinsolving, a radio host and reporter for a Baltimore station with a big grin and game-show-host wavy hair, will interrupt a back-and-forth on, say, the operational capacities of Al Qaeda to read confounding questions he has written out, word for word, before the press briefing began.

"Tony," Kinsolving began one morning in September, "The Washington Times noted on Page 1 that the Congressional Black Caucus will remain exclusively black. Does the president support or oppose this racial segregation, which excluded California Congressman Pete Stark — who risked his life for civil rights in Mississippi — because Stark was born white?"

Snow grinned and shook his head and began to point to some other reporter, any other reporter.

"No, wait a minute," Kinsolving said, "are you just going to evade that question?"

No," Snow said, beginning to laugh, enjoying the exchange, his deep voice booming, "I'm going to laugh at it." He did. So did the rest of the room.

Snow, who is 51, is 6-foot-4, with a genial lectern slouch and a chin that looks as if it were built for contact. But the first thing you notice about him is his facility at managing the fragile balance of a press room, its constant teeter between sincerity, open hostility and absurdity. Kinsolving's and Goyal's questions were sometimes land mines for previous press secretaries. Snow brushes past them genially. For the most part, Snow's two predecessors in the Bush White House tended to look as if they regarded the twice-daily meetings with the press as painful procedures. Still, these are anxious days for the White House, with the president's approval ratings stuck below 40 percent — the sort of number that has a way of emboldening the reporters and making the atmosphere in the press room particularly aggressive. So the Bush White House has turned to Snow, a longtime broadcaster at Fox News, in the hope that he can change the tone and project a confident, prime-time sort of calm. Gone already is the firing squad of the Scott McClellan days, and there is little echo of the testy, you-don't-need-to-know authority of President Bush's first press secretary,

Ari Fleischer. Snow's style is basically cheery: Gee, isn't it fun to run the world?

From the perspective of the White House, the classic Tony Snow moment came on Sept. 12, when he was challenged by David Gregory, the chief White House correspondent from NBC News, who has become perhaps the most consistently aggressive of the big-time correspondents. Vice President Dick Cheney had charged that the Democrats' talk of withdrawing the troops from Iraq "validates the strategy of the terrorists," and John Boehner, the House majority leader, had phrased the matter even more harshly, saying of the Democrats, "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than they are in protecting the American people." Gregory began caustically: "As you know, this is not a campaign season about whether America is a great place or not, right? I mean, it's a lot more substantive than that, and it has to do with the path that this president took the country after 9/11." Then he asked whether the president supported Cheney's statement. Snow, who had been on the job for about four months, went further than that. "I think it's true," he said.

Then what Snow did was give an abbreviated but learned-sounding tour through the history of Al Qaeda's conflict with the United States. "Osama bin Laden has made it clear . . . if the United States is pushed from Iraq, it will be to the eternal humiliation of the United States," Snow said. "Bin Laden drew the conclusion when we left Somalia that the Americans didn't have what it took to stick it out." He continued, "So, as an objective assessment about the way in which bin Laden views the United States," Cheney's saying Democratic debates over Iraq withdrawal would strengthen terrorists "is a true statement."

It may not have survived scholarly scrutiny, but Snow's response was like a temporary pontoon bridge built to scurry the troops across the river: it got the job done. There was a desultory follow-up, but even Gregory, in his broadcast that evening, played the controversy over Cheney's comments as a simple, partisan spat. "The press briefing that day," says Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president and Snow's boss, "was amazing. Tony took a line that could have been a real problem and completely deflated it."

Snow has had to do a lot of deflating since coming on board. He has become the public face of an administration under the most sustained period of pressure that it has yet seen; his job is managing the siege. The White House has chosen not to switch course on its major policy initiatives, abroad or at home, even though its major legislative efforts, from Social Security privatization to comprehensive immigration reform, have stalled, and its initiatives in Iraq and Afghanistan are troubled at best. Nor has the administration changed the substance of its message. With midterm elections approaching and the administration keeping one eye on its legacy, the White House is simply betting that it can sell it all better this time, with a little more skill and a little more finesse. Tony Snow's tenure is becoming a study in the science — and limits — of political charm.

A few years ago, the conservative media consultant Frank Luntz did a focus group studying the on-air styles of the various Sunday talk-show hosts, including Snow. He found that Snow graded very highly among both liberal and conservative viewers, in large part because his style was different from most conservatives on television.

"Republicans for a decade have been very good at pushing their message on people," Luntz told me recently over the phone. "Tony does something completely different — he pulls you in. Watch his facial expression — he's almost always smiling, which is different from other press secretaries. He speaks softly, and so you turn up the volume on your television. You don't feel like you're being sold something. With Tony, it's a conversation. You don't stand up and cheer when Tony finishes speaking; you nod your head in affirmation."

Luntz paused, then said: "Look, Tony's good on message, but he's not great. Ari Fleischer was better. Tony's genius is his style of communication, and that's exactly what the president needs right now."

"If Tony Snow had been press secretary instead of Scott McClellan during the initial revelation of the Valerie Plame stuff," says Eric Alterman, a journalism professor at Brooklyn College and a liberal media critic, "I think it wouldn't have been nearly what it was. Snow would have known how to handle it."

The successes of press secretaries are always hidden — one-day negative stories that didn't become four-day negative stories, attacks on the president that didn't take hold. But given the tortured recent history of relations between the White House and its press corps, that's no small claim. Scott McClellan, a longtime Bush loyalist and Snow's immediate predecessor, had trouble with White House reporters from the beginning. As Jay Rosen, a journalism professor at New York University, put it to me, McClellan "was a strategic noncommunicator," and having him in the job was tantamount to "mooning the press." The situation seemed to become untenable, though, with the Plame scandal, after it turned out that Karl Rove, the deputy chief of staff, and

I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president's chief of staff, had discussed Plame's role as an intelligence officer with reporters; McClellan had previously insisted, steadfastly, that they had not. Members of the press corps say that that experience convinced them that McClellan couldn't be relied upon to deliver anything more than White House spin. "With Scott, you found that if you tried to debate something, you just got into a recitation of the White House's line, and with Valerie Plame this became painfully obvious," Mark Silva of The Chicago Tribune told me. When

Joshua Bolten was picked to be the new White House chief of staff early last spring, he started the search for a new spokesman. "This isn't to disparage Scott or anything, but we were looking for a game changer in that position," Dan Bartlett, the president's communications director, told me.

Mark Halperin, the political director of ABC News and the author of a recent book about politicians and the press, says he has seen a change. "More so than many of his predecessors, Tony understands that questions are being asked in the public interest, and he tries to answer in the spirit in which he's been asked," he said. "It's at the margins, but there's an improvement."

And in the months since Bolten took over and hired Snow, this famously closed White House has become marginally more open. It has given reporters more on-the-record access to the president and has brought in more governmental experts to brief the press. White House officials say that these changes came, in part, at Snow's urging. Snow also asked for a large role in policy making. And though Snow himself says, "Let's just say I'm satisfied on that count," so far evidence of his policy influence is hard to discern. "It's not like he has more access than Scott did, because he doesn't," one senior administration official told me. "If there's a change, it's that Tony is maybe a little more assertive when he's at the table, but Scott had the same seat."

I asked Bartlett for an example of an issue on which Snow's influence was evident. He thought hard and then told me that he had pushed really hard for the president to make the speech to the N.A.A.C.P., an outreach last July to black Americans, in advance of the first anniversary of Hurricane Katrina. Bush was generally lauded for the appearance — his first at the N.A.A.C.P. since he became president — but it has hardly represented a central part of the president's agenda.

According to White House officials, Snow does play a bigger role than previous press secretaries did in helping to design the day's responses to anticipated press inquiries. But Snow's more obvious success has been within the theatrical confines of the press room — in deflecting damaging stories before they gain traction, in phrasing the president's position more eloquently and precisely than Bush himself is able to and in imposing the White House's line on the story of the day.

"I don't think Tony fully realized when he started," Bartlett told me, "how much of an elephant in the room the briefing is. When you get done preparing for the gaggle, doing the gaggle, preparing for the briefing, doing the briefing, taking reporter's calls, that's basically your day. It's not like you've got all this time left to do other stuff."

One of the peculiarities of the White House press room is that it has its own academic: a Towson University political-science professor named Martha Joynt Kumar, who has been attending press briefings since 1975 but is free from the obligations of her colleagues, who actually ask questions and then produce stories. Professor Kumar simply observes, and her scholarship is aimed at writing about White House communication with the news media.

Kumar says that the job changed in 1995, when President Clinton's press secretary, Mike McCurry, decided to televise the daily briefing in its entirety. The midday show gave the White House a daily platform to promote its message, she says, and turned the press secretary into a more visible public figure. Snow is taking greater advantage of this, she says, than any press secretary has before. He has begun to speak at fund-raisers for Congressional candidates, something no previous press secretary has done. He is scheduled as the headline act for at least a dozen such events before Election Day. All of these appearances have been booked by the White House political operation, which says it isn't keeping tabs on how much money Snow brings in. But to judge from his Oct. 14 appearance at a fund-raiser for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, at which 850 people paid $175 apiece to see him speak, it is not an insignificant sum. Kumar says that the fund-raisers, which are purely political rather than informational, represent "a real change from previous administrations, and a real danger."

There is a natural tension between these two parts of the press secretary's job — the political and the informational — and occasionally Snow has overreached on the politics. In July, defending Bush's veto of legislation that would increase federal financing of embryonic-stem-cell research, Snow told reporters that the president's position was that such research amounted to "murder." This was not a position that the president had taken previously, and a week later, Snow apologized to reporters for "overstepping my brief." It echoed a jaunty claim Snow made during his first press briefing, when he guaranteed that the Senate would pass the president's comprehensive immigration-reform bill, legislation that Snow himself lobbied vigorously for during his first weeks as press secretary (on influential conservative television shows like Lou Dobbs's and Bill O'Reilly's) but did not pass the Senate this year.

"The test for Tony is whether he doesn't just become seen as a pitchman, as advancing a position, and whether he keeps a reputation as someone who can provide accurate information," Kumar told me. "Because providing accurate information is the job — if you don't do that, you lose your credibility as press secretary. So much of that job is still in that room."

Watching Snow in that room when he is working fluently and well is really something; the press secretary is gloriously glib. One Wednesday in the middle of September, he rebuffed a grandstanding network television reporter who had brought a big dictionary into the briefing room, trying to force Snow to square the definition of "fascism," with its references to an ideology of the supremacy of a strong centralized state and powerful bureaucracy, with the president's claim that the terrorists of Al Qaeda were "Islamofascists"; Al Qaeda, obviously, has no bureaucrats at all. Snow replied that bin Laden had called for the adoption of Sharia across the Muslim world and said he wanted to re-establish the Islamic caliphate, stretching from Spain to Asia. "It fits," Snow said, not smiling, just plain and factual, "all of the descriptions you've had."

It was a classic Snow moment. Following his political hero, Ronald Reagan, Snow has developed an instinct for clarity, for boiling things down. He has a tendency to speak about even the most complex issues in simple terms, something that can lead him into clichés. ("Race relations aren't hard; people make them hard," he has said.)

When I met with Snow in his office at the end of September, he talked about the constraints on a press secretary's power. At the end of that week, the precise limitations became a little more apparent, as the White House was caught in a series of snowballing scandals: the release of a National Intelligence Estimate that found that the war in Iraq was inspiring more Muslims to join the jihadist cause; the publication of Bob Woodward's book <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="279002">"State of Denial," which described a White House too stubborn to accept the grim realities on the ground in Iraq; and the transgressions of the Republican representative

Mark Foley, who resigned after it was revealed he'd sent sexually suggestive instant messages to male House pages. Snow looked a little less fresh and a little less happy than when I'd seen him a few weeks earlier, and he was beginning to make mistakes. He had tried to pass off the Foley scandal as "simply naughty e-mails," which made it seem as if the White House wasn't taking the scandal seriously, and he would spend much of the next several days backtracking. When he tried to debunk a series of Woodward's findings as the reporter's own invention, the press didn't buy Snow's line. As for the intelligence estimate, Snow pooh-poohed the estimate's findings and failed to keep the story from continuing for a second and third day. Referring to the N.I.E. story, Kumar told me: "Tony lost control of the room that day. That's the only time I've seen that happen."</object.title>

Snow was born in Berea, Ky., and grew up in Cincinnati. His father was a high-school principal and his mother was a nurse. (She died of colon cancer when Snow was 17.) "I was the kind of kid," Snow says, when asked about his boyhood self, "who went to summer school because I liked it."

This is the way Snow and his friends tell the story of Tony Snow: he is an earnest, bookish guy whose passion is for burrowing down into wonky issues. "With Tony, sometimes you have to say, 'No, you can't read all 300 pages of that report,' " Marty Ryan, who was Snow's executive producer at "Fox News Sunday," told me. (Like many conservatives who came of age when he did, when conservatism was still more of a philosophical project than a political one, Snow has a tendency to insist on the intellectual agility of his fellow travelers. When I asked him to describe his boss, he said that the president "reminds me of one of those guys who walks through a gym playing 40 games of chess at once and can keep all the moves in his head.")

Snow graduated from Davidson College in Charlotte, N.C., with a degree in philosophy in 1977 and then, after brief stints teaching school in Africa and then in Cincinnati, started sending out applications to newspapers. "Seemed like the best job in the world — you get to talk to all kinds of people you could never get near otherwise," Snow told me. Two years out of Davidson, he landed on the editorial page of The Greensboro Record, in North Carolina (circulation, 33,000), working for Terry Eastland, a young conservative writer who is now the publisher of The Weekly Standard. Snow would follow Eastland to The Norfolk

Virginian-Pilot. From there he went to The Daily Press of Newport News, Va. At Eastland's direction, Snow once spent a couple of months on the news desk at The Greensboro Record, but otherwise he has always been an opinion writer, not a reporter. He does not have a great deal of reverence for the old-time idea of the objective, truth-seeking reporter: "God, the source of all fact and truth, is objective," he once told an audience at Hillsdale College, in Spring Arbor, Mich., "but journalists, who often know very little, are not." (This is unusually direct Godspeak from Snow, who is a Catholic convert and talks with little of the direct religiosity of the president.) Snow moved on to conservative editorial pages in bigger markets — to The Detroit News, where he spent three years and where he met the woman he would marry, Jill Ellen Walker, and then, in 1987, to Washington, where he oversaw The Washington Times's editorial pages. He has been in the capital ever since.

Snow knows everyone in Washington. This doesn't betray any particular social promiscuity — Snow spends most of his weekends with his wife and three children. It is simply a result of the forceful inertia of having spent almost two decades being affable and important in a city that values both qualities. Testimonies to his geniality are rampant. "We had political differences, but that made it fun to argue with him, not hard to argue with him like some others," Gordon Morse, a friend and a liberal editorial writer who worked with Snow at The Daily Press, told me. "We'd be 24 and going to see some Mad Max movie and happily quarreling about politics, and he's the same guy now." Snow is friends with more journalists than politicians, and more conservatives than liberals, but not to the point of exclusion. Snow is friendly with the conservative activist Grover Norquist and with the Democratic partisan Sidney Blumenthal, two of the more polarizing figures in Washington.

In 1991, Snow was hired to work as a speechwriter for President George H. W. Bush. "He had a big office over in the Old Executive Office Building," Morse told me. "He was very much taken with the place." The thrill passed quickly. With the gulf war over, the White House was becoming marked by infighting and began spiraling toward a losing election campaign. John Sununu, the chief of staff who hired Snow, resigned shortly after Snow came on board. Snow was reassigned soon after to one of the less glamorous jobs in the communications office, ghostwriting op-eds for senior administration officials. I asked Snow about the experience. "In the first Bush White House, we were undone by backstabbing," he told me fiercely. "People were just being vicious to one another. They were trying to serve their own interest, and not the president's." It is the lone bitter thing I've ever heard him say.

After he left the first Bush White House, he stayed friendly with an obscure White House employee from New Jersey named Linda Tripp, who stayed on during the Clinton administration. When Tripp decided to write a tell-all book about the Democratic administration, it was Snow, of all her Bush White House contacts, she asked for help. Snow put Tripp in touch with the conservative literary agent and columnist Lucianne Goldberg. Later Tripp befriended Monica Lewinsky, who confided that she had been having an affair with the president, and a scandal was soon born.

Snow wrote a column for The Detroit News and sampled a number of different jobs; for a while, he was Rush Limbaugh's guest host, but it became clear that Snow was, in Eastland's words, "not inclined to bash as much as some people." There was also a philosophical difference: Snow's the kind of conservative who is at home in the modern, bourgeois world and is not particularly interested in attacking it. He went to Rock 'n' Roll Fantasy Camp; he is friendly with Ian Anderson, the singer and rock flautist who leads Jethro Tull.

In 1996, Snow switched to a different medium and signed on as the host of a new program, "Fox News Sunday." Fox's executives were looking for a fresh face and noticed Snow during some appearances he'd made on "CBS Morning News." "What he had was all the stuff you couldn't teach," Marty Ryan, Snow's producer at Fox News, told me. In the program's early days, when it was having trouble getting guests, Snow used to chat up senators and representatives, trying to get them on his show. Snow stayed at "Fox News Sunday" for more than seven years, conducting interviews and managing a panel of first three and then four other pundits. He was nimble and, for an anchor, comparatively retiring. "One of Tony's great strengths," Ryan told me, "was knowing how to give others their space." In 2004, Snow left to do his own program on Fox News Radio.

Then, in early 2005, Snow received a diagnosis of colon cancer, the same disease that killed his mother. He had chemotherapy and two operations. Having had cancer, he subsequently said, shifted his perspective. "It sounds trite, but it's true," he told me. "You have a relish and appreciation for life you didn't have before. It gives you a fresh wonder about the world, and about people."

Last spring, when Bolten talked to Snow about succeeding McClellan, he doubted his chances at persuading Snow to join the White House. But he made his case anyway: the president's "fundamentals" were sound, Bolten said. Snow agreed. Snow would be this administration's daily public face, trying to bring public opinion back into the president's favor. As a commentator, Snow called the president "something of an embarrassment." He called the White House "impotent." Snow didn't really need the job. "My first response was no," he recalls. But as he thought about it more, Snow says, he realized that he "always liked the president, from back when he worked for his father's campaign." And after all, this is the reason most people come to Washington, not just to hover around power but to wield it.

"Every administration has ups and downs in the relationship between the White House and the press — certainly Nixon had moments that were as bad as any now, and Clinton and Reagan probably did, too," says David Greenberg, a professor of history and media at Rutgers who studies presidential communication. "But two things that are going on now are genuinely new. The first is that conservatives have had a great deal of success with a political strategy that includes demonizing the liberal media, and so there is a confidence there now that didn't exist with Nixon or Reagan, that this will work politically. But the other thing is the increased partisanship of the media, the rise of cable news, of Internet news, an increasing shrillness among even newspaper columnists, has served to discredit the idea of a mainstream media, and gives politicians a way to get around them."

The Bush administration played to this demonization of the liberal media with its first two press secretaries, who were often hostile and generally withholding with the press corps. The White House seemed to be sending a message to its base: not only are the mainstream media the enemy, they're also unnecessary. With Snow they've chosen a different tone, but the changes Greenberg talks about still offer him the possibility, the hope, that presidential communication might be liberated from the press room — that he might speak directly to the people, every day, not just as a press secretary does, interrupted and directed by reporters, but as a politician might. "One thing I've noticed about Tony as press secretary is he isn't trying to only speak to the reporters in the room — it seems like he's also trying to speak past them, to people watching at home," John Moody, a senior vice president at Fox News and Snow's former boss, told me.

One of the most visible changes since Snow arrived has been the increase in the number of "fact sheets" the press office issues to challenge the interpretation of the news in the mainstream press. Before Snow became press secretary, such releases used to be comparatively rare; they now appear nearly every day. In part they're aimed at a fair-minded correcting of the record, and in part they're meant to tweak critical reporters, but they've also proved enormously helpful for conservative bloggers. "It's really useful and smart — it puts bloggers in the position of going directly to the unexpurgated text and seeing what's being spun or played or ignored, and it certainly circulates," Glenn Reynolds, a law professor at the University of Tennessee and the proprietor of the influential conservative blog Instapundit, told me. "Particularly if your administration regards the press as an essentially hostile enterprise, you want to give people more direct access."

Most of the people who work for Snow in the press secretary's office look really young. ("Seems like his whole staff is 26," I said to Kumar. She snorted. "Twenty-six? They look about 23 to me.") And that makes sense: working in the White House imposes its own brutalities on your life. Snow says he wakes up every morning before 4 and has his first meeting, with the national security adviser, at half past 6. From then, he is performing or preparing to perform for the next 12 to 14 hours. "The job is hell, it is political war," Frank Luntz says, "and it has been for 10 years" — ever since McCurry instituted the televised daily briefing. "Every day, you wake up knowing the battle is just as tough, the enemy just as ferocious. You're outnumbered 30 to 1. You can't just beat 29 of them, you have to beat all 30 of them, every single day." This is the reason, Luntz says, that the "best press secretaries do their best work in their first year." No wonder, then, that after four years, Scott McClellan began to crack.

These are still early days for Snow, and this kind of fraying has been only intermittently visible. "Who knows how I'll feel in two years?" Snow says. "But it's fun right now. When you live on deadlines, it creates a pleasant pressure to perform and to deliver."

I went to see Snow's press briefing one Friday late in September. Over the previous 24 hours, the first excerpts from Woodward's book had begun to trickle out, and the administration was getting pummeled. Snow had been on the phone all morning, speaking to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other foreign-policy officials, trying to figure out where the Woodward account could be challenged, trying to get the administration's story right, and he pushed back the press briefing by almost two hours to give himself time to prepare. He undoubtedly knew that no matter how well he did that day, the lead paragraphs in the next day's papers would still reflect poorly on the White House. The best he could hope for was that the eighth paragraph, the one with the administration's response, would come off as sympathetic, would be carefully phrased. The reporters started to file in 10 minutes before the delayed briefing was to start. A young White House aide called out a five-minute warning, then a two-minute warning, then Snow walked out of the elevator to the lectern and put down his briefing book and a cup of coffee.

He smiled, knowing what was coming. And he genuinely looked as if he were enjoying the moment. "Hello everybody," he said. "We'll go right to questions."

GAO Chief Warns Economic Disaster Looms (AP)

By Matt Crenson, Associated Press

AP, October 28, 2006

AUSTIN — David Walker sure talks like he's running for office. "This is about the future of our country, our kids and grandkids," the comptroller general of the United States warns a packed hall at Austin's historic Driskill Hotel. "We the people have to rise up to make sure things get changed."

But Walker doesn't want, or need, your vote this November. He already has a job as head of the Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress that audits and evaluates the performance of the federal government.

Basically, that makes Walker the nation's accountant-in-chief. And the accountant-in-chief's professional opinion is that the American public needs to tell Washington it's time to steer the nation off the path to financial ruin.

From the hustings and the airwaves this campaign season, America's political class can be heard debating Capitol Hill sex scandals, the wisdom of the war in Iraq and which party is tougher on terror. Democrats and Republicans talk of cutting taxes to make life easier for the American people.

What they don't talk about is a dirty little secret everyone in Washington knows, or at least should. The vast majority of economists and budget analysts agree: The ship of state is on a disastrous course, and will founder on the reefs of economic disaster if nothing is done to correct it.

There's a good reason politicians don't like to talk about the nation's long-term fiscal prospects. The subject is short on political theatrics and long on complicated economics, scary graphs and very big numbers. It reveals serious problems and offers no easy solutions. Anybody who wanted to deal with it seriously would have to talk about raising taxes and cutting benefits, nasty nostrums that might doom any candidate who prescribed them.

"There's no sexiness to it," laments Leita Hart-Fanta, an accountant who has just heard Walker's pitch. She suggests recruiting a trusted celebrity — maybe Oprah — to sell fiscal responsibility to the American people.

Walker doesn't want to make balancing the federal government's books sexy — he just wants to make it politically palatable. He has committed to touring the nation through the 2008 elections, talking to anybody who will listen about the fiscal black hole Washington has dug itself, the "demographic tsunami" that will come when the baby boom generation begins retiring and the recklessness of borrowing money from foreign lenders to pay for the operation of the U.S. government.

"He can speak forthrightly and independently because his job is not in jeopardy if he tells the truth," said Isabel Sawhill, a senior fellow in economic studies at the Brookings Institution.

Walker can talk in public about the nation's impending fiscal crisis because he has one of the most secure jobs in Washington. As comptroller general of the United States — basically, the government's chief accountant — he is serving a 15-year term that runs through 2013.

This year Walker has spoken to the Union League Club of Chicago and the Rotary Club of Atlanta, the Sons of the American Revolution and the World Future Society. But the backbone of his campaign has been the Fiscal Wake-up Tour, a traveling roadshow of economists and budget analysts who share Walker's concern for the nation's budgetary future.

"You can't solve a problem until the majority of the people believe you have a problem that needs to be solved," Walker says.

Polls suggest that Americans have only a vague sense of their government's long-term fiscal prospects. When pollsters ask Americans to name the most important problem facing America today — as a CBS News/New York Times poll of 1,131 Americans did in September — issues such as the war in Iraq, terrorism, jobs and the economy are most frequently mentioned. The deficit doesn't even crack the top 10.

Yet on the rare occasions that pollsters ask directly about the deficit, at least some people appear to recognize it as a problem. In a survey of 807 Americans last year by the Pew Center for the People and the Press, 42% of respondents said reducing the deficit should be a top priority; another 38% said it was important but a lower priority.

So the majority of the public appears to agree with Walker that the deficit is a serious problem, but only when they're made to think about it. Walker's challenge is to get people not just to think about it, but to pressure politicians to make the hard choices that are needed to keep the situation from spiraling out of control.

To show that the looming fiscal crisis is not a partisan issue, he brings along economists and budget analysts from across the political spectrum. In Austin, he's accompanied by Diane Lim Rogers, a liberal economist from the Brookings Institution, and Alison Acosta Fraser, director of the Roe Institute for Economic Policy Studies at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

"We all agree on what the choices are and what the numbers are," Fraser says.

Their basic message is this: If the United States government conducts business as usual over the next few decades, a national debt that is already $8.5 trillion could reach $46 trillion or more, adjusted for inflation. That's almost as much as the total net worth of every person in America — Bill Gates, Warren Buffett and those Google guys included.

A hole that big could paralyze the U.S. economy; according to some projections, just the interest payments on a debt that big would be as much as all the taxes the government collects today.

And every year that nothing is done about it, Walker says, the problem grows by $2 trillion to $3 trillion.

People who remember Ross Perot's rants in the 1992 presidential election may think of the federal debt as a problem of the past. But it never really went away after Perot made it an issue, it only took a breather. The federal government actually produced a surplus for a few years during the 1990s, thanks to a booming economy and fiscal restraint imposed by laws that were passed early in the decade. And though the federal debt has grown in dollar terms since 2001, it hasn't grown dramatically relative to the size of the economy.

But that's about to change, thanks to the country's three big entitlement programs — Social Security, Medicaid and especially Medicare. Medicaid and Medicare have grown progressively more expensive as the cost of health care has dramatically outpaced inflation over the past 30 years, a trend that is expected to continue for at least another decade or two.

And with the first baby boomers becoming eligible for Social Security in 2008 and for Medicare in 2011, the expenses of those two programs are about to increase dramatically due to demographic pressures. People are also living longer, which makes any program that provides benefits to retirees more expensive.

Medicare already costs four times as much as it did in 1970, measured as a percentage of the nation's gross domestic product. It currently comprises 13% of federal spending; by 2030, the Congressional Budget Office projects it will consume nearly a quarter of the budget.

Economists Jagadeesh Gokhale of the American Enterprise Institute and Kent Smetters of the University of Pennsylvania have an even scarier way of looking at Medicare. Their method calculates the program's long-term fiscal shortfall — the annual difference between its dedicated revenues and costs — over time.

By 2030 they calculate Medicare will be about $5 trillion in the hole, measured in 2004 dollars. By 2080, the fiscal imbalance will have risen to $25 trillion. And when you project the gap out to an infinite time horizon, it reaches $60 trillion.

Medicare so dominates the nation's fiscal future that some economists believe health care reform, rather than budget measures, is the best way to attack the problem.
